6468. Are the dietary scales subject to examination?—Yes. We have in the kitchens—fortunately new kitchens were built just before the war—nine cooks engaged. If you would like the dietary scales which are regularly sent round submitted to the Commission, I should be very glad to get them for you, because a permanent record is kept of every meal.

6469. Mrs. Mathew: Dr. Edwards, I should like to know what the nurses at Camberwell House receive in the way of payment?—The probationer gets £36 in her first year; she gets £39 in her second year, and if she remains a junior, that is to say, until she gets promotion, she gets £42 in her third year. If she becomes a sister she starts at £65 and goes to £100. They, of course, receive their uniform and all found.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: I have got no question to ask Doctor Edwards, but I should like, if I might, to say how valuable his evidence has been and how excellently it has been given.

Chairman: I am sure we all concur in that view.

6470. Sir Ernest Hiley: Just one question, Doctor, with reference to the voluntary boarder who gives an undertaking to stay for 24 hours. Supposing he breaks that condition and goes away, you cannot bring him back, can you?—I could bring him back within 24 hours, but as a matter of expediency I should not do so, unless I had reason to think he was going to hurt himself or others.

6471. Really the undertaking to stay is of no value?—The patient undertakes to stay for an indefinite period, subject to his giving 24 hours' notice.

6472. Earl Russell: Still I think you are mistaken in saying you can bring him back?—I could refuse to let him go out.

Earl Russell: I do not think you could bring him back.

Sir Ernest Hiley: If he takes himself off I do not see how you could.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Would you ask the Witness, Sir, how in the case of a limited liability corporation the functions of the statute are applied? We have not had any evidence with regard to that matter.

Chairman: That seems to me to be rather a legal question.

Witness: I think I can answer it. That, Sir, has nothing whatever to do with the licensed premises. It is merely a financial arrangement whereby the finance of the business may be managed; it has nothing to do with the licensee.

6473. Chairman: It must be an individual?—Yes.

6474. Mr. Walter Stewart: Have the board of directors the right to dismiss the medical superintendent?—It would depend upon whether the superintendent was engaged by them or not.

6475. One wants to see what is the control by the members of the Board of Control of the business side of the concern?—None at all.

Earl Russell: Except in the annual licensing.

6476. Chairman: They could refuse to licence if they were dissatisfied?—Yes, undoubtedly.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Could the witness, through you, Sir, tell us how many of the 78 voluntary boarders who were admitted were certified before they went out?

6477. Chairman: How many became certifiable and were certified, Doctor?—I could not answer that question offhand, but some were. This is purely guesswork, but perhaps 15 per cent.

6478. Mr. Walter Stewart: Would the witness regard the control of such an institution as his own by the Ministry of Health with favour or otherwise?—The answer is that we are already managed by the Ministry of Health.

Chairman: You mean through the Board of Control, I suppose, Mr. Stewart.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I meant a direct independent control.

Chairman: You mean independently of the Board of Control.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Eliminating the Board of Control, yes.

Chairman: The Ministry would have to do it through some department or other. Do you mean direct control by the Ministry?

Mr. Walter Stewart: Yes, as in the case of an ordinary hospital.

6479. Chairman: Have you any view upon that point, Doctor?—It would simply be calling it by another name, I take it.

Chairman: I think I have brought out the point raised in the letter you handed to me. (Handing letter to Witness.)

Witness: I am very much obliged.

Chairman: Thank you very much, Dr. Edwards.

(The Witness withdrew.)

(Adjourned to to-morrow at 10.30 o'clock.)

THE RT. HON. H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (in the Chair).

THE EARL RUSSELL.

SIR HUMPHRY ROLLESTON, BART., K.C.B., M.D.

SIR ERNEST HILEY, K.B.E.

MR. NATHANIEL MICKLEM, K.C.

MR. W. A. JOWITT, K.C.

MR. H. SNELL, M.P.

MRS. C. J. MATHEW.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER, (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B., called and examined.

6480. Chairman: Sir Cecil, you are proprietor of the Old Manor, Salisbury?—Yes.

6481. Is the Old Manor a licensed house for the reception of patients under the Lunacy Acts?—Yes.

6482. It would be interesting to us to have from you a short account of your institution?—It is the largest licensed house in the country. It is licensed for the reception of 672 patients. It is also one of the oldest, having existed for 111 years. The first admission we have on the books was on the 25th January, 1813. During this time it has admitted, apart from voluntary boarders, some 15,000 patients. The institution has been on more than one occasion, I might say, of great help to the country. Some 60 years ago there was a grave lack of accommodation for the criminal patients of England, and they were housed in this institution whilst Broadmoor was being built. Since that time we have received large numbers of patients from the county asylums, as Dr. Edwards told you yesterday, relieving a grave want of room there; and during the war the Board of Control found 25,000 beds for the wounded in the institutions round about London and other places, leading to a great congestion in the other institutions, and there again I helped the country in taking some hundreds.

6484. How many men and how many women?—About equal numbers. Of course, with regard to myself, I am not a medical man.

6485. I was just going to ask you what your exact personal relation to the establishment is. You are described as the proprietor of it; what does that mean?—I am in the position practically of a committee of management. I have really under the Act no locus standi, I am only the proprietor. I am a licensee jointly with my medical superintendent.

6486. Are you the actual owner of the premises, that is to say, of the land and houses?—Yes. It is a little company.

6487. Is it a private limited company?—Yes; I formed it at the beginning of this year.

6488. What is the name of the company?—The Old Manor, Salisbury, Limited.

6489. Would you tell us a little of the history of the property. I do not wish to ask anything that is private, but did you acquire it by purchase, or by succession?—Practically by succession. My predecessor held the asylum on a mortgage, and we were the mortgagees. It was really a friendly foreclosure in a way, because the place was not paying, and they were very glad to get rid of it.

6490. When was that?—In 1910.

6491. So you have been 14 years there?—14 years at this work.

6492. You have incorporated this company, I have no doubt, for convenience of management?—Yes.

6493. It is a private company. Who are the directors of it?—Myself, my wife, and my brother-in-law.

6494. Just a family concern?—Yes.

6495. And the shareholders—just yourselves again?—Just ourselves again, and one or two outside, the number, I think, being five.

6496. You, yourself, are identified as the chief person interested in the concern?—Yes; I am there about three or four days a week on the average.

6497. We will come to the question of the licensing in a moment, but you and your present medical superintendent hold the licence jointly?—Yes.

6498. Perhaps I might just ask this question: How long has your present medical superintendent been there?—About two years now.

17 December, 1924.]

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6499. Has he special qualifications in psychiatry?—Yes, he was the chief medical officer for some 14 years at St. Andrew's, Northampton, one of the registered hospitals.

6500. How is he appointed—is he a direct employee of the company?—I appointed him, with the approval of the Board of Control.

6501. Then he is the direct employee of the company; his employer in law and to whom he would look is this company?—Yes.

6502. Is he remunerated by salary?—He is, yes.

6504. Those are within the immediate jurisdiction of the Board of Control?—Yes. We have six visits a year, as they do. They have six visits from the members of the Board of Control, and we have two visits from them, and four visits from the licensing committee.

6505. As regards the licensing, you derive your licence from the justices?—Yes. The justices, you know, appoint a medical visitor. I should like to mention that here, because one of his duties is that, within 30 days of the admission of a patient, he has to visit the patient and make a report as to his fitness for detention. It is a safeguard in the Act against a sane person being unduly detained.

6507. So you are subject to visitation twice a year by two Commissioners, and then in addition to that provision is made for visitation of your institution by justices?—Yes.

6508. First of all, as regards the Commissioners, at present are you visited by two Commissioners or by one?—Two now.

6509. For a time I think it was one?—Yes.

6510. The system of two Commissioners visiting you has been restored, has it?—Yes.

6511. One of them a doctor, and the other a barrister?—Yes.

6512. These visits are twice a year; have you any notion when they are coming?—Not the slightest.

6513. They just appear?—Yes, they just appear.

6514. Will you tell us what they do when they come?—I think, as Dr. Edwards explained to you yesterday, they do exactly as they think fit.

6515. We need not duplicate the evidence?—They see every patient and they give private interviews to every patient who wants one.

6517. You appreciate the point I am making. What one is anxious to have is this: that the patient should feel here is someone he can really talk to, and also, if possible, talk without the shadow, so to speak, of the authorities to whom he is presently subjected. That is the idea, of course, and that is the conception of the visit. Do your patients, in fact, have private talks with the Commissioners?—Yes; they give private interviews to a good many. I think last time there were 12 or 14 interviewed.

6518. At private interviews?—At private interviews.

6519. What do you mean by a private interview?—It is held in the room where the Commissioners are by themselves, none of the staff of the asylum being present. Then, of course, they call in the medical superintendent to answer any serious allegations that may be made.

6520. You tell us that on recent visits as many as a dozen interviews have been given to individual patients, in a room without the presence of anyone representing the institution?—Yes, and that applies to the magistrates as well when they visit.

6521. So that at least, so far as your institution is concerned, an opportunity is given?—Yes.

6524. It is very satisfactory to hear what you do with regard to visits. The Commissioners see every patient, and then do they go over the premises?—Yes, they go everywhere.

6525. And they look at the diet?—Diet, and the buildings, and they recommend certain things to be done, and so on.

6526. Of course, in the case of persons in your institution no trouble will arise as regards clothing; I suppose they have their own clothing?—Not the ex-service patients; I supply them with clothing.

6527. But the ordinary patients will have their own clothing?—Of course; they do their own shopping, and buy it in the town mostly.

6528. Except in cases where they are destructive of their clothing, and there you have to deal with them specially?—Yes.

6529. But in the ordinary case a patient entering your institution naturally keeps his or her own clothing?—Yes.

6530. Will you tell us about the hours of rising and going to bed, because we have heard something about that in some of the institutions. Have you a programme for the day?—We have not a set programme. Some of my patients sit up to ten, eleven, and sometimes twelve, playing bridge, and so on. We have no set programme. In some wards you must have, where they are refractory patients.

6531. Tell us about them. Where you have to have a disciplinary time table what is that time table?—They usually go to bed about 7 to 8 o'clock, those patients.

6532. And when do they get up?—About half-past seven to eight in the morning. You see with difficult patients you have to have some little routine of that kind. Each of the patients has to be undressed by the nurse, and that takes time if she has 10 or 12 patients to put to bed, and some voluntarily go to bed much earlier.

6533. It seems rather a long time to be in bed without food, does it not?—I think it is a part of the treatment; I think the more rest they get the better, especially patients suffering from acute melancholia; rest is advocated.

6534. Do you not think that the interval is rather long between meals? I suppose they have dinner in the evening—or is it supper?—Yes.

17 December, 1924.]

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6535. Supper which is before seven, and breakfast about eight?—We do not get many complaints of that.

6538. Now in the case of the justices do they carry out the same kind of inspection as the Commissioners?—Yes, with the exception, of course, that they do not do it quite so thoroughly as the Commissioners.

6539. And they are more familiar with the institution, because they are there more frequently?—Yes, and they walk through each ward and give private interviews to patients, and talk to them if they are asked to.

6540. With regard to the medical practitioner who must be one of the visitors, is he an entirely outside and independent person?—Quite so, yes.

6541. Is he selected by the justices themselves?—Yes, he is selected by them.

6542. Do you find that the patients frequently want to talk to that outside doctor?—Very often, yes, but they rather talk to the Chairman. He is rather a nice man and very popular, and he is pleasant, and so on.

6543. But the doctor is always at hand if they wish to see an independent medical man?—Yes.

6544. Does the independent medical man have interviews with them sometimes?—Yes.

6545. There are very full instructions given as to what is to be done, both by the visiting Commissioners and the justices, in Section 194, what they are to do on their visits, and so on. Have you any suggestions to make with regard to further instructions to them, or do you think the present instructions are adequate?—I think they are quite adequate; in fact, as regards the Act of 1890—I do not see in my experience how it is going to be improved upon; it is a very wonderful Act.

6546. So far as the licensed houses are concerned?—It is a bit hard on us.

6547. It may be a little rigorous, but at the same time the provisions seem clear; you do not find difficulty in working to those provisions?—Not a bit.

6548. Then there is provision made for the entering of the reports and the results of the investigation which are available, and you are under obligation to show every part of the premises?—Yes.

6550. Do they then after their investigation make a minute in the patients' book of their visit?—Yes, they do, in the patients' book.

6551. Do these special inquiries, directed to a particular patient, arise in practice generally from relatives or friends?—Yes, generally, and of course it may be a case that the Commissioners have drawn special attention to before, on their previous visit; then they would see him again to see if he had improved still further.

6552. As a result of such inquiries into special cases, have you had any large number of discharges?—No, not very many. Some few we have sent away on leave of absence, on trial for health. That is what generally happens in the case which you are considering now.

6553. You give them an experimental period of leave?—Yes.

6554. But as the result of such inquiries, in your experience in the last 14 years, have you had any cases in which the Commissioners have been satisfied that the person was a sane person who should not have been detained?—Never; not one.

6555. That has not resulted from any of the inquiries?—No.

6556. Although there have been a number of such inquiries?—Quite so.

6557. On the other hand, you tell us that in some of the cases it has been thought desirable to give leave of absence as an experiment?—As an experiment, yes.

6558. In consequence of that experiment, have a certain number of patients effected recovery?—A certain number have not returned, but a great number have.

6559. Apart from a special inquiry such as is referred to here, do you use your power of giving leave of absence of your own initiative?—Frequently, yes.

6560. Do you find that a useful provision at the stage of convalescence?—Very useful indeed; of course it gives the patient time to realise his responsibilities of life; after being in an institution for some months, naturally he is a little unused to the outside world.

6561. The transition must be difficult?—A little difficult for the patient.

6563. Now the patient on leave, as you have pointed out, is still under certification, therefore you are still in a sense detaining him—I mean you still have control over him?—Yes.

6564. While he is away, no question would arise with regard to any of your patients, who are all private patients, as to maintenance. Presumably he will be sent back to his home?—Quite so, yes.

6565. Suppose the trial is unsuccessful; suppose he felt himself unfitted to cope with the world again, and the experiment has really failed, what happens in such a case?—The friends bring him back. They write to us, as a rule, and tell us he has not improved, that in fact he has got much worse, and will we receive him back? Of course we do; he is still on our books.

6566. But whose duty is it to bring him back?—I think it is the duty of the friends myself.

6567. You may, of course, get a medical certificate from the personal medical attendant of the patient who is seeing him when he is on leave?—Yes, we always like that, but usually the friends know, naturally.

6568. Let us assume the leave is expiring; you have not heard any report about the patient on leave, you may get a medical certificate that he has recovered?—Quite so, then he is discharged from the books.

17 December, 1924.]

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6569. Do you allow his case to lapse, so to speak?—He is actually discharged.

6570. Do you see him again, or, rather, does your medical superintendent see him again?—Perhaps they come to the asylum just to see him personally.

6571. But he may not come back to the asylum at all?—Oh no.

6572. The leave may end in two ways, it may end either in the patient having unfortunately to come back because he has not recovered, or in simply passing into the general population again as recovered?—Yes.

6573. Suppose the period of leave has expired, he has not come back, and you have no word of him. How do you treat the case then?—Discharge him. We write to the friends naturally, we always do that; and if they say the patient is very much better, then we discharge him practically as recovered.

6574. But suppose he has not recovered and is not discharged?—Then we extend the leave.

6575. Is he not treated as a person who has escaped at the expiry of the period of leave?—No, we can extend the leave, as you know.

6576. Earl Russell: Do I understand that you extend it without any real information about him, either from the friends or the doctor?—We get information at the end of the leave from the friends about him, and then if he is very much better we can advise the friends whether we shall discharge him as recovered, or whether we shall extend the leave; we do which they like.

6577. You have no case in which you do not hear at all?—No, very seldom.

6578. What would you do if you did not hear at all?—If we could not get hold of the patient, of course he is discharged.

6579. Chairman: Automatically?—Automatically.

6580. He is really an escape in that case, is he not?—Yes.

6581. Because he is still under your charge, and you have lost him? That really is the position, is it not?—Yes, that has happened.

6582. And does the period of 14 days run from the expiry of the period of leave in such a case?—Yes.

6583. Have you 14 days after the expiry of the leave in which you can bring him back?—In which we can recapture him if we want him; we never do.

6584. Earl Russell: You never send out your attendants to fetch a patient back?—Not under those conditions. We had a case a few months ago; he was a man who had means of his own, and his leave expired, my medical superintendent went to see him—he asked him to—and when he had got there he had gone, and of course we had no other course but to discharge him within the 14 days.

6585. Chairman: It seems a little indefinite at that stage, if one may say so. I quite appreciate the arrangement. A patient goes out on leave for a stated period and is still under your control, in this sense that he can be brought back without re-certification?—Yes.

6586. You treat the responsibility then as being with the relatives?—Yes.

6587. Just as the responsibility for originally bringing him under your charge was with the relatives, and the power to discharge from your institution is with the relatives all the time, so you regard the duty to bring him back, if he has not recovered, as reposing in the relatives also; that seems to be the scheme of the thing?—That is the practice.

6588. We are not dealing with pauper patients, we are dealing with patients who have been introduced into your institution through a reception order obtained by relatives?—By petition.

6589. And these relatives are persons with an obligation to visit the patient while with you, and they also have the right to obtain the discharge, whether the patient is recovered or not?—Yes 6590. So that you regard the case as one in which you have given the patient temporary leave of absence to rejoin his friends, and you treat his friends or relatives as the persons who are responsible during that period?—Quite so.

6591. Then if he comes back at the end, he simply resumes his place in the life of your institution?—Yes.

6592. It being the responsibility of the relatives to bring him back again?—Yes.

6593. Then if, on the other hand, he does not recover, you expect to receive a report from the relatives?—Yes, or from their doctor.

6594. Then there is a third case, that a person simply goes away on leave, and you hear nothing more at all, and that you tell us is a rare case?—A rare case. I cannot extend the leave, because I have no request to do so.

6595. On the expiry of the term of leave if you have heard nothing, and if the patient does not turn up, then you proceed to discharge?—We have that 14 days, and then we proceed to discharge him.

6596. But you do not regard yourselves as having any duty to recover him, or to take active steps to recover him.

6597. Earl Russell: If his release is a danger to the public, you regard the responsibility for that as resting on the petitioner and not upon you?—Yes.

6598. Chairman: It is quite consistent with the position of a private patient?—Yes. Of course that section about the escape of a patient and recapture did not contemplate this case which we are considering now.

6599. You might develop that a little, because it is rather an interesting chapter of the law, the treatment of the escaped lunatic?—The question of escape is the escape of a man who is really mentally bad.

6600. Rather than the case of a person out on probation?—Yes. I do not think when that section was drafted that was contemplated in the least.

6601. You have, I observe, a suggestion to make on the subject of this provision?—It is only to get an extension of time; that section should either be cut out altogether, or the time made longer.

6602. It is Section 85?—Yes.

6603. That is the provision dealing with escape and recapture?—Yes. You see you may have a patient escape who has homicidal tendencies; at the time of his escape he may be fairly lucid, and I think it would be a great danger to the public if that man were not recaptured.

6604. Oh, clearly?—And therefore why 14 days?

6605. We have 28 days in Scotland, you know; I do not know why there should be that difference?—They thought the same, perhaps, as I do. You have many things in the Scottish law I believe that would be an improvement on ours, especially about the specially appointed justice.

6607. Yes, the language is unduly threatening. What it really means is this that a person who is mentally ill at the time, really as an incident of his illness has gone out, just as a person might in delirium arise from his bed and walk out, it is in itself a symptom of the ailment?—Yes; I often get ladies and gentlemen who go home and I get a wire to say: "We are home to-night, and will be back to-morrow"; they have perhaps some irresistible impulse to go home and see their friends.

6608. However the whole provision seems inapplicable, a little arbitrary so far as it relates to the particular case of a patient out on leave. You would like us to consider that aspect of the case, and what is to happen at the expiry of the term?—Yes; I think the onus should be on his friends either to ask us to extend the leave or discharge him.

6609. My attention is drawn to Section 55, subsection (8) which deals with this case: "If a person allowed to be absent on trial for any period does not return at the expiration thereof"—that is the person we are thinking of?—Yes.

6610. "And a medical certificate certifying that his detention as a lunatic is no longer necessary is not sent to the visitors of the asylum or the manager of the hospital or house, he may at any time within 14 days after the expiration of the period of trial be retaken as in the case of an escape." That is permissive, you observe, there is no obligation. It does not say "shall be captured," it is merely that you may retake him?—Yes.

6611. In practice you do not retake him—is that it?—That is the practice.

6612. Of course, Lord Russell's point arises. Suppose you know that this person, although sufficiently recovered to be allowed out on leave, is a person who ought to be under some care or control and he has just disappeared, is he left at large, so to speak?—We strongly advise the friends what to do.

6613. In fact, you use the friends as the vehicle of the control while he is out of your establishment?—Or the doctor or his medical attendant.

6614. Earl Russell: Have you known cases of a single man of sufficient property who does not happen to have friends and relations to look after him?—Yes.

6615. Who would you deal with in that case?—With himself.

6616. Chairman: Of course, there always has to be somebody who is responsible, because the petitioner must be a relative, or some person who is interested in the case and who must explain why it is not a relative who is applying?—Quite so.

6617. Then there is provision in the statute for the substitution of some person for the petitioner if the petitioner is remiss in any way in attending to the case; so there is always in the eye of the law some person who is known to you, and who stands in the position of the petitioner?—Yes. If we can get at no one else it is the person who made the last payment, and he can demand his discharge in the same way as the petitioner.

6618. Earl Russell: That may be a solicitor in Lincoln's Inn; you do not expect him to run after a patient?—It often is a solicitor.

6619. Chairman: What happens in that case? You can hardly hand the patient out on leave to the solicitor, can you? I mean ex hypothesi he has not really got any family circle.—What the solicitor would do in that case, if we recommend the patient to go on leave of absence is, he would get someone to take charge of that patient.

6620. He would get an attendant for him?—Perhaps an attendant, or in some little private home, whatever he considers best.

6621. And would no doubt arrange for medical attendance?—No doubt he would. Of course, that is really not my business.

6622. No, but it is interesting to us to see what happens to the person. You have this responsibility for him that he is still a person on your books, still certified, and with regard to him the legislature has given you power to recapture him if you have no medical certificate of his recovery?—Yes, and also if he commits suicide, it is suicide in the asylum.

6623. For which you would be responsible?—Yes.

6624. May one take it that the class of person who is so bereft of family support and surroundings is rare?—Very rare indeed; there are always some friends about. Of course, many patients have receivers.

6625. That is for their property?—Yes, and, of course, they act in the position of a petitioner very often; very often the petitioner is the receiver.

6626. Have you any patients who are so found by inquisition?—I think one or two, yes.

6627. And they are visited, of course, by the Lord Chancellor's Visitors?—Yes.

6628. And do the Lord Chancellor's Visitors also visit those patients in whose case a receiver has been appointed?—I do not think they do. It is the official solicitor I look to in that case.

6629. In the case of your institution, of course, all the patients will have some means?—Oh, yes, or their friends. Some have not. I have got some there who pay nothing, one or two. I am doing charitable work as well as the registered hospital.

6630. Some cases are taken either on special terms or gratuitously?—Yes.

6631. But that is a pure piece of philanthropy?—Yes, I feel for some people. They want to come to my institution, and if they do not come to me they must go to a rate-aided institution. Perhaps you would like to know about my fees?

6632. Yes, we might.—The average fees paid in my institution are £2 14s. 9d.—that is the average for the whole of my patients. There are 357 people who pay less, or up to two and a half guineas a week. For that sum I have to find doctors, nurses, attendants, and every necessary of life, and in 40 per cent. of those cases I have to find clothing, so mine is a very low paying institution in a way.

6633. I was going to say I wonder how you manage to budget on that basis?—I am supplying a demand in the country for these patients there is no doubt, and the patients are very grateful for the treatment they get with me for those fees.

6634. What is the maximum fee you charge?—Yesterday I was rather amused about what you call the good-paying patients. That does not arise with me. I have two paying fairly high fees, and they have their special nurses and attendants, but the average is £2 14s. 9d., and 357 at £2 12s. 6d. or under, so you see I have very few high paying patients. Some pay five guineas, some four and some three, but those are very few in number.

6635. Your budget must be rather difficult, I should think, if you have to pay considerable rates and taxes. You are not a charity, and therefore you are not exempt from rating and taxing in any shape or form?—The registered hospitals charge much higher fees than I do, and of course they are in a way charitable. I suppose out of my total number there are 100 paying two guineas, some paying less, and one or two paying nothing.

6636. I should be surprised to hear that your Company pays any dividend?—Oh yes. Of course I run with the institution farms on which I grow most of the produce, the potatoes and the vegetables, and milk, eggs and poultry, and so on.

6637. You are able to market your surplus?—I am my own market. I am my own middleman.

6638. As we know now that is a very important thing?—That is why perhaps I can do it more cheaply than anyone else.

6639. Have you any surplus in the way of produce you can market outside the institution?—Wheat, of course. I used to have my own mill and I ground my own wheat; I have given that up now.

6640. You work this market garden and farm in association with the institution?—Yes, and many of my patients go out to work in the gardens.

6641. How much land have you associated with the Manor?—At the present time it is 350 acres, but I have just bought another place which is 1,100 acres, so I shall have a bigger farm, and I may revert then to my old practice of growing my own wheat for flour.

6642. That, of course, would enable you to get a large amount of your produce without any middleman's profits?—At cost price, yes.

6643. You have your dairy, I suppose, and supply yourself with milk?—Yes; I do sell surplus milk. When you have 70 or 80 cows, of course you do not want all the milk.

6644. In this connection you might tell us what is the number of your staff. You have got a medical superintendent?—I have four on the medical staff, and all those are engaged with the mental condition of the patients. I am the manager as regards food supply. In many institutions the medical superintendent is really engaged in administrative work. One of my doctors is a lady doctor.

6645. So you have three men and one lady doctor?—Yes.

6646. What nursing staff have you?—We have about 60 staff—I am not including ward maids; there are 24 male and 36 female nurses; it varies round those numbers. And, of course, you must look upon my outside staff as more or less attendants, because they take patients into the garden, and the patients engage in carpentry and other work.

6647. Earl Russell: That is a thing I am rather interested in—you have patients whom you can allow to use sharp tools with safety?—Yes. We have to be careful in choosing those patients, naturally.

6648. And also careful that the tools do not get missed?—Oh yes. Of course to-day with 109 people allowed to go into the town they can buy things they want; we have to take certain risks to-day to cure our cases.

6649. Do the men shave themselves with ordinary razors?—Some do, those that we know; we have patients who have been there a very long time. I had a patient die not long ago who had been in the institution 61 years, and there is one now, a dear old man, who has been there 50 years.

6650. Chairman: Will you tell us a little about the conditions of your staff, because that also has some relation to our inquiry, of course—the efficiency of the staff, the prospects of the nurses and the attractiveness of the profession are subjects on which we should like to hear you?—We have lectures weekly, given by the doctor to the nurses for the Medico-Psychological examination.

6651. Do your nurses all go in for the examination?—Not all of them; they have not perhaps the ability to take that examination, because the Medico-Psychological final examination is a very difficult examination indeed, and some of my best nurses could not pass it, some nurses I would not be without, and I would not discharge them on account of their having no Medico-Psychological certificate.

6652. There are people who work exceedingly well but who are very bad at examinations, as we all know?—Quite so. I am sure one of my best nurses would never pass an examination; she would pass the first part of the examination, but not that second part where you have to go into the question of enzymes and all these wonderful things which they give in examination papers to-day.

6653. What about the remuneration of your staff?—It is about the same as other institutions, you know. The probationary nurses start at somewhere about £30, and they work up to £60 and £70.

6654. Do they all live in?—Yes, in the institution.

6655. The whole of the staff?—Yes.

6656. Are none of your men married?—One or two of the night attendants are married—of course they live out; I had forgotten that for the moment.

6657. Have you any views as to the desirability of mental nurses having, either before or after their period in a mental hospital, some training in general hospital work?—That is really a medical question.

6658. If it is not really within your province we will not trouble you with it?—I should not like to express a view upon it.

6659. It is really more within the medical superintendent's province and we have some evidence about it already. It is just a question whether facilities should not be provided for nurses having general experience as well as specialised experience. I quite see that is not perhaps within your province?—Of course they get a good deal of general experience in an institution such as mine, because we have many physical ailments as well as mental, naturally.

6660. And very often a mental disturbance may be associated with some physical ailment?—Yes, especially in cases of general paralysis of the insane, and that sort of thing.

6661. It would therefore be desirable that nurses who have charge of the mental cases should also have some experience in general nursing?—Yes.

6662. One must remember that in mental institutions there is a certain amount of ordinary illness as well as the special illness for which the patients are confined?—And much more really, owing to the mental state of the patient.

6663. Therefore one must not assume that mental nurses are engaged solely in mental nursing, but they also have general experience inside the institution?—Yes.

6664. Have you in your institution provision for what one may call the medical, as apart from the mental treatment of cases?—You mean as regards consulting?

6665. Yes?—Yes, I have a consulting surgeon.

6666. Does he frequently visit?—If he is asked for the purpose of diagnosis.

6668. What provision have you for attention to the teeth of the patients?—We have a visiting dentist.

6669. How are those persons whom you call in, the consulting surgeon or the dentist, remunerated—by fees charged to the patients?—Yes, I tell them that I will get the fees I can for them from the patient, as most of my patients are not very well off; they cannot afford a high fee for an operation, so sometimes an operation is done for as low as five guineas. I make that arrangement with my consulting surgeon.

6670. And you would have one at Salisbury, no doubt?—Yes, a very good one.

6671. I see you have considered the general question of policy as to the differentiation between the private patient and the pauper patient, and you have a view to express upon that?—Yes.

6672. What is your feeling on that subject?—My feeling is that the rate-aided patient should have the same advantage as the private patient of two medical certificates. As you know in the rate-aided form there is no petition, one medical certificate, but the justice signing the reception order must personally see the patient; whereas in the case of a private patient there must be a petition and two medical certificates; but the magistrate giving the order need not see the patient.

6673. Although there is a right to the patient to be informed within 24 hours of his reception that he may within seven days see a judicial authority?—Yes; we have to give the patient notice within 24 hours, and give him a form of request whereby he can exercise his right, but that is a real farce, I think.

6674. Earl Russell: Do you find in practice that patients come in without the justice having seen them?—Yes; I have something to say upon that later.

6675. Chairman: Then you are in favour, I take it, of an assimilation between the two cases?—I think they should be made uniform, because it is possible now, as you see, to get a patient into a licensed house on the rate-aided form, that is by one medical certificate.

6676. How is that done?—In this way: he can be sent to a public asylum; then the friends say, "We will have him transferred to the private class by giving notice." Then under Section 59 he can be sent on to me by transfer.

6677. So, in effect, he reaches you on the machinery of the Poor Law?—Yes; it is a point which, in regard to making the practice uniform, it would be wise to consider.

17 December, 1924.]

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6678. We have been impressed by the divergent methods by which persons reach institutions for the insane, and it is undesirable that the methods should be so diverse, if they could be brought to a basis of uniformity. On the question of the double certification we must, of course, have some regard to the question of expense?—You must have, yes.

6680. We are all at one upon this that there is no reason why one class of person should require two medical certificates and another class of person should require one, but we are concerned to consider whether two medical certificates are necessary in all cases; and this had occurred to some of us as being the possible solution; that there are many cases as to which there can be little or no dubiety, but where any doubt was entertained, either by the single doctor or by the judicial authority or justice, then either the medical practitioner, or the certifying authority should be entitled to call in a second or, if you please, any number of opinions, if the case was one of difficulty. Whether that would meet the point or not it is difficult to say. It has the drawback that it would leave it to the discretion of the single doctor, or of the certifying authority, to decide whether it was a difficult case or not?—Yes. Of course the rate-aided patient has a great advantage over the private patient really; the magistrate has personally to see him.

6681. I notice that you attach much importance to that?—I do, yes.

6683. Let us have your views on that topic?—If the magistrate who gives the order has not seen the patient he says so at the bottom of the form. It is our duty then in the asylum to give the notice of the right whereby the patient can demand to see a judicial authority, and a form of request whereby he can exercise that right. Of course, if you get a patient in a state of acute mania, or a very depressed melancholic patient, he does not take any notice of the form.

6684. I should also have thought that it was exceedingly inexpedient to bother a patient in his first days in an institution with notices?—Yes; he says: "Take the thing away."

6685. Then you have to go through certain formalities?—Yes, and it has to be a different judicial authority.

6686. It is all done under Section 8. In 24 hours the matter requires your attention, because you have in 24 hours to make up your mind whether he is a patient who ought to receive a notice in writing or not; is that your problem?—He must receive it. If he has not seen a judicial authority we always give them the notice.

6688. Still one has to see what are the stages to which your attention is directed by the statute, and the first topic is: is this a patient to whom it would be prejudicial to give such notification? The medical superintendent must address himself to that question first of all. Having first decided he is a person who could receive a notice, then the manager of the institution must within 24 hours give a notice, and then again the patient has to be told that he has got seven days after his reception in which to make up his mind. He ought to be considering about his recovery by that time, but this is put to him, whether or not he is going to exercise his right. Then if he does so declare, you have got to go through, or the manager has got to go through, certain procedure giving notice to the judicial authority?—Giving notice to the clerk to the visiting justices, who then brings up a judicial authority to see the patient.

6689. It does seem rather odd that a person who has ex hypothesi been certified, and must therefore at least be a person of disturbed mind if not completely insane, has to be addressing himself in the first seven days to the question of how he is to deal with a notice, which has been served upon him by the manager of the institution at which he has arrived?—That would be avoided if the judicial authority saw the patient.

6691. Certainly.—And, of course, if he does not see the patient then the patient has that right to demand to see a judicial authority. Then supposing one comes up, he makes a report to the Board of Control; the Board of Control has to give effect to his report; that is, if the judicial authority says that this patient is, in his opinion, not insane, I think the Board of Control have to discharge that patient.

6692. The Act provides that the Commissioners shall take such steps as may be necessary to give effect to the report?—It has occurred that where a patient has gone out on a justice's report (not in my time I might say) he has committed suicide within two or three days, and that shows that the judicial authority, in my opinion, should be a man who not only knows a little about the Lunacy Act, but he should be a medical man who has some knowledge of mental disorders.

6693. Pause a moment there, Sir Cecil, remember the first part of your suggestion. We appreciate that he should be a person conversant with the Acts; but surely it is not desirable that he should be a medical man, because he is a person who is to proceed upon medical evidence which is adduced to him. Is it desirable that the justice himself should have his own professional equipment?—There are many doctors who are justices.

6694. I should have thought it was desirable there should not be a third doctor in the matter, but there should be rather a person, I will not say not affected by medical predispositions of any sort, but simply representing the judicial element, and who would proceed upon the evidence of the medical practitioner?—Yes, and I think the patient ought to be seen by the justice; he is giving the order for reception.

17 December, 1924.]

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6695. It was the addendum to your observation that I was venturing to question, the desirability of the justice himself being a doctor?—Perhaps I want to make it too safe for the patient. What the public object to is certification, of course.

6696. Improper certification?—Yes, improper certification, and I think we should use every means in our power to see that the certification is proper.

6697. Surely. The only comment I would make is that I do not, as at present advised, think it would be judicious that the judicial authority should have a medical qualification, because I think it is much better that he should have a legal qualification, and be able to weigh the evidence of other persons in the shape of the medical certificates?—Yes, I think those should be read very carefully.

6698. Earl Russell: If you appreciate the point the Chairman is making, he wants the justice to act as a judge and not as a witness?—Of course the judicial order is not in a sense a proper judicial order, is it? Because after the justice has given the order the friends of the patient can tear it up, and they need not bring the patient to the asylum at all. Therefore it is an authorisation to us to receive the patient.

6699. Chairman: That is perfectly true. Still it is judicial in this sense that the judicial authority in the case of the private patient is the representative of the outside public?—Yes.

6700. He is the person who is the vehicle, so to speak, of the view of the public upon the case, and we have had evidence from people who do this work that they occasionally do not accept the medical evidence before them on the certificates; they have seen the patient and they say: "We want more information"—so that it is not entirely a formality?—No, it is not a formality.

6701. You would like it to be much less of a formality by requiring the justice or the judicial authority actually to see the patient as a layman as distinct from a doctor, to consider the case on its merits with the assistance of the information derived from the medical certificate, and with the right to call for the doctor to explain it to him?—That is what I should like to see.

6702. Of course, in Scotland it is done by the sheriff, who is a professional man?—Yes, and the order is really a judicial order in the proper sense there.

6703. One has to remember that the whole judicial system of Scotland is rather different; the justice of the peace does not function in Scotland to anything like the same extent as he does in England. We are really dealing with a different system?—Of course, often in getting certificates, as you know in practice the justice says, "Well, am I right in signing this?" You cannot expect them to know the complicated sections of the Act and to go through all these papers.

6704. Earl Russell: Are they not advised by their clerk when they are engaged on this duty?—No. Of course, my point in bringing that up is to make the reception of the patient, I might say, rather difficult. The receiving institution has nothing whatever to do with obtaining the reception order.

6705. Chairman: No; that has all preceded the arrival of the patient at your institution. You are for the moment criticising the preliminaries of reception?—Yes.

6706. You are criticising it from the point of view of the adequacy of the machinery?—Yes.

6707. And that is, of course, a matter with which we are deeply concerned, because we are concerned with the safeguards against improper detention. We should like to know whether in point of fact you have found that the present method, whether good or bad, has resulted in persons being brought into your institution who should never have been there; because the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it, and one would like to know whether the system has resulted in persons arriving at your institution with an authorisation for their reception who, in your view as a layman like ourselves, should not have been there. Has that case ever occurred?—It has once or twice; my doctors have refused to receive a patient. It may have been a mistake in diagnosis. For instance, you get a patient with delirium tremens, and a practitioner might mix it up with insanity for the time.

6708. But I would like to pursue that topic for a moment. You say on one or two occasions your medical superintendent has been of opinion that the case was not appropriate?—Not my present medical superintendent: I am speaking of the one I had before; he asked me to go and see a patient with him because he had doubts, and, of course, we did not receive the patient.

6709. Not at all?—No. He was alcoholic—I mean he showed it. That happens at times, of course.

6710. But suppose a person arrives with due authorisation, and the reception order is addressed to your institution. Are you not bound to receive him?—I do not think so.

6711. I would have thought you would have received him, and then taken advantage of the various provisions which are contained in the Act for bringing about his discharge?—Yes—tell the friends, "You had better take him home and nurse him."

6712. That is to say, really he is discharged?—Really, yes.

6713. Of course, one has to remember this, that these states of mind may be very transitory?—Very.

6714. Therefore the medical practitioners who have examined the patient and certified his insanity may have seen the patient at a time when all would agree he was insane?—Quite so; that does happen very often.

6715. But when the patient arrives at your institution possibly two or three days after the patient has been seen by the medical practitioner, he may have recovered his balance and you may say the man is perfectly sane. That is no reflection on the issuing of the certificate?—No; I do not wish to make the least reflection on the doctor's certificate. He gives a certificate at the time he sees the patient, and no doubt the patient is really insane.

6716. That is not a reflection on the existing code, because the certification was perfectly proper, but it was spent in this sense, that the patient had recovered, and discharge is the proper remedy for that?—Yes, but with regard to that reception order, I think the person signing it should be a competent man, and should personally see the patient. I want to insist on that.

6717. The seeing of the patient could be readily achieved by making that obligatory. Then the mental competency of the justice or judge is a matter which no man can control?—No, but do not you think he should get into contact with the doctor, and not rely solely upon the medical certificate? We must remember we are taking away the man's liberty in a way.

6718. That is what we fully recognise.—It is only a suggestion on my part.

6720. I do not want to be critical of your suggestions; but if that was a rate-aided case, then the only case you can recall which has occasioned you doubt is a case where the justice saw the patient?—Yes, it is odd.

6721. Does it not rather reflect upon your suggestion?—No, I do not think so; it is a matter of principle.

17 December, 1924.]

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6722. Of course, one recognises this, that it may be desirable to have safeguards which may be superfluous, if they are none the less reassuring to the public, if one may so put it?—Yes.

6723. I think that takes us through the first group of your suggestions?—With the exception of the urgency order.

6724. What have you to say with regard to the urgency order which at present may be granted?—Lord Halsbury in re Cathcart's case in 1893, 1 Chancery, 475, laid down there that the urgency order should be used only where instant intervention is required. As you know, Section 11 is the urgency order. Under the section an urgency order can be granted where it is expedient, or in the public interest, that a person be detained. It can be signed before or after the medical certificate. It remains in force for seven days—and it must have subjoined a statement of particulars.

6726. What is your criticism of that procedure? What is wrong with that?—I have never known a case come in on an urgency order that would not, if they had had the time, have got the proper certificates; I must say that.

6729. I see, you are really saying that it is being put to a purpose other than the purpose which Lord Halsbury thought it was designed to meet?—Yes, I think so; that is my only criticism on that.

6730. You have, I see, a suggestion that in place of the urgency order there should be a provisional order of short duration?—Yes, where there is no certificate, not to certify the patient; a provisional order of three days, which could be extended.

6731. Of course, that trenches upon a very much larger matter which we have under consideration, and that is the provision of a period of observation which should intervene between the case first coming to the notice of the authorities, and ultimate certification, or discharge, as the case may be. We have had a considerable amount of evidence already and shall have more, no doubt, upon that topic. Would you be disposed to favour such a system whereby patients should be for a time under observation with a limited control by a provisional certificate of some sort, pending a complete diagnosis of their case?—I should very much agree to that.

6732. Do you find in your own experience that many of your patients recover within a short period of their admission?—It is according to the class of case.

6733. Perhaps you might help us there; it is of interest to us. A period of time for observation may have to be suggested. That might be to some extent controlled in our minds by the time which in the experience of persons like yourself short cases take to recover. Have you any statistics which would tell us the periods of detention in your institution?—I have no statistics; only a general idea, of course.

6734. Let me put it to you quite colloquially: How many of your patients stay more than a month? How many go out within a month?—Not many.

6735. There are some cases?—Some, yes.

6736. Recovered within the month?—Recovered, yes, but very few. It is not sufficient time, of course, to give a case; a case of acute mania should have 16 weeks' treatment. We find after 16 weeks that the patient is very much better—practically recovered.

6737. But you do have some cases actually which are discharged recovered within a month of their reception?—We have had those cases, but they are few.

6739. In such a case, therefore, if the patient had been under treatment for a month under some provisional arrangement, the result in that case would be that he would never have been certified at all?—Quite so, and that would be the great value of that.

6740. Then you have some observations on the discharge of patients. Will you tell us what you can on that subject?—Of course, you know the sections, viz., 49 and 72 to 83. Section 49 is a provision for any person to apply to have patients examined by two medical practitioners, and the Board of Control may order discharge, but they have a discretion under that section.

6741. Is any use made of that section?—It has been used in one case.

6742. What happened in that case as the result of the two medical practitioners' examination?—The lady was sent on trial.

6743. And ultimately discharged?—And ultimately discharged, but I might say before that took place her discharge was under consideration independently of that.

6744. Then Sections 72 to 83.—Section 72 gives the petitioner the right to demand the patient's discharge. Section 73 deals with the rate-aided patients, the authority liable for their maintenance. Section 74 gives a restriction on discharge.

6745. The barring certificate?—Yes, and then two members of the Board of Control can discharge, and three visitors of the asylum can discharge.

6746. But you may take it we know the system. What I was rather concerned with was to know whether you have any comments or criticisms to make upon the Act?—Except to say that from the foregoing, one can see that the illegal detention of a patient or an undue detention of a sane person is an impracticability.

6747. Your conclusion is that the existing code adequately safeguards the patients in the matter of discharge?—Quite so. There are so many people who can discharge them. Then there are the letter writing facilities they all have, which you went into yesterday.

6748. May I take it that your evidence and your experience, although you are not a medical man, on the administrative side, coincides with the evidence we had yesterday?—Yes, to a great degree. Speaking of the recoveries, I might say here that my recovery rate is pretty good.

6749. Could you give it us in a percentage to admissions?—Yes, I could. In the year 1923 the total percentage of recoveries, that is as compared with direct admissions—

17 December, 1924.]

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6750. That is to say, eliminating transfers?—Yes, of course, those are generally of a chronic nature; the percentage was 31·64. I worked out my average discharges for 10 years, 1914 to 1923, and the percentage came to 37 per cent., nearly 40 per cent. of recoveries from the direct admissions.

6751. That is very good?—It is.

6754. What is the objection to that?—The patient can say to you afterwards, "Yes, you got me here as a voluntary boarder, and you certify me and detain me." It is not a nice thing.

6755. It is noticeable in the code that your class of institution, the licensed house, is the one with regard to which there is express power to receive voluntary patients. As regards the registered hospital it seems to be left to some extent to implication. But if you look at Section 229 express provision is made for the case of patients desirous of voluntarily submitting to treatment?—Yes, and I think if we go on with the receiving of voluntary boarders I must put apart a special villa or house for such patients where they can be treated really as incipient cases.

6756. Your view seems to me to be that this provision with regard to voluntary patients might be superseded by, or merged in, some more general provision for the treatment of incipient patients without certification?—Yes.

6757. Have you studied the provisions of Lord Onslow's Mental Treatment Bill?—No.

6759. Earl Russell: Tell me what you mean by "insist"? If you refused to do it, would they proceed against you under Section 315—is that what you are afraid of? You say the Commissioners insist on your certifying?—They insist on our certifying or discharging, because he is not a person capable of being a voluntary boarder.

6760. And there is no provision for anyone else to give consent, you mean?—Yes.

6761. Chairman: You first of all put forward an objection which I may call a sentimental but none the less important objection, that the voluntary boarder may be deterred from going to your institution by the suggestion that if you go there as a voluntary boarder you will find yourself certified sooner or later; and that you think would be a deterrent to persons from entering the portals of your institution. That is quite an important point to keep in mind, but let us look at it also from the administrative point of view. Do you find any embarrassment in having in your institution two classes of patients, one class of patient over whom you have complete control and whose destiny for the moment is in your hands, and another class who are in the position of saying, "We are here as guests, and we can go when we please, and we shall go now if we want"? Do you find any embarrassment administratively from the two classes being under the one roof?—Not so much, because we put the voluntary boarders with our very best class of patients.

6762. Being a voluntary boarder one must assume he is not a violent case?—Yes, but since that recent case we have had many more applications for voluntary boarders, simply because doctors will not certify, I suppose.

6764. That is an interesting consequence of the case?—Yes, I always ask on the 'phone, for my doctors do, whether the case is really certifiable.

6765. Is that increase all consequent upon this recent case?—Yes, I had a doctor the other morning tell me on the 'phone that he would not certify a case for £20,000.

6766. Of course that is exceedingly unfortunate, if the existing state of the law is such as to deter doctors from certifying cases which ought to be certified?—Quite so.

6767. And has the consequence of that been in your experience that patients are reaching you under the guise of voluntary patients who would normally have reached you as certified patients?—Quite so, and I do not like the practice of having a patient certified in the institution, although perhaps it is advisable for him to be so.

6768. You do not want it associated with your institution, as I can understand. Again this objection would appear to be surmountable by the idea of the provisional period or observation period which should intervene before final certification?—Yes; that is a great point, I think.

6770. And where can he be better catered for than in institutions such as yours?—Of course the question there is what is a voluntary boarder? What is his mental state? I have two or three ladies who are voluntary boarders who know all about themselves and why they are there. If you asked them to go home they would not go; they prefer to be with me. Under those circumstances I think the voluntary boarder system is all right, but to-day after a recent case we are getting patients who are not desirable as voluntary boarders.

6771. That seems to me to indicate an abuse of the voluntary system rather than an attack upon the voluntary system as properly administered?—Yes, perhaps so.

knows what he is signing, and also knows that he can leave by giving 24 hours' notice to the medical superintendent.

6773. That is the typical voluntary boarder?—That is the typical one, yes. We have 18 now, and they are very nice people indeed and give us no bother.

6774. Your criticism is rather against the voluntary system being used as a substitute for the more regular system?—It is really. It is not that I want to increase the number of insane people. I want to have a safeguard.

6775. Earl Russell: Would you also be against it in the case of rate-aided institutions for old chronic cases which are quite harmless?—No, I would agree there, strongly, because those institutions have, no doubt, certain wards where the patients would be very happy and contented.

6776. Chairman: Do you have classification to any extent in your institution?—Yes, a good deal of classification, because we have a number of different houses where we can classify them.

6777. And no doubt you would approve of classification as far as possible?—As much as is possible.

6778. Is there anything in the point that classification may be carried too far? Suppose you classify out all the melancholic cases, so to speak, and congregate them all in one of your detached villas, I should imagine it would be a most depressing place?—Yes, most undesirable; we do not classify to that great extent.

6779. What is the principle of your classification; what guides you in arranging the residences of your patients?—Whether a patient is destructive or violent or perhaps the language is rather undesirable, and so on; that is one classification.

6780. Are they all put together?—Not all of them.

6781. Then I should say the last state would be worse than the first if you had an institution entirely composed of raving maniacs?—But you must understand that these cases are recurrent, and although they may be in a refractory ward one month, the next three months they are in the very best ladies' wards, and quite quiet and go out into the town.

6782. Do you find any trouble in letting patients out on short leave to the town?—We very seldom find any trouble whatever. Of course they do their own shopping.

6783. Do they go alone?—No, generally in twos. I encourage that, because it gives a patient a little responsibility to look after another; that is why we can get so many out.

6784. Are they selected for that privilege?—Yes. They are really patients who are either of a chronic nature of long standing or convalescent patients, patients who are really getting better.

6785. You speak of them shopping, and so on; have they pocket money with them?—Yes, they have money, and they can drive very hard bargains, I am given to understand, in the town.

6786. Then do you find that that contact with the outer world is in itself a help towards recovering mental balance?—Yes, I do; and also it is a great help in doing away with much of the inevitable monotony in an institution. I think that system of allowing them to go into the town and country unattended should be extended as much as possible.

6787. You want, I suppose, to reproduce in your institution, as far as may be, the ordinary normal life of a citizen, subject only to that measure of control which is necessary in the interests of the patients?—That has been my object the whole time.

6788. You provide outdoor occupation, I suppose, for some of your patients?—Yes, in the gardens, a little carpentry, painting, and so on.

6789. I suppose some of them will have hobbies?—Yes.

6790. And with regard to recreation, do you provide for entertainments?—We have an entertainment room, of course; it is, I suppose, the largest room in Salisbury; we have weekly dances and entertainments. I have installed an up-to-date cinema so that they can have cinematograph shows. Of course we have our chapel where they have four services a week, two Sunday services and two weekday services. There are the billiard rooms and they play cards, tennis, badminton and so on.

6791. Then, finally, do you find that the relatives of patients under your charge take an interest in them? They are, as you know, under an obligation to visit?—Yes, or someone appointed by them.

6792. Is that done in practice?—It is generally, but not in all cases.

6793. Do you find that some people are neglected by their relatives?—No, not neglected at all. If a patient has been there 50 years, all his friends are dead, probably. For instance, I have got patients now, paid for by the Army authorities, who have no friends. I have a captain there, of course I get his money from the Army authorities; he has no friends except ourselves; we are his friends.

6794. Now take those who have relatives: Have they facilities for visiting?—Yes.

6795. Do they come about the place much?—Yes, every day they can come. I do not encourage visiting on Sunday, because of course there are the chapel services and the nurses want a little time, but if anyone does come on Sunday they can always see the patients.

6798. Chairman: Of course, one knows the principle of that; pecuniary interest is the disabling factor?—Yes.

6799. One can appreciate your point that insecurity of tenure naturally discourages you from expenditure which might otherwise be beneficial?—Quite so.

6800. Earl Russell: You are now in exactly the position of a public-house before the Balfour Act?—Yes. In a recent case learned counsel, in order to create an atmosphere, took us back to the Middle Ages and spoke about mad-houses and keepers. Well, doctors and attendants and others object to being called keepers; we are not keepers. The public read these things and they do not understand the institution.

Chairman: I think we appreciate that.

6801. Mr. Micklem: One other point with regard to the visitors that you have: Are they always members of the Bench—justices?—Yes, they are chosen out of their body.

17 December, 1924.]

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6802. And part of their body is selected year by year?—Selected year by year to visit the institution.

6803. Should you say that their inspections are fully and properly conducted?—Yes, I think they are. They go through the whole place and the patients can see them and talk to them.

6804. Are they your only visitors? You have the Commissioners twice a year?—Yes.

6805. Then the justices?—Yes, the justices; and then, of course, the Lord Chancellor's Visitor comes down at times; he comes to see special patients, but he generally has a look round. Then we have visits from different people as a matter of interest, people who would like to see an asylum, for instance.

6806. Do you think the magistrates who are appointed have the capacity to carry out the inspection properly?—Yes, I do; and they know the place so well.

6807. You seem to doubt the competency of magistrates to consider the certificates of a doctor in the case of certification, but you have no doubt of their competency, I suppose, as inspectors?—They are not inspectors in the ordinary sense that they come round and find fault and that sort of thing, you know. They know the place.

6808. Their duties are very fully set out in Section 194?—I think they all realise their duties.

6809. They never appoint anybody except of their own number—no outside visitor?—No, no outside visitors, except the medical visitors, of course.

6810. Do they in fact make entries in the books of what they have seen?—Yes, they make entries and also of any private interviews they have given and whether they consider anyone has improved or otherwise.

6811. Would the magistrates when they make their visitation actually see all the patients in your place?—Perhaps not, because some of them would be out walking and some would be engaged on work.

6812. Would they make a point of seeing all the persons that were on the premises?—Not every one; they would not make that point; they would not have a book and check up the numbers.

6813. Chairman: You observe that their instruction is to see every patient; that is sub-clause (b)?—Yes.

6814. Mr. Mickle: That would be almost impossible, I suppose?—It would be, really.

6816. Chairman: "Restraint," of course, is a technical term in this matter; it means mechanical restraint?—Yes.

6817. Miss Madeleine Symons: Sir Cecil, you told us that you were in favour of extending the two medical certificates to rate-aided patients?—Yes.

6818. Do you think that one of those certificates should be by a doctor with specialist knowledge in mental disorders, or are you quite satisfied with the present position?—It would be better for one to have specialist knowledge, but I do not think it would be possible to get him for all rate-aided cases. Of course, it would be better to have a specialist, but it would be difficult in country districts and also in some big towns. I think one of the two men should be the patient's medical attendant, as in the case, of course, of a private patient. One of the certificates given is by the usual medical attendant, and, if it is not so given, the reason has to be stated in the certificate.

6819. But about the other point you do not feel very strongly and you think there might be difficulty?—I think there might be difficulty in getting a man well versed in mental disorders, because such men are so few, unfortunately. Of course, every doctor knows a good deal about mental disorders, naturally, but he is not what one may call a specialist.

6820. Then you told us that there was a good deal of latitude with regard to hours in your institution?—Yes.

6821. I think it would be interesting if you could tell us how you arrange the hours of your nursing staff?—They are on duty most of the day, you know; they get off at times; they arrange it among themselves a good deal. I have no relays like they have in the big county asylums.

6822. How many hours a week do they work?—About eight hours a day, perhaps more sometimes, sometimes less. They get their leave; two or three times a week they get leave to go out into the town on visits. That is more a question for my medical superintendent—the details of the leave.

6823. Then could you give us any idea of the cost of food per head per week?—I am afraid I could not. I have not gone into that matter—the actual cost of maintenance. Naturally, a good deal of what are called profits have to go back into the institution to keep it up to date, and so on.

6824. I was only thinking that the actual cost of food would be rather interesting for the purpose of comparison?—I am sorry, but I have not got it.

6825. Mr. Snell: Sir Cecil, I was not quite clear about what you meant when you said that patients might desire to have interviews with the Commissioners, but these were not granted in all cases?—No. I think you must have misunderstood me.

6826. Chairman: I do not think Sir Cecil said that?—All patients who desire an interview get it.

6827. Mr. Snell: That was an earlier statement. A later statement appeared to me to be that there were some cases that were fairly well known and if they made requests for interviews, those requests were not always acceded to?—They are always acceded to.

6828. I am glad to have that cleared up?—I do not say the interview would last quite so long if they had had 20 previous interviews with the Commissioners; they do not last quite so long as a first interview.

Chairman: Sir Cecil did say that people who asked for interviews were very often the same people over and over again. That rather left in one's mind the impression that if they did ask over and over again they ceased to get an interview.

Witness: They always get an interview.

6829. Mr. Snell: Then with regard to the case you mentioned of the learned judge in a recent case appearing to hold that leave of absence during a period really de-certified a patient, how would that theory operate if it were made effective? Would it not really tend to restrict the amount of leave given?—It would, I think.

6830. The authorities would be afraid?—Because it would mean having the patient re-certified.

6831. I want just to ask one question about the doctors. You have three male and one female doctor, I understand?—Yes.

6832. Are all those mental doctors, or is one of them what one might call an experienced general practitioner?—They are all mental doctors. The lady doctor is a newly qualified doctor, and therefore she is really a general practitioner; they have all been general practitioners.

6833. We must assume that the mental doctor is to some extent a general practitioner?—Yes.

6834. On the point of voluntary boarders, are they all actually suffering, or are they just fearful of suffering when they come to you?—Both, I consider. Some are afraid of getting a breakdown and some, of course, are suffering from a breakdown.

6835. There is no tendency to use the institution just as a fairly cheap boarding-house, is there?—No. I do not want it looked at in that light, although it is.

6836. They are all people who ought to live there?—Yes.

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6837. But in the case of an aged person who was not any longer mentally strong and had a little money, would a person of that kind be received as a voluntary boarder?—Yes, if so requested.

6838. Then there was the point of patients going into town to shop, and so on. Do they at all shrink from going shopping and appearing to advertise themselves?—Not a bit. No one knows they are patients, you know; why should they? Certain shopkeepers do, because the patients give the address of the institution.

6839. Chairman: I was going to say that they may have things sent home to the institution?—Yes, they do. Sometimes we have to stop ladies ordering so much because they overrun their income.

6840. Mr. Snell: There is no shrinking on the part of the patient. You do not, as it were, push him into the town?—No. They all ask for that privilege of parole.

6841. Just one last question. Have there been transfers of ex-soldiers from the pauper class owing to the altered rule of the late Government?—Yes, I have got 150.

6842. 150 have already been transferred?—Yes, they were not paupers when they came to us.

6843. But they may have been treated previously?—They had previously been treated in other institutions and two or three times over; in fact, you might look upon many of them as being really chronic cases.

6844. Mrs. Mathew: Were the ex-service patients being treated in rate-aided institutions before that?—Yes, in many of the rate-aided institutions, and they have come to me on a private basis; I treat them as private patients.

6845. With regard to the interview between the justice and the doctor, I am afraid I did not quite catch your meaning on that point. Do you attach much value to an interview between the certifying justice and the certifying doctor?—I think it would give the certifying justice some idea of the responsibility which he was assuming in making the reception order. My point was that the reception order is granted rather too freely, I think. That is my only point.

6846. Have you any views as to observation without certification? What length of time would you suggest, or would you leave that to your medical superintendent?—I would, yes, but of course that would depend a great deal upon the class of the case. It is such a difficult thing to define incipient insanity. The cases we get sent to us of course are not incipient in any way; as a rule they are very badly mentally afflicted at the time, otherwise the reception order would not have been given.

6847. Have you children in your institution?—No, no children.

6848. You never have them?—When I used to take public patients I had one or two children.

6849. About what age were they?—I think one was about 14 and the other 16.

6850. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You said, Sir Cecil, that the recent action which has been brought had made doctors very loth to put themselves in danger of having to pay damages, and so on?—I think doctors find that, yes.

6851. That, I suppose, might act deleteriously to the interests of the general population, by making it difficult to get people under any kind of control before they had gone so far that curative measures do not have a proper chance?—That is a question really for the doctors, is it not? I know it is tending that way by the number of applications we get to receive voluntary boarders.

6852. The remedy with regard to the position that doctors are being put in is that the justice should be put in some position of responsibility, as is the doctor?—It is a curious thing that if anyone is sued after a patient has recovered it is the doctor, and not the magistrate who gave the reception order; he is never called as a co-defendant with the doctor in any case I have ever known.

6853. Chairman: I would like before you leave us just to take up one answer you gave to Mrs.

Mathew. You expressed the view that reception orders were granted too freely. Do you say that as a criticism of the code as it stands, or do you say from your own experience that you have found persons reaching your institution who should not have been certified; because the two things are different, you know? There may be a theoretical criticism of the code or you may say "My own experience has shown me that people are being certified who ought not to be." Now which is it?—It is neither really.

6854. If it is neither, what is the third point?—I think the point was that these reception orders are signed and the person signing them does not go into the medical certificate sufficiently, nor does he know the clauses of the Act relating to the reception of a patient. That is the only point.

6855. The reason why I am taking it up again is that this is a very important matter, and what I want to get at is this: Have you yourself had any experience of the working of this part of the code? I thought the patients had all passed through that stage before they reached you?—Yes, I am only criticising the order for reception.

6856. If I may put the question without offence, how do you know that the justices are not sufficiently familiar with the code, or how do you know they do not take sufficiently into account the contents of the medical certificate. Is that surmise or founded upon actual experience?—Upon actual experience, because we have often to get patients certified at the institution, and then, of course, my clerk takes the papers to the justice, who is asked to sign.

6857. We are much concerned with the actual experience of the people who have seen the thing working. Your experience of how certification takes place is derived from those cases which, having reached you as voluntary patients, have become certified in your hands?—Yes.

6858. And in those cases have you yourself seen the process of certification being carried out?—No, but I know of it, of course. I have never taken papers myself; my clerk has. The justices are a little concerned about it; they say, "Am I right in signing it?" My clerk points out to them, "There are the medical certificates; you had better read those," and on those certificates the justice gives the reception order. Therefore, the onus of certification comes wholly on the doctor.

6859. It is a case, of course, of a person who has a statutory duty to perform, as a Judge has, on affidavits of two doctors?—Yes.

6860. Do you think the safeguard would be increased by the doctors being personally called to support or to explain their affidavits? You would be putting a very considerable burden on the doctors?—No, not to explain. My recommendation was that the justice signing the order should personally see the patient, as another safeguard to reception.

6861. That can be readily given effect to, I think, but the further suggestion you made was that the affidavits of the doctors should be, so to speak, supported by their personal presence. Do you regard that as of importance?—No, not as of great importance. You see in the certificate it says "facts indicating insanity."

6862. There are two classes of facts; those he has observed himself and those he has ascertained from others?—I think a statement of the facts showing why you advise the making of a reception order would be much better than facts indicating insanity.

6863. Of course, as you know, those certificates come under observation within a short period by the Board of Control, and if they are found to be imperfect in any way they are sent back?—Yes. I only mentioned that in passing.

Mr. Cremllyn (representing the National Society for Lunacy Reform): May I put a question through you, Sir? With regard to the voluntary boarder, would you ask Sir Cecil whether he stated that he had only two voluntary boarders until the Harnett case, and that, as a result of the Harnett case, they had increased, I think he said, to 18?

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6864. Chairman: Is that so, Sir Cecil?—There has been a tendency to increase since I reconstituted the institution and made it a purely private place.

6865. Is that unrelated to the Harnett case?—It is unrelated; but since the Harnett case we have found some few more. It may be a coincidence.

6866. It may be post hoc but not propter hoc?—Yes.

6867. It would be interesting to know to what extent there had been a change since the Harnett case. Have you got the actual statistics? We will not say what the causation is, but can you tell us how many were in your institution before that decision and how many there are now of this class? You must have the means of telling us that.

Mr. Cremllyn: I am quite sure Sir Cecil wants to be fair, but in the Report of the Board of Control it appears that in October, 1923—that is before the Harnett case—he had 20, and to-day he has 18.

6868. Chairman: Well, Sir Cecil, what do you say to those figures?—We may have 28, you know, because voluntary boarders come and go. You cannot tell from the number on any one specified day.

Chairman: What page is that, Mr. Cremllyn?

Mr. Cremllyn: It is page 339 of the 10th Annual Report.

Chairman: Of course, we must take the date. I see this is a report of the entries in your books on the 26th October, 1923?

Witness: Yes.

6869. At that time there were on your books 7 males and 13 females as voluntary boarders—that is 20 in all. Can you tell us what the date of the Harnett case was?

Mr. Cremllyn: In March of this year, Sir.

6870. Chairman (to the Witness): You told us you had 18 just now?—Yes, and, of course, that may be reduced in a week to 10. You cannot take the number on any specified date to indicate the applications that we have for voluntary boarders. They can go when they like.

6871. Surely, this point is rather destroyed if, in point of fact, before the Harnett case you had as many as 20, and now you may have as few as 18?—I do not think so.

6872. Unless you have more applications?—The number of voluntary boarders at one specified date compared with another is no criterion of the admission of voluntary boarders throughout the year.

6873. I follow that taking a particular date will not help you, but you gave us to understand that you had about two in your institution before the Harnett case, and about 18 is what we would find since. Is that so?—Yes, about 18; sometimes it is more and sometimes less.

6874. If I had gone there on the 26th October, 1923, I would have found 20?—Yes.

6875. Do you say that was an accidentally large number?—Yes, I think so.

6876. I think we had better bring this to a point. It is not fair to ask you for figures on recollection. Would you be good enough to furnish us with the number of voluntary patients in your institution for two years back, at quarterly intervals or something of that sort, the actual numbers?—Yes, I will let you have those *figures.

6877. That would give us a year before the Harnett case; we have not had a complete year since, but you could bring it down to date. You may start on the 1st January, 1923, and give us, say, at quarterly intervals, the numbers to be found in your institution to date?—Yes.

Mr. Cremllyn: I do not want to stress the point.

6878. Chairman: I think it is a useful contribution, because this Report, if I may say so, is inconsistent with the figures given. We are very much concerned with the effect of this case upon the certifying of patients, because that is one of the reasons why we have been appointed. Your evidence struck us as being rather remarkable, that this case was tending to increase the number of voluntary patients, and we must check your figures with what appears in the Report?—Yes. There was one little point I should like to mention about that case with regard to the continuation order. As you know, the reception order remains in force for a year, after which it has to be continued. There was some confusion of thought in that case regarding the continuation order. The learned Judge, as you know, looked upon that as a mere act of legal machinery.

6879. Yet it is a re-certification?—Yes, it is a re-certification of the patient.

Earl Russell: That is what the House of Lords is going to try.

Chairman: We must not comment in public upon a case which is still pending.

Witness: I am sorry; I had forgotten that.

Mr. Cremllyn: If I am not trespassing too much, may I put just one or two more questions?

Chairman: Certainly.

Mr. Cremllyn: Sir Cecil said that if he was to take voluntary patients he would like to have a separate lodge for them. Would you ask him, Sir, whether his reason for that is that he thinks that if anybody had incipient lunacy or was on the border line, they might be affected by mixing with the other patients?

6880. Chairman: What do think of that, Sir Cecil? Should voluntary incipient cases really be treated apart from others, and if so, why?—Of course, that is really a medical question, is it not, but I think the incipient cases should be treated apart from the ordinary inmates of the institution.

Chairman: You are quite right to say that it is rather a medical question. (To Mr. Cremllyn): We have two medical gentlemen coming to-day who will deal with licensed houses. May we put the question to them?

Mr. Cremllyn: If you please, Sir. Perhaps you would be good enough to ask this question, which is not a medical question. Did I understand Sir Cecil to say that, as a fact, in the institution he knows so well the Commissioners did actually see every patient?

Witness: Except those, of course, absent on leave or on trial.

6881. Chairman: With regard to visiting justices, you rather indicated that they did not and could not see every patient?—No, unless we had all the patients lined up for them to count them up, and so on. They have the opportunity to see every patient.

6882. But is there a distinction between what we may call the thoroughness of the justices' visit and the Commissioners' visit?—Yes, the Commissioners of the Board of Control are more thorough because they have every patient's name in a book and opposite the name his mental symptoms; and they see every patient, but that is no part of the visiting justices' duty; they are not mental experts.

6884. We prefer to take your own experience and the result of that seems to be this, that if you have a large institution beyond a certain number of patients it is at least difficult for the justices, who are persons giving their services for nothing, to visit every patient and so fulfil the statutory obligation incumbent upon them. You say that is a difficulty?—It is a difficulty.

Mr. Cremllyn: The only point was this: I understood Sir Cecil to say, in answer to one of the members of the Commission, Sir, that it was impossible for the Commissioners to see everyone.

* See Appendix XX.

17 December, 1924.]

Sir CECIL CHUBB, Bart., LL.B.

6885. Chairman: I think not. Will you clear that up though, Sir Cecil? I thought Mr. Snell brought out that the Commissioners did in point of fact see everyone?—The Commissioners put in their report that they have seen every patient.

6886. It is not what they put in their report, it is what they do?—They do see every patient.

Mr. Cremllyn: Perhaps you would put this question, Sir. How long do the Commissioners spend at his place? There are 600 patients there; how long do the Commissioners stay?

Witness: There are 500 patients. The Commissioners are there two days.

6887. Chairman: How long on each day?—From 10 in the morning to sometimes 6 and 7 at night.

Chairman: I think we have got the information now.

Mr. Cremllyn: One other point with reference to staff. I understood that 65 was the staff to 600 odd patients.

Witness: 500 patients.

Mr. Cremllyn: How many of those staff are engaged on the 300 acres outside the institution—I mean there is a farm of 300 acres?

Witness: None of that number.

Mr. Cremllyn: Does Sir Cecil know that in the public hospitals the staffs are much larger than that—in many of them. Take "The Retreat," at York, for instance—157 patients, 65 staff.

Witness: I might answer that question in this way: The average cost of maintenance in "The Retreat" at York is £5 9s. 3d. a week. My average takings per patient are £2 14s. 6d. only. I should

(After a short adjournment.)

Dr. FRANK FAWSETT, M.B., called and examined.

6892. Chairman: Dr. Frank Fawsett, you are a medical practitioner with the qualification of Bachelor of Medicine?—Bachelor of Medicine and Bachelor of Surgery, the usual degrees.

6893. And are you a medical visitor to licensed houses appointed under Section 177 of the Lunacy Act?—Yes.

6894. Does that section require the justices of every county and quarter sessions borough not within the immediate jurisdiction of the Commissioners, whether there is a licensed house within the county or not, to appoint three or more justices, and also one or more medical practitioners, to act as visitors of licensed houses within their county or borough?—Yes.

6895. And you are, I understand, a gentleman who has been selected for appointment as a medical practitioner to act as visitor of licensed houses, within what district?—The East Sussex district.

6896. When were you first appointed as such?—In 1891.

6897. Then you have had 33 years' experience?—Yes.

6898. Have you been regularly re-appointed?—Every year.

6899. Will you tell us what are your duties as visitor?—I have to pay visits quarterly, or, more accurately, four times a year with the visiting justices. I also have to pay special visits at the expiration of a month after a patient recently certified has been received into one of the licensed houses.

6900. In the area for which you are appointed how many licensed houses are there?—Three.

6901. Is your appointment limited to visiting those licensed houses within the area?—Yes.

6902. So that the three licensed houses you refer to are the three you visit?—That is so.

6903. Might we have their names?—Ticehurst House, St. George's Retreat, Periteau House, Winchelsea.

6904. Will you tell us what the size of these houses is?—Ticehurst House is licensed for 92 patients, of whom 43 are males and 49 females. St. George's Retreat is licensed for 75, all females. Periteau House is a small place, only licensed for five.

like to say this also, that the patients in the "Old Manor" are treated just as kindly and just as well as those in "The Retreat" at York, and my recovery rate is just as high, if not higher.

6888. Chairman: The proportions vary in different institutions, as we know?—Of course they do, and in my institution the patients are more or less of a chronic nature. I do not get the recent admissions that you get in a London asylum.

6889. The number of attendants will have to depend to some extent upon the class of cases you may have. For some cases you may require three attendants to one patient?—Quite, and one attendant or nurse could perhaps manage 20 patients, according to the nature of the case.

Mr. Cremllyn: I understood that Sir Cecil told us that the recovery rate of his patients was 37 per cent.

Witness: That is so.

Mr. Cremllyn: If they are chronic, that is rather high.

Witness: It is, but I took it on the direct admissions. When you are getting the recovery rate out, you see on the Board of Control Report, page 7, the recovery rate is based on the direct admissions.

6890. Chairman: It all depends upon what your percentage is based. It is not the percentage of the actual residents in the institution; it is on the numbers admitted?—Yes.

6891. You will send us the figures about the voluntary patients, will you?—Yes, certainly.

Chairman: Thank you, we are very much obliged to you.

6905. Now with regard to the four visits which you have to pay every year with the visiting justices, will you tell us what you actually do?—When we get to the place, we first have all certificates and papers connected with every patient who has been admitted since our last visit.

6906. Are the visits announced beforehand?—No.

6908. Then what do you do?—We examine all those papers, read the certificates and the reception orders, or the orders for transfer, and we have also produced a list giving every patient in the establishment. That list is in the form of a book, arranged alphabetically, a, b, c, and so on, and opposite the names are four columns for the four visits. Before going round, we also have the register of admissions, one of the books, to see the entries of the new patients, and see that they have been entered in the list of patients. I then take the book myself, the list of patients, and we go round the establishment, seeing each patient as we come to them. As each patient is seen I tick them off, a, b, c, d, first, second, third, or fourth visit. Every patient has the opportunity of making any complaint; any patient who wishes it is given a private interview, everyone without exception. When we have been round all the establishment, or the various villas connected with it, I then take the list and go through it with the medical officer, if he is there, or the responsible person who has gone round with us. Of course, there are a few whom I have not ticked off, they have got to account for them—absent on leave, absence on trial, or out for the day; of course, those we cannot see, but with the exception of those, we see every patient in residence.

6909. You are familiar, I suppose, with the programme of inspection, which is laid down in Section 194, for visitors?—Yes, the various things we have to do.

6910. I think these things are not expressed really in the sense of obligation; it is expressed rather in the language of powers, "The visitors at every visit to a licensed house which they are by this Act required to make shall" (it is obligatory) do the following things, and they may at any other visit do the following things?—Any of them. I think there is a qualification, is there not?

Dr. FRANK FAWSETT, M.B.

6911. May at any other visit do all or any of the following things?—All or any.

6912. It is rather curiously expressed?—It is complicated—shall do all or any.

6913. Mr. Micklem: Any one or more of the visitors may do all or any?—They shall at the four visits do any or all.

6914. Chairman: Yes, I think it is so; at the four stated visits you must do those things; at any other visit you may?—Yes, that is so; there is not a necessity to do them all—"shall do any or all of them," I think, is the expression.

6915. Yes. It is rather curious to enact an obligation to do all or any, because I do not quite understand how you can be obliged to do everything and, at the same time, obliged to do something. It is curiously expressed. However, it is an indication generally of what your duties are?—Yes.

6916. One of the most important is sub-clause (b), "See every patient," and you have told us that you yourself, when you go round, are furnished with a list, and you see that every patient is accounted for?—Yes.

6917. Now, apart from the mere enumeration of patients, and verification of their being there, what use is your visit put to by the patients?—If they wish to make a complaint, it is heard. Of course, we get, of necessity, a certain number of complaints from those who are insane, as a result of their delusions; a man may say that he is kept awake by wireless, or tortured by wires attached to his ceiling, and various things which are obviously questions of delusional insanity. Of actual serious complaints of ill-treatment I have only known two in the whole of those 33 years. Those were investigated by the magistrates at the time, and they came to the conclusion that they were unfounded in both cases.

6918. First of all, how did the complaints come to your knowledge in these instances?—In the first case the medical officer told us of it beforehand, that the complaint had been made.

6919. To whom did the complaint relate—I mean did it concern one of the nurses?—Yes.

6920. A male nurse?—In that case it was a female nurse; in both cases they were female complainants.

6921. How did the case come to the knowledge of the medical superintendent, and so to your knowledge?—The patient had complained to him, I believe—it is many years ago.

6922. And did the visiting justices, including yourself as the medical visitor, investigate the case on the spot?—They heard everybody who had any knowledge of the matter.

6923. And what was your conclusion in each case?—The conclusion was that there was no foundation for it.

6924. And what was the conclusion based on?—On the evidence and statements of those whose evidence they had.

6925. Did you see the patient who had made the complaint?—Oh, yes.

6926. What was the nature of the complaint or of the two complaints, rather?—Merely rough usage. It is over 20 years ago; I cannot recall the details, but it was only rough usage.

6927. It is significant that you have not had any case of such complaints for 20 years?—Yes.

6928. You are dealing in the three institutions under your immediate care with relatively small establishments?—Yes.

6929. One of them a very small one?—Yes.

6930. In that case, it will be possible, I suppose, within a comparatively short time to see every one of the patients?—Yes.

6931. We had evidence this morning that in larger institutions it was difficult for the justices visiting to see on every occasion every patient. That may well be, may it not?—With anything like 500, of course, it would take a long time.

6932. But in the relatively small institutions under your care you find it possible to see every patient on every visit?—Oh, yes.

6933. Do you find that you yourself through your special qualifications, your professional qualifications, are sought after by the patients for interviews, I mean in contradistinction to the other justices, who are laymen?—No, I do not think I could quite say that. Of course, some patients say, "Come, doctor, I want to have a talk with you," and the other visitors do not go into the room with me, but it is nothing more than that simply one happens to be a medical man, and the others are not.

6934. I should have thought perhaps the patients might have wished specially to see a doctor rather than a layman; have you not found that in your experience?—No. I think if they wished to make a complaint they would rather have everybody there. In fact, I have got in mind one or two who made complaints which entirely arose from their own delusions, who would not begin until they had every visitor in the room; they would go outside and see if anybody was there.

6935. To collect the audience?—Yes, exactly.

6936. Are opportunities given to patients to see any of the visitors alone, in private?—Any patient can see them alone in private if they wish to.

6937. Do many take advantage of that?—No.

6938. Have you yourself on your recent visits had any private interviews with any patients?—At these regular visits do you mean?

6939. Yes.—Yes, there would be two or three at each of the larger places who would desire a private interview with the visitors—I do not mean myself alone, I mean the visitors together.

6940. I am asking you just to recall what you are doing in your routine work. Have you recently had actual requests for private interviews at any of your recent visits?—Yes.

6941. Were these given?—Yes.

6942. What was the subject matter of the interviews in the recent cases you have had?—Mainly their desire to be released.

6943. Complaining of their detention?—Complaining of their detention.

6944. How did you set about investigating their complaints?—As a rule let them talk.

6945. And what was the result of letting them talk?—They showed themselves to be of unsound mind by their own talk, convicted out of their own mouths, as one may say.

6946. Were you satisfied in each case on the question of their detention?—Certainly.

6947. In your long experience of 33 years can you recall any case in which you personally have been dissatisfied in the case of any patient with his detention?—I have never known a patient detained whom I myself thought fit for discharge. I am excluding those of course for whose discharge arrangements were being made, but I have never known a patient detained in any of those establishments whom I considered fit for discharge.

6948. Of course, you realise that you are one of the means provided by statute whereby the inmates of such an institution may be kept in contact with the outer world, and may have opportunities of making known any complaints to the outer world?—Yes.

6949. And during your long period of office, no doubt you have had many complaints by patients that they were being wrongfully detained?—Yes.

6950. And have investigated many cases?—Yes.

6951. Are we to take it as the result of that experience that there has not been even one case in which you thought that the patient ought not to have been detained?—That is so.

6952. And may one take it also that in your approach to these cases you have no interest in the detention of the patient?—None whatever.

17 December, 1924.]

Dr. FRANK FAWSETT, M.B.

6953. And do you realise that in the performance of your duties you have to consider especially this risk, shall we call it, of a person being unlawfully detained?—Quite.

6954. And is your attention directed to that specially?—Yes.

6955. It is satisfactory to know that in your experience it is so. Will you next tell us what you do on your special visits, the second category of visits?—I have not mentioned that we have to make a report.

6956. Perhaps we should take that—you are required at the conclusion of your visit to make a full report?—There are two books, the visitors' book and the patients' book; in the visitors' book the report is of a general nature, the number of patients admitted, discharged, either relieved, cured or otherwise, or not relieved, number of deaths, if any, number of those who have undergone either seclusion or mechanical restraint since our last visit, and anything we may desire to say with regard to the general health of the patients, if there has been an epidemic of influenza, or anything of the kind, any remarks with regard to the condition of the buildings, or any alterations which have been made—just a general report on the whole of the buildings themselves, and the general condition of the patients. In the patients' book we enter the names of all those admitted, and we have to put down, if they have not already been specially visited, an expression of opinion as to whether they are or are not fit persons for detention. We enter the names of all those who have been discharged, all those who have died, if any, the names of all those who have been restrained, if any, or secluded, if any, and the names of all on leave or out whom we have not seen.

6957. Just pause there a moment. One of the things you may enter in the patients' book consists of the observations you may think fit to make as to the state of mind of any patient?—Yes.

6958. Now in practice do you at the conclusion of your visit make observations on the state of mind of patients in this book?—Not invariably.

6959. There is no obligation?—There is no obligation. If a patient has improved and is about to be discharged, we should probably make a note of the thing, that so-and-so has very much improved and will be discharged shortly.

6960. But you have not had occasion to enter any observations on cases as cases which were, in your opinion, in such a state of mind that they ought not to be detained?—No.

6961. That has not arisen in your experience?—No.

6962. We know about these books that have to be kept. Do you think they serve a useful purpose?—They are records.

6963. Yes, and I was going to suggest this to you, that possibly they may serve a useful purpose, because when a person has got to report upon a visit in writing, if I may so put it, it keeps him up to the mark in making the visit?—I did not mean those two books, the visitors' and the patients' books; I thought you meant the various other books.

6964. No, I was thinking for the moment of these two books?—I think they should be kept, clearly.

6965. And they also have the advantage, have they not, of directing your attention to the matters which you ought to consider?—Yes.

6966. And they give a responsible character to your visit?—Yes.

6967. They are, of course, open to the Commissioners, the representatives of the Board of Control, who come round and can see all those books?—Yes, and copies of the report in the visitors' and the patients' books have to be sent to the Board of Control and to the clerk to the visitors. That has to be done by the licensee within 48 hours of the entry.

6968. So that if anything has attracted the notice of the medical visitor, or the visiting justices, it reaches, and must reach, the eye of the responsible central authority?—Yes, it must.

6969. Who in turn can institute special enquiries if they wish?—Yes.

6970. I think we might pass now to the special visits. What are those special visits?—At the expiration of a month from the time of admission of a patient under recent certificates (not transfers)—

6971. Direct admissions?—Yes,—the medical officer has to send to the clerk to the visitors a statement of the mental and physical condition of the patient at the end of the month. A copy of that is at once sent to me with a statement whether that patient has been seen by the Board of Control, by the visitors, or by myself. If the patient has been seen I take no action. If a patient has not been seen, I visit within 24 hours, if possible, but always within 48 hours, for the special purpose of seeing that one patient. I usually give notice of my visits in order that one may not miss the patient altogether. When I get to the place I see all the papers on which he or she was admitted, the reception order, the certificates, the statement of particulars, and so on, and then I have an interview with the patient, which is usually private. Of course, I would not interview privately an acute maniac or an acutely suicidal case, but apart from those I have a private interview as long as is necessary to convince myself that the patient is—I have always found that he is—a fit person to remain there.

6972. That is a very important visit, is it not, because it is the first visit paid to the patient by a representative of the outside world?—That is the first; but the Commissioners or the visitors may be the first to visit.

6973. But if they have not preceded you then this is the first occasion on which a patient is in contact with some person outside the institution, and outside the certifying authority?—Unless he or she has seen a justice after admission, not having been seen before.

6974. You have told us how you proceed. Again, do you conceive yourself at that stage to be charged with the duty of seeing whether this person who is in this institution is, or is not, a proper person to be there?—Yes, that is the object of it.

6975. You must have passed in review a great many cases on such special visits?—Yes, I could not say how many, but there must be a great many.

6976. And have you in any case had any doubt as to the propriety of the particular patient's detention?—No, not that they had not been properly detained, but, of course, I have come across cases who have practically recovered in that month, and who were shortly going to be discharged.

6977. One does not want to be hypercritical, but just at that point, you are examining a patient of course in the state in which he is at the time of your examination, and you say that some of the cases appear to you to be on the way to recovery?—Yes.

6978. It is a little difficult for you, is it not, to reconstitute the position, and judge whether they were originally certifiable or not?—One takes the certificates, but if the patient admits that the certificates, or the statements made in the certificates, were true, well, that is sufficient, you see.

6979. One knows it is not an infrequent incident of the admission that the patient conceives himself or herself to be wrongfully detained and wrongfully restrained. Have you at any of these interviews had patients who were complaining that they were being kept and ought to be let out?—At the first interview?

6980. Yes.—I cannot recall one, at the first interview.

6981. On the other hand, at later stages when you have seen them you have had many complaints of that sort?—Yes, but the complaints have come from people who have been there for years and years, or from transfers.

6982. I am not judging of the quality of the complaint, but I mean complaints have been made?—Yes.

6983. But you do not recall any person at that stage, at this special visit, having complained that they should not be there?—I cannot recall any.

17 December, 1924.]

Dr. FRANK FAWSETT, M.B.

6984. On the other hand, you have had numerous complaints from patients at a later stage saying that they ought not to be detained?—Yes, numerous. The proportion, however, of those complaining to the total number of patients is small.

6985. But you have repetitions of complaints from the same person?—Yes, from the same person—that is right.

6986. In those cases in which the patient is evidently already on the way to recovery do you take any particular step as a result of your special visit?—The report is entered in the book that they are so, and likely shortly to leave, and a copy of that report of course goes to the Board of Control.

6987. So that attention is directed to the case, and the Board of Control are in a position to know that this patient is one who is about to recover, and are therefore enabled to make inquiries; I mean their attention is directed to the case, and they would inquire?—Yes, their attention would be directed to it.

6990. Mr. Micklem: Just one question, Dr. Fawsett. When you made your special visits at the end of a month you have the report, have you, of the medical officer in charge before you?—Yes.

6991. And before you see the patient?—Yes.

6992. You are quite familiar with the circumstances of the patient before you get to him?—Yes, I have seen that, and all the papers connected with the case, the certificates and everything.

6994. There never really have been any cases in which you wished to initiate leave of absence on trial?—No. I should like to say that perfectly clearly, that the medical officers in my experience are proud of their recoveries.

6995. Chairman: There is a certain competition in discharge rates—I mean the statistics are all given?—They may be, Sir, I did not know.

6996. Mr. Snell: Dr. Fawsett, would you mind telling me when these visits are made how many persons make the visit at one time in addition to yourself?—Well, it would vary, you see. The quorum is one magistrate and a medical visitor. There must be those to make the visit count as one of the four. I might have four or five justices—of course, at Periteau only one other, it is quite a small house; there might be more occasionally, but mostly at Periteau House one.

6997. So that there may be half a dozen persons visiting at one time, including yourself?—Yes.

7000. But the other side would remain—there would be six persons, with the possible addition of the managing director and the resident doctor, making eight; the patient would have to say in the midst of those eight persons that he wanted to see you, or someone else, alone?—No; I frequently put the question, "Would you like to say anything?" I have often heard a medical officer himself say to a patient, "Would you like to have an interview with any of the visitors?" Personally, I speak to every one, shake hands with those who will shake hands—some will not.

7001. But you would not go privately into a man's room and talk to him and ask what he wanted to see you about; the initiative would have to come from him?—Not of necessity I very often say to a patient, "Would you like to see us alone?"

7002. You are aware, of course, that amongst ex-patients there is a fairly general denial of the claim that each person is given adequate opportunities to make these complaints?—Of course, I can only answer for the institutions I visit. I do not think one could say there is the least difficulty there.

7003. Might we take it as your view from your evidence that the difficulties facing a patient desiring a private interview increase in proportion as the size of the institution increases, because of the lack of time of the visiting committee?—I do not know that I am entitled to say that; I am not entitled to criticise other people.

7004. I am not asking for that. My point is, that a visiting committee, going through a place which had 50 patients, would be able to give more attention to individual cases than if the institution had 500 cases?—Of course, the numbers are very wide apart, 50 and 500—one is ten times as much as the other.

7005. Would you say that the facilities are as great for a patient to obtain a private interview in a large establishment as in a small one?—I have no knowledge beyond those of mine, and I am not entitled to speak beyond my experience.

7006. I am afraid I must not press you upon that point, but in your evidence you said, "We let patients talk," and they more or less reveal that the complaint that they are detained is due to the sickness for which they are being treated?—I do not mean to say I do not ask questions, but I let them talk first.

7007. Might it not happen that while a person might have delusions, he might be quite normal in regard to complaints affecting himself?—I am not quite sure that I follow you.

7008. A man might have delusions about any theory of life, or the universe or the nation, or anything else, and yet he might be clear that he was not receiving proper treatment?—Yes.

7009. It does not follow, that is to say, that a person if he has got delusions on one thing has delusions about everything?—Oh, no.

7010. Then I just want to ask this further question: Do you, as a medical visitor, actually give an independent examination in the case of a patient who you suspect is on the way to recovery? Do you, as a doctor, at all diagnose the position of a patient in regard to his illness, or do you just receive complaints as to administrative matters?—No; one would talk to every patient there in turn. I mean one does not just say "How do you do; good-bye."

Dr. FRANK FAWSETT, M.B.

7011. But I thought the purpose of these visits was to see that no person was being detained longer than there was any need for his being detained?—Yes.

7012. What I am trying to find out is, whether any diagnosis of the state of a patient takes place other than that given by the resident medical officer?—Yes. I should talk to him myself, certainly. Sometimes a medical officer may say, "I wish you would look at this patient particularly, because we think he is getting on. What do you think?"

7013. Do you personally go into questions of dietary scales and satisfy yourself that the accommodation and nursing provided is adequate?—No, we do not do dietary. In those places there is no question of the patients getting sufficient and good food—not at those three places.

7014. Not in regard to those you visit?—No; there is no question about that.

7015. Mrs. Mathew: Are you an alienist, Dr. Fawcett?—No.

7016. Chairman: Just one point with regard to the large institutions as contrasted with the smaller institutions and the facility of communication with visitors. Of course, one can see, as Mr. Snell brought out, that the larger the area of inspection the less intense the inspection can be, that is obvious to one; but is it not the case that in all institutions, whatever be their size, all the patients are entitled to write to members of the visiting committee, and their letters must be forwarded unopened?—That is so.

7017. I have in mind Section 41 of the Act. Therefore, although all the patients at the time of the visit might perhaps find difficulty in establishing contact with the visitors, they are all entitled to send letters to the visitors at any time?—Yes.

7018. Which must be forwarded, under a severe penalty, unopened?—Yes.

7019. And if a letter is received from any particular patient by the visitors, do the visitors make a point of seeing that person if the letter discloses any ground for enquiry?—Before their next visit, do you mean?

7020. Yes. I am assuming a letter has come from a patient in an institution complaining, let us say, of wrongful detention, or bad treatment, or something of that sort: Would such a case be taken up by the visitors when they next went to the institution?—Yes, it would be taken up then. I cannot say it would be taken up before.

7022. Do you personally, in fact, get any letters from your institutions?—Now and again, but mostly they are unintelligible.

7023. Do they reach you unopened?—Oh, yes.

7024. Then in each of the three institutions with which you are concerned do you find the statutory notices posted up, which are required under Section 42, that they can write, and so on?—Yes, that is so.

7025. The right to have letters forwarded unopened, the right of every private patient to request a personal and private interview with a visitor at any visit?—Yes.

7026. And do you see these notices when you go there?—Yes. I cannot say that I notice them every time, but I notice that they are there.

7027. You know that you have power to give directions as to where these notices are to be posted?—Yes.

7028. And that not to post them up is a serious offence under the statute?—That is so.

Mr. Cremlyn: May I just put one or two questions through you, Sir? As regards Ticehurst, that Dr. Fawcett has been at, is it the fact that there are there 92 patients and 98 on the staff?

7029. Chairman (to the Witness): Can you tell us the staff and the patients there?—Some years ago, I believe there were 99, including the chaplain and the huntsman. They used to have a private pack of beagles; I think there were 99 at that time. That includes the attendants and the people in the kitchen.

7030. The whole staff?—Yes.

7031. And how many patients?—92.

Chairman: That is about your figure, Mr. Cremlyn.

Mr. Cremlyn: I am taking the Board of Control figures for the year 1923, the last report.

Chairman: What is the point, if I may ask?

Mr. Cremlyn: Only as regards the number of staff, adequacy of staff; that this place is particularly well staffed.

Chairman: I mean if you have all these statistics in a blue book, what is the use of getting them from the witness, if I may suggest?

Mr. Cremlyn: With very great respect, there was some evidence this morning as to the amount of staff that was necessary.

Chairman: Any facts that are contained in the Report will be accepted by us.

Mr. Cremlyn: If you please. May I put this matter to the doctor, with your permission? I want to put a name. The doctor has said that no complaints were made to him during the 33 years; he collects no complaints, except two for rough usage.

Chairman: That is right.

Mr. Cremlyn: May I, Sir, with your permission, ask Dr. Fawcett if he recollects that name (Handing a name written on paper to the Chairman). Under the section of special visits he said there were no complaints at all.

Chairman: I follow. Of course, he is speaking of complaints addressed to himself personally?

Mr. Cremlyn: Yes.

7032. Chairman: This is quite a proper question to put, I think. It is suggested that a particular person has made a complaint to you.—At a special visit?

Mr. Cremlyn: The very important visit you spoke of, the first time.

7033. Chairman: On one of those occasions when you are seeing a patient for the first time, a special visit to a patient who has been admitted; and you remember I asked you a question whether any of them had complained of wrongful detention on that occasion, and you said you had not recalled any case.—I do not think you said ill-treatment.

7034. Improper detention; you said you could not recall any such case.—Yes.

7035. I am asked to put to you the name of a person who was, I take it, a patient in Ticehurst. (Handing the paper to the witness.) The patient I take it is named on that piece of paper, and did at a special visit complain to you personally.

Mr. Cremlyn: He complained that he was being detained, and that he was perfectly sane.

7036. Chairman (to the witness): First of all, do you recall such a person?—I do not recall the name. How many years ago?

7037. Mr. Cremlyn: About eight years ago. Of course, it was a very celebrated case, because the man escaped and was found sane.—I think there must be some mistake.

Chairman: So that we cannot carry it further, if he does not remember.

Mr. Cremlyn: I put it on my responsibility that that man did escape from that place and was found sane on escape, and my point is that he complained to Dr. Fawcett. Dr. Fawcett may have forgotten it, of course.

17 December, 1924.]

DR. FRANK FAWSETT, M.B.

Witness: Yes, I cannot recall the name, or the fact that a person escaped from there at the time. I cannot recall it in the least.

Chairman: However, we have served the purpose that is desired, that the case should be put to you in case you could recall the circumstances.

Mr. Crenlyn: May I put this point, Sir? You know, Sir, where the sergeant who accompanies the officer in the Army walks round the men and says, "Any complaints?" It is not encouraging for the man who makes any complaints. I want you to put it, Sir, whether there is any danger of anything of that sort happening, in Dr. Fawsett's experience; if any of these patients do complain about rough usage or treatment by the staff.

7038. Chairman: I am desired to put to you a question which really seems to me to come to this:

(The Witness withdrew.)

Sir JAMES BARR, C.B.E., D.L., M.D., F.R.C.P., called and examined.

7040. Chairman: Sir James, are you a medical visitor appointed under Section 177 of the Lunacy Act of 1890?—I am.

7041. For which county or borough is it?—For Tue Brook Asylum, in the County of Lancaster, the Borough of Liverpool.

7042. How many licensed houses are there in the area?—There are three in that area. I am only medical visitor to Tue Brook Asylum. I am consulting physician at the Haydock Lodge Asylum. Of course, my position at Haydock Lodge is purely consultative; it is not an official position there, but I make regular visits there for consultations.

7043. That is not a visit in your capacity as a visitor under Section 177?—No.

7044. In your official capacity as visitor how many institutions do you visit?—One.

7045. What is the name of it, do you say?—Tue Brook Asylum. That is just outside Liverpool; it is in the borough of Liverpool, but is on the outskirts.

7046. How long have you acted as visitor?—Forty years.

7047. Therefore, you have been a visitor during the whole period of the operation of the Act of 1890?—Yes.

7048. You have been in the room, I think, Sir James, during the examination of the preceding witness?—Part of the time.

7049. We do not want to cover the same ground twice in our evidence, but we should like to have from you a short account of your experience as a visitor, directing attention particularly to its efficacy as a safeguard against the undue detention of patients. Will you just tell us your experience?—My experience has been very favourable, because the medical superintendent, or the medical proprietor, has always been very anxious for the recovery of his patients as much as possible; therefore, he has always taken every suggestion which I have got to make, not merely with regard to the treatment of patients, but as to their detention.

7050. May we regard you as an expert alienist?—I do not know whether I would call myself an expert or not. I have seen a good many cases.

7051. If you are engaged in a consultative capacity at Haydock, as I understand you are, I assume you are a specialist?—Well, I see a great many cases, but I do not like to call myself an expert witness.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: One might say he does not confine his expert knowledge to that branch.

7052. Chairman: Yes. (To the witness): Will you just tell us about your experience with the staff of the licensed house you visit?—Well, I think the patients are all exceedingly well looked after. I do not recollect that I have had a complaint for years about diet; everyone seems to be exceedingly satisfied about the diet. I have had no complaints against any of the attendants. The chief one you get sometimes is that the patients think they are whether there is any risk of the patients being deterred from making complaints to the visitors by fear of the consequences, that is to say, that it might be the worse for them if they complained. Now is there any danger of a patient being afraid to make complaints, because of the possibility of the nurses, or indeed the superintendent, visiting them upon him?—Not in the case of any of those three places that I visit, certainly not.

7039. Have you found that complaints were made frequently to you?—No, complaints are not frequent; there is always a small percentage who have got complaints, mostly of the same kind, to make, not with regard to ill-treatment, but with regard to their various conditions.

Chairman: Thank you, we are much obliged to you, Dr. Fawsett.

wrongfully detained, that they are quite sane, and that their friends should be in the asylums themselves; they think that the person who signed the certificate is the person who should have been locked up, and as a rule those patients who make the complaint are generally pretty bad cases. You get more complaints from undoubted cases of insanity than you do from those who are beginning to recover.

7055. You were disposed to recommend that the patient should be discharged?—Yes.

7056. The medical superintendent had his doubts?—Yes, and on another visit I quite agreed with him.

7057. You see, one of the important purposes of your visit is to satisfy the public anxiety that persons are not being detained improperly?—Yes.

7058. Have you that in view when you go to your institution, that that is one of your duties?—Yes, certainly.

7059. You have, of course, no interest at all to have patients detained?—None whatever.

Sir JAMES BARR, C.B.E., D.L., M.D., F.R.C.P.

as to the time when a patient should have been let out.

7061. Naturally, there must be a certain margin of opinion on a question of convalescence?—Yes, and there is a question as to whether the friends will take the responsibility of taking them out. If you think the patient is not dangerous to himself or herself, or to the public at large, and if the friends will take the responsibility of looking after them, then I think in a good many cases they can be discharged—at least, let out on trial, and that frequently happens.

7062. Does the stage at which a patient can be released with safety to himself and the public depend to some extent upon the circumstances to which he is to be restored?—Yes.

7063. If the circumstances to which he is to be restored are circumstances in which he will still have a certain amount of shelter and protection and assistance, can you with more satisfaction and comfort to yourselves direct discharge at an earlier stage?—Yes, at an earlier stage if you know that the friends are anxious to look after him, and are anxious to have the patient home. If you know the circumstances are such that they will look carefully after the patient, then you can let him go at an earlier stage.

7064. And does that to some extent influence the question of granting leave of absence?—Oh, yes.

7065. Do you attach value to the provision that a patient may be let out for a time on trial?—Yes, I do.

7066. Is that particularly valuable at the convalescent stage?—I think it is a very important provision that the patient can be let out, and then, if matters are not satisfactory, he can be returned again without a complete discharge.

7067. Have you voluntary boarders in the institution?—Yes.

7068. Many?—No, about half-a-dozen.

7069. Have you found any tendency in the voluntary boarders to increase of late?—Not very much of late. I think they ought to be encouraged. I am very strongly in favour of encouraging voluntary boarders, because if they can come in without a certificate they will probably come in at an earlier stage of the illness.

7071. I think you might just refer now, so that we may have it on the note, to the instance you have in mind where a simplified voluntary system would have been of advantage?—I think at the present time one thing you have got to guard against is that the patients' friends frequently persuade them to come in as voluntary boarders when they are really not voluntary boarders; they have got the better of them, and have got them to sign the form, and I say not infrequently patients are persuaded to enter asylums as voluntary boarders, and the relatives and medical attendants are thus relieved of the duty of having the patients certified. Many of the patients are induced to enter under false pretences; they are told that they are going to a nursing home or a home of rest, and will be able to leave when they like. Some of the cases are found to be undoubtedly insane, or even suicidal, and have afterwards to be certified. One such case was recently admitted to Tue Brook; two days afterwards he was found hiding behind a bush with an open razor in his hand. He was then certified. Patients who come in under such duress are really not voluntary, and when they find that they have been deceived they are apt to wish to leave immediately. There is another class of patients who would readily go into a mental hospital or asylum if there were less formality about their admission. Recently during the visit of Dr. Bond at Tue Brook a man voluntarily sought admission, but when he found that his application would have to be approved by two justices he at once refused to enter under such conditions—he simply went away. When he found he could not come in there and then, and when he found the superintendent required to have the signature of two justices, he refused to come in.

7074. I recognise the undesirability of worrying the patient with formalities, but I am thinking of the formalities necessary for the protection of the patient?—Yes.

7075. That would be secured, would it, in your opinion, by the Board of Control being informed?—Or the medical visitors, or the ordinary justices. If the patient could come in, then the superintendent could notify immediately afterwards—notify as many as you like—the Board of Control or the clerk to the medical visitors, and he would be seen almost immediately afterwards.

7076. We have evidence to this effect, that patients were deterred from going in as voluntary patients because a voluntary patient had on occasions subsequently to be certified, owing to the case probably becoming worse; and it was a deterrent therefore to the patients to go into such an institution on the voluntary basis, lest they should shortly find themselves in on the compulsory basis. What do you say with regard to that?—There might be that possibility about it, but I think most of those cases should have been certified. Most of the cases that come in and require immediate certification afterwards are not voluntary boarders. Their friends have persuaded them to come in as voluntary boarders. It has not been voluntary on their part. Those cases which require certification afterwards are not, in my opinion, truly voluntary boarders.

7077. Does it not depend upon the stage at which they enter the institution? May the case not become a pronounced and certifiable case later on?—Yes; that is quite possible, but I think a great many of the cases if they were taken in early would recover. I think you would increase your recoveries if they were admitted earlier.

7078. Then you would be in favour of any expedient that encouraged people at the very onset of mental trouble to go to some place for treatment?—I would.

7079. The methods available, as far as one can judge, would be, first of all, a clinic at which outdoor patients could be received and treated?—Yes, you could have that; certainly that would be an advantage.

7080. Then you would have beds in the ward in which patients could be under observation, with some provisional method of detention?—Yes.

7081. So that ultimately the asylum properly so-called would contain only the persons who had been

17 December, 1924.]

Sir JAMES BARR, C.B.E., D.L., M.D., F.R.C.P.

diagnosed as requiring asylum treatment and compulsory detention under law?—Yes. Of course, that would limit your scope for the voluntary patients, if you did not allow them to come into an asylum. If you merely sent them to a home you would have to establish new homes; for example, in Liverpool we have not got any home of that kind. That might be done all right in London, but I should think in the provinces it might be a difficult matter to find mental homes of the description which you suggest.

7082. It has been suggested that you might work the voluntary system in co-operation with the county and borough asylums. As you know at present they cannot take in voluntary patients.—That is so.

7083. That there might be provision made for their taking voluntary patients?—Yes.

7084. That might work quite well, might it not, alongside the conception of some provisional method of dealing with patients?—The only thing is the county asylums are all very large, and the majority of them are away from the big centres of population, so that I think myself to encourage voluntary patients in association with smaller asylums would be an advantage. You might have them at the larger asylums if you like, but my own feeling would be that facilities would be more available for that class of patient at the smaller places.

7085. You approve of the voluntary patient, but you think many of the voluntary patients are truly involuntary patients, because they do not know what is happening to them?—Yes. That is not due to the asylum, that is due to the people outside.

7086. But then let us see where we are. Do you think it would be more desirable that these people should be certified, with all that that means, rather than that they should have a little deception practised upon them so as to avoid certification?—I do; I think the patients who come in under duress would be far better certified, and the majority of those cases of whom I speak are certifiable.

7087. One looks at it from the point of view of sentiment. It seems a little brutal to say to a person, "You are going to be taken off to an asylum." It would seem to me you might well say to a person, "I think you should go to a home where you will have a rest, where you will find it very comfortable, and you will probably get better." You may say that is deceit, but the effect of it may be helpful.—When I was speaking, I was speaking of the extreme cases, undoubtedly certifiable cases.

7088. Let us consider for a moment the place that the voluntary patient ought to have in the system. It seems to me it has an advantage in this way, that certification and its stigma may be avoided altogether because the case may never become certifiable?—Yes.

7089. Secondly, it may put at the disposal of patients the advantages of institutional treatment without their being deterred from going by the fear of certification, and thus they may go at an earlier stage and so, possibly, secure a cure which might not otherwise be obtained?—Yes, I quite agree with you, but then, of course, you are dealing with cases where the patient has a certain amount of will which he is capable of exercising.

7090. I think that is the essence of the voluntary patient, if I may say so. You would rather see nothing but voluntary patients and certified patients in institutions?—I would, as far as possible, encourage the patients who have no objection to the deception so far as you speak of it, but when you are deceiving a patient that is truly certifiable, and perhaps a dangerous patient, then I think it is a mistake.

Chairman: That would seem to be right.

7091. Earl Russell: And you would be opposed to the provision in Lord Onslow's Bill by which, if the patient had no will, some other person could give their consent to his being a voluntary boarder?—Yes, if the patient was not dangerous to himself or to others.

7092. Chairman: Lord Russell's point is that, under Lord Onslow's Bill, if a person has not a volition of his own, the volition of somebody else, who has charge of him, may be substituted?—Yes.

7093. Take the case of a minor—there the guardian's consent operates in place of the minor's own consent?—Yes.

7094. Do you approve of that substituted consent?—Yes, I would.

7095. In the case of a person who could not give it.

7097. Chairman: Would not that rather trespass upon your argument that it is undesirable to detain a person in an institution who ought to be certified while remaining uncertified?—If anything for the protection, not merely of the patient but of the asylum, if you have got any risk of suicide, for example; when a patient is fully certified his position is more fully recognised, and that he is a danger to himself.

7098. Then you have a view, I think, upon the provision that a patient, who has not been seen by a judicial authority before admission, has now a right, as we know, to be seen by another judicial authority after admission?—Yes.

7099. Do you share the views that have been expressed to us that that is a futile provision?—I do.

7100. And you take the view that the judicial authority, like the justice, ought to see the patient?—They ought to see the patient. If you are dealing with a maniacal patient, what is the use of telling him that he can see a justice?

7101. It does seem rather an idle ceremony, does it not?—Yes. If you are dealing with a case of melancholia, if you commence to tell him that he can see a justice, he begins to think something is wrong, and he gets more depressed. I think the justice ought to see them, any way. There is no use in telling them they can see a justice. I think either a justice or the visitors should see them pretty soon after admission, any way.

7102. Are you in favour of the assimilation of the case of the pauper and the private patient? At present the pauper has the advantage that the certifying magistrate must see the patient?—Yes.

7103. Whereas in the case of the private patient the judicial authority need not see the patient?—Yes. I think it would be better for the judicial authority to see the patient, rather than to be telling the patient afterwards that he can see the judicial authority.

7104. It is difficult to understand why that should have been arranged on this principle. Then, per contra, the pauper comes off worst in the matter of the number of certificates. The pauper may be detained on one medical certificate, while the private patient has two medical certificates?—Yes.

7105. Have you any view to offer us upon that?—I do not think there is any great advantage in the two; if the patient is being frequently visited afterwards, I do not think there is any advantage in the two.

7106. But is not the first detention of the patient a very critical stage?—Well, the more difficult you make it for the patient to get into the asylum the worse it is for the patient.

7107. Of course, every one who has to deal with this branch of administration recognises that you have balancing considerations at almost every stage. On the one hand the importance of preserving the liberty of the subject, and, on the other hand, of seeing that as many patients who would benefit by treatment can get it?—Yes.

7108. I gather you do not attach so much importance to two medical certificates as a safeguard at the beginning?—No, I do not think there is really much in it. If the patient is going to be seen very soon afterwards by medical men there is very little in it. There may in some cases be an advantage in having two medical certificates, an advantage to the medical men to have a consultation; they have to give their opinions separately, but it would encourage consultation between them.

Sir JAMES BARR, C.B.E., D.L., M.D., F.R.C.P.

7109. At present they must give their opinions separately?—Yes.

7110. The idea being, I suppose, to maintain independence of judgment?—Yes.

7111. I do not know the reason why, when you consult two people, you should ask them to give their ideas independently. The idea of consulting two people generally is to get their joint opinion?—Yes.

7112. I do not quite appreciate your point that the necessity for two certificates at the beginning is obviated by the early examination by other persons later on, because the detention for even a few days of a person against his will may be a very serious infringement of his rights and of his liberty?—I do not raise any point, I do not put any strong view of my own; I only think it is often unnecessary.

7113. Have you in your long experience had any cases where you have received complaints that a patient has been improperly detained?—Letters, you mean?

7114. Yes?—Oh, yes; I frequently get letters from patients, but generally they do not relate to questions of detention, it is general information, or something of that kind. They are often irrelevant rambling statements of all kinds.

7115. In your experience have you ever come across any case of a person who was, in your opinion, improperly detained in an institution which you visited?—Never have I come across a case of a patient who was improperly, or had been improperly, detained. As I said before, there is just a little difference of opinion as to when a person is fit for discharge; that is always apt to occur.

7119. What is this case introduced for? Is this the case of a private patient?—It is with reference to conduct. This is a private patient, and judging by her delusions she is insane; there is no question about it; and no doubt if her conduct was injurious to herself or to others, then I think she ought to be locked up, but as it is not, I think the delusions are no sufficient reason for confining her in an asylum.

7120. But one must remember that the law of the land does not say that every lunatic shall be confined in an asylum?—It is important to recognise that.

7121. And your case is the case of a private patient who, although a person who could be certified, is not certified, and in whose case you do not think it necessary to resort to certification because the delusions are of a harmless character, and she happens to be in circumstances in which she can be properly looked after?—Yes.

7122. That is the class of case in which the law does not attach any penalty to a patient being kept at home; there is no gain involved in that case?—No.

7123. And the law does not require every lunatic to be taken to an asylum?—No.

7124. Earl Russell: Do you see any new admissions in the course of the year?—Not a large number. In the two asylums, of course, I do.

7125. And do you inquire, or find out from the certificates, whether the judicial authority has generally seen the patient or not?—In a certain number of cases they have not, but I think in the vast majority they have seen him, if not before, almost immediately afterwards.

7126. The usual practice, you find, is for the judicial authority to see them?—Yes.

7127. Now I would like to ask you this, in view of the paragraph in your précis in which you say the patients are induced to enter asylums under false pretences. Do you think that the justice, in the case of a pauper patient, or the judicial authority, in the case of a private patient, ought to tell the patient that he is there representing the public, and that that is the moment for the patient to make any protest against being locked up, if he wants to make it?—You mean to say that the visiting justice—

7129. I feel that; but suppose the patient is, we will say, partially sane, at any rate sane enough to understand what is said to him: if the justice merely comes into the room and chats to the patient as a friend and goes out again, the patient may not know that that was his opportunity of appealing to a member of the public against the order for his detention?—The justice would not be satisfying himself according to my idea in that case. I think he ought to satisfy himself whether the patient is sane or insane.

7130. Only by the medical certificate?—He would be guided by the medical certificate. If he had any doubt on that point he could test the patient on the information which he had on the medical certificates.

7131. I agree he could. My point is this: Do you think at any stage the justice ought definitely to say to the patient something which would enable him to understand that that was the moment at which he could appeal to a public authority?—I have no objection to his doing that, provided he was not upsetting the patient.

Earl Russell: I quite know the difficulty.

7132. Mr. Snell: Just two questions, Sir James. In the earlier part of your evidence you said you had always found that the medical proprietor was anxious for the care and discharge of his patients. That is very interesting. Is it that the desire to get a favourable statistical record would be greater than any desire to keep a patient for financial or other reasons? That would operate, would it?—They are able to keep their asylums pretty full. There is no difficulty about getting new patients.

Sir JAMES BARR, C.B.E., D.L., M.D., F.R.C.P.

7133. So that there is no inducement to keep a patient?—There is no inducement beyond feeling confident about them themselves. The only thing that would make them keep them would be if they were afraid of the patients getting out and doing some depredation or other.

7134. Would the medical proprietor call your attention to a case that was approaching a convalescent state?—Yes, he would.

7135. You do not have to sort those out?—No; he would tell you at once that he thought this patient was improving.

7136. Would that merely be in a case of doubt, because in the ordinary way he would have power to discharge them himself, would not he?—Yes; the probability would be that when you are going round you discuss the case with the medical superintendent.

7137. Just one other question. You suggest that many patients would not go out of these institutions even if they were allowed to do so?—I do.

7138. But that might be a manifestation of their illness, might it not?—Yes.

7139. If they cared to prefer that sort of surrounding, I mean?—They know when they are well off and when they are comfortable.

7140. Mrs. Mathew: Sir James, do you ever find any difficulty in getting the friends to undertake the care of the patient?—Occasionally, yes. That is often a difficulty in turning patients out—the difficulty of getting friends to look after them properly.

7141. Those are patients who would be properly discharged if you had anywhere to send them?—If we had anywhere to send them they might be discharged; if you had responsible individuals to look after them, take the necessary care of them.

7142. They would still want some care, though?—Oh, yes. I mean to say, I do not think many of these cases would be fit to turn out at large to earn their own living.

7145. You entirely agree that it is very important that the early incipient cases should be treated without certificate?—Yes.

7146. What kind of mechanism would you suggest for that? Would you think there should be an out-patient room attached, say, to the Royal Infirmary, or attached to some mental hospital?—I think it would be better to have it attached to a mental hospital, because you want to get these patients out of town as much as possible; you do not want to have them in a busy street; the quieter they are kept the better.

7147. I meant an out-patient clinic.—You might have an out-patient department in connection with any big general hospital.

7149. In your précis you refer to a method of action by the magistrates in which the magistrates occasionally examine a cab full of patients.—That was a good many years ago; that does not happen now.

7150. Earl Russell: We had evidence from Birmingham that they were drawn up in a taxi.—I do not think it happens in Liverpool now, at any rate.

7151. Sir Ernest Hiley: Sir James, do you attach importance to the justice certifying a patient? We have had it put to us that the justice is a rather useless functionary, and that it would be preferable to have the certificates of two doctors. Do you agree with that?—No, I would not like to say that the justice is useless. It is wonderful what experience some of the justices get. For example, if you take Liverpool, I know one justice who signs more orders of admission than any other half-a-dozen put together, and he is a man with very considerable experience in that line. I attach a good deal of importance to his opinion.

7152. I was not quite sure that I heard your answer to Sir Humphry. You do attach importance, do you, to the patients being kept in touch with the general community?—Certainly.

7155. Then you think the question of the onus is the difficulty?—Yes, there is often a great deal of difficulty, as some cases have shown, in proving his good faith.

7158. There is provision made for staying the proceedings?—But does that often happen?

17 December, 1924.]

Sir JAMES BARR, C.B.E., D.L., M.D., F.R.C.P.

7160. Of course, one sees from the public point of view the awkwardness of requiring a certain class, to wit, the professional class of doctors, to act as the media through which insane persons are protected against themselves, and the public are protected from them, and at the same time to say, "You shall certify at your peril." Naturally, the person who is at his peril prefers not to run the risk. Do you think that the reluctance to certify in consequence of the apprehension of judicial proceedings is an unfortunate thing?—I think it is unfortunate, and I think it is strongly felt at present by medical men.

7161. Of course, the medical man should deal with this question, which is a matter of professional skill, entirely on its merits, and unaffected by the question of whether there are legal proceedings on the horizon or not?—Yes.

7162. But, of course, human beings being what they are, if they are liable to be shot at in action, they must take that into account, naturally?—The law of self-preservation comes into force.

7163. And, of course, no medical practitioner can be compelled to give a certificate?—No, except in this way, that the law expects the ordinary medical attendant to be one of the two, and if he is not one of the two, it has got to be stated why he is not one of the two.

Mr. Cremllyn: May I ask a question, Sir, arising directly out of what you have said and what Sir Humphry has said?

Chairman: If you please.

Mr. Cremllyn: Supposing a doctor gives evidence in a Court of Law, is he not protected; is his evidence not protected?

Chairman: I think I can answer that question better than Sir James, cannot I? I should say that certainly the evidence given by any witness in court enjoys the highest form of privilege known to the law.

Mr. Cremllyn: Therefore, the evidence given by a doctor in an inquisition is protected?

Chairman: Yes, I think it would be.

Mr. Cremllyn: Therefore, may I put this question through you to Sir James: If the medical profession are so anxious for their protection, why not do away with certificates and give evidence before a tribunal?

Chairman: Now, Sir James, what do you think of that? Do you think we should go back to the method of inquisition in all cases?

Witness: It would be a very complicated business. It would delay matters very much. You can get a certificate at once, but if you are going to hold an inquisition, how long would it take? A fortnight at least.

Earl Russell: And how much would it cost?

Mr. Cremllyn: I am putting it, Sir, that the doctor should give evidence before the judicial authority instead of giving a certificate. In every case in court except this, the doctor's certificate would not be accepted.

Chairman: No; doctors' certificates are accepted constantly by the court in the absence of a witness, and a Judge would take it at once.

Mr. Cremllyn: The other day it was refused me by a High Court Judge.

Chairman: That may have been a case in which the judge was not satisfied. However, that opens a very large chapter of policy. The point really suggested to us for consideration is whether we should have a more forensic inquiry into a case before detention.

Witness: I think it would be a mistake, because you would delay matters, and what is happening to the patient during that time? Supposing he wanted an urgency order; supposing the patient wanted to cut his throat, and you wanted to get him locked up there and then, what would happen?

Chairman: I do not think the question is put on the hypothesis that there might not be meantime protective means.

Mr. Cremllyn: No.

Chairman: It is a question of certification, whether that should have more formal procedure than at present, and that the doctor should give evidence on oath, and I suppose, Mr. Cremllyn, be subject to cross-examination?

Mr. Cremllyn: Yes.

Chairman: However, that is a very large topic, as to whether the whole procedure should proceed on the basis of a more or less judicial inquiry, or whether some modification of the existing procedure should suffice.

Mr. Cremllyn: You recollect, Sir, that this morning Sir Cecil Chubb was of opinion that voluntary boarders were not to be encouraged, and Sir James Barr this afternoon is of opinion that they ought to be encouraged. What I want to ask Sir James, through you, Sir, is this. He says that the stigma can be removed by going as a voluntary patient. I suggest: Could not that stigma be avoided by going to nursing homes for voluntary boarders that are not associated with lunacy at all?

7164. Chairman: You have heard the question. Sir James. Will you give us your answer?—It would depend upon circumstances. The ordinary nursing home, I think, would be unsuitable. You would require to establish a kind of mental home for these cases, and I do not think that the ordinary nursing home, where all classes of patients are taken in, would be very suitable for these mental cases, because of the nature of the malady.

7165. Of course, one knows there are cases in nursing homes which give medical attendants considerable anxiety, because you cannot take a patient in for pay who is certifiable?—Yes, but, apparently, Mr. Cremllyn would propose that they should be taken in for pay.

Mr. Cremllyn: The witness said that they could thereby gain the advantages of institutional treatment. May I ask Sir James, through you, Sir, what that institutional treatment is, and what the difference is between that and treatment in an ordinary hospital or in an ordinary nursing home?

Witness: An ordinary nursing home takes in all manner of medical and surgical cases—pneumonia, pleurisy, broken ribs, and operation cases. Mental patients do not require treatment of that kind, and the numbers would be comparatively small, and to have them mixed up all together without any proper nursing would be very undesirable. Nurses in the ordinary nursing homes have no experience of mental cases, in the vast majority of instances, and they would not be able to deal with them satisfactorily.

Mr. Cremllyn: I think the point as to what exactly is the treatment that is given in these institutions ought to come before your Commission, Sir.

Witness: There is often a good deal of treatment required in getting a patient quiet, giving him a soporific, giving him something to get him to sleep, where a patient has been days and nights, before he is admitted, without an hour's sleep. Those cases you have got to get to sleep at once.

Chairman: We are very much obliged to you, Sir James.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Chairman: Before the proceedings this morning are begun, the Commissioners desire to take this, the earliest opportunity, of correcting a misapprehension as to their procedure, which appears to have gained some currency. At the outset of their Inquiry the Commissioners decided that the most expedient course would be to hear evidence in the first place from those charged with the administration of the present code, in order to inform themselves as to its working and to put themselves in a position to appreciate the criticisms which might be made upon it. This course, it is thought, has been of advantage to those desirous of amending the present law; and indeed assurances have been received that the information thus elicited has been of material service to all parties interested. It is not proposed that the witnesses who are hereafter to give evidence criticising the existing system and putting forward suggestions for its amendment should be put on oath, any more than those who have expounded that system. But the Commission in addition to hearing general evidence by way of exposition and criticism, have thought it right to undertake the judicial investigation of a few specific cases of alleged wrongful detention or ill-treatment selected by the National Society for Lunacy Reform, as illustrative of their general criticism. These cases relate not to matters of opinion but to specific issues of fact and serious allegations against particular individuals are involved. The Commissioners have decided that in the hearing of these cases both the persons making the allegations and the persons answering them should alike give their evidence on oath. While it is obvious that only a small number of test cases can be investigated in detail in this manner, the Commissioners have expressed their willingness to receive and consider statements in writing by any persons who desire to bring before them information that may assist their deliberations, whether relating to particular cases or of a general character. This announcement will be communicated to the Press, and those interested will have an opportunity of reading it

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D., called and examined.

7166. Chairman: Dr. Barham, are you the Medical Superintendent of the London County Mental Hospital at Claybury?—I am.

7167. And have you held that post for over seven years?—Yes.

7168. I think you have had in all some 21 years' experience in the Mental Hospital service of the London County Council?—Yes.

7169. Now, first of all, will you give us a few particulars about your Institution? When was Claybury Mental Hospital opened?—In 1893.

7170. I see you adopt the nomenclature of "Mental Hospital" rather than "Asylum"—I have no doubt in deference to the views that are now so prevalent?—Yes.

7171. And was Claybury the first new asylum to be opened by the London County Council?—Yes.

7172. It is situated about nine miles from the City and stands in 219 acres of ground and includes a farm of 137 acres?—Yes.

7173. And I understand that a large proportion of your area is woodland, ornamental and playground?—Yes.

7174. The site forming, in fact, part of the old Hainault Forest?—That is so.

7176. That is a separate building altogether, I understand?—Yes.

7177. Called Claybury Hall?—Yes.

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7178. Then you have in addition an isolation hospital villa for female patients?—Yes, that is for infectious cases.

7179. I think the present number of beds is for male, county and private list patients 1,035, and for female county and private list patients 1,361, making in all 2,396?—Yes.

7180. And then in addition, you have 64 beds for private male patients at Claybury Hall?—Yes.

7181. Since the opening of your Institution how many patients in all have been admitted?—Over 20,000 patients of the county class, and about 547 private patients.

7182. And at the moment how many have you under treatment?—There are 2,282 beds occupied.

7183. And 962 of those are, I think, in the occupation of males, and 1,320 in the occupation of females?—Yes.

7184. And another figure of interest is that 2,074 out of the total of 2,282 are wholly or partly rate-aided patients, while 51 are private list patients?—Yes.

7185. And 157 are service and ex-service patients?—Yes.

7186. With the addition of 42 private patients at Claybury Hall?—Yes.

7187. What has been the annual admission rate?—Taking it on an average it varies between 300 and 600. The average for the last five years I can estimate at 503.

7188. Between one and two a day, putting it shortly?—Yes.

7189. And what has been the discharge rate over the last five years?—The average number discharged was 195 patients.

7190. Of course those are not necessarily the same persons as came in that year; that is simply the total number of discharges made in the year from the institution?—Yes. A large proportion of the new admissions that year would be discharged, but, of course, it does not exclusively mean new cases during that year.

7191. We are interested in the early recovery cases, that is to say, the cases which make a complete recovery within a very short period after their admission. I forget whether you tell us later on in your précis what your experience has been about that—if not will you tell us now?—I cannot give you any figures, but I am very much struck with the number of cases which recover very quickly. It is a question which interests one very much.

7192. It has a great bearing, of course, upon one of the branches of our reference, and we have been searching for statistics as to what I call the early recovery cases; because we feel that cases which recover after, let us say, a period of two or three weeks under treatment might well have avoided certification altogether. You are of course aware of the point that arises there?—Yes.

7193. But you have no statistics of patients admitted, and the period they have been in your Institution before they have left recovered?—I could easily provide those figures. I think some cases have been discharged within a fortnight, probably not less. But I never remember having to discharge a patient absolutely as not insane.

7194. No. Of course one knows that the formula is either relieved, recovered, or unimproved?—Yes.

7195. But I was not thinking of it so much from the point of view of a person who never had been in your institution, but from the point of view of a person who in your institution has made a rapid recovery. I do not know whether it would put you to inconvenience to look at your records of admissions for five years. You have something like 500 people coming into your institution altogether in a year, and it would be very interesting to know how many of those admissions left recovered at the end, let us say, of a month, three months, or six months, so that at the end of the year they were out of your care altogether. Are your statistics available on that basis?—They could be quite easily produced if the Commission would like them.

7196. I think to get a sample from an important institution like yours of the period that the patients are under your care might be very useful to us, because it would give us an indication of the proportion of cases which are really of quite short duration?—Yes. I will be very pleased to supply that *information.

7197. You might take perhaps five years back and just give us of the admissions in each of those five years the numbers who were discharged at the end of one month, three months, and six months?—Yes, I will.

7198. Now will you tell us something of the administration of your institution. What is the staff, and so on?—I have seven medical officers at the present time to assist me, and we are to have an eighth. The medical staff are not appointed particularly in London to any one hospital, but they are detailed to the general service, there being ten of these large hospitals in London, and the staff are liable to be moved about, or promoted from one place to another.

7199. And your senior officer has the rank of Deputy Medical Superintendent?—Yes.

7200. And no doubt can act in your absence?—Yes.

7201. Then with regard to the female division?—The female division is under the control for administrative purposes of a doubly-qualified matron, who has two assistant matrons to help her.

7202. When you say doubly qualified you mean she has both a general and a mental training?—Yes. One of the assistant matrons is now appointed as a sister tutor, her function being to train the nurses, both male and female. Then there are some 224 nurses at present of all ranks, which also include the head nurses; there are 10 head nurses.

7204. Ten of whom are head nurses?—Yes. All nurses are subject to a maximum of 96 hours' duty in London per fortnight. They work on the principle of two day turns of duty, that is to say, one shift in the morning and one in the afternoon, but the proportion of nurses on duty at any time would, of course, vary very much. If you took those on duty at any moment they would amount to about one to 15 patients.

7205. But the proportion will vary, of course, according to the class of patient whom the nurse is attending; some cases require, of course, much less supervision than others?—Yes.

7206. What is the highest proportion of nurses to patients?—About one to 4.5, I think, is the correct figure with me.

7207. That would be in the class that requires the closest supervision?—Yes.

7208. And have you also supernumerary nurses who are available for special cases when required?—There is always a proportion of nurses over the establishment number, for that purpose.

7209. I suppose you may have a case which requires individual attention?—One or two nurses sometimes, yes.

7210. Then as regards the superintendence of your institution from the public point of view, have you a visiting committee?—We have a sub-committee of the Mental Hospitals Committee of the London County Council. Really, the Mental Hospitals Committee acts as a visiting committee in London owing to the special powers they have.

7211. We are aware of those. Then you have a sub-committee in charge of your particular institution?—Yes.

* See Appendix XXI.

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7212. And on that sub-committee there are, I think, six members, one of whom is a lady?—That is right.

7213. Is your hospital a recognised training school for nurses?—Yes.

7214. And does a nurse undertake to train for a period of five years?—There is no binding contract, but the Council rules that a nurse may be got rid of if she does not become trained in five years.

7215. She must qualify in five years, or else she may be dispensed with?—Yes.

7216. So that gives an indirect inducement to your nurses to go in for the course of training?—Yes.

7217. How many of your men nurses, and how many of your women nurses, hold the Medico-Psychological Nursing Certificate?—84 of the men and only 57 women.

7218. Does that reflect, what we have heard elsewhere, that the women nurses are a less permanent element in your staff?—Very much so, yes.

7219. And are your younger probationers now entering for the State examination?—Yes.

7220. I have no doubt you attach great importance to this question of the training of your nurses, in its relation to the efficient care and treatment of patients?—I think it is of supreme importance. We are very much encouraging now general trained nurses to enter the mental hospital service, and we send our nurses to be trained in general hospitals as well.

7221. Nurses, after all, are the persons who are in the most constant and immediate association with your patients?—Yes.

7222. And I suppose one may take it that their happiness and comfort, and, indeed, their prospects of recovery, largely depend upon the class of nurse you have, and their powers of dealing with the cases?—I think the personnel and quality of the nurses one has is one of the greatest factors in both the happiness and the successful treatment of patients.

7223. It is therefore desirable, I suppose, that you should have nurses who are technically qualified as far as possible, and who are also suited by disposition and sympathy for their vocation?—Yes; and, of course, one devotes a good deal of attention to obtaining that kind of nurse.

7224. Do you find difficulty in getting suitable applicants for your staff?—A very great difficulty for women; not so much for men.

7225. Is that a matter under your personal supervision? Do you engage the nurses yourself?—Yes, I engage them myself, and always see them.

7226. How do you get them; do you advertise for them?—We advertise, and we have agencies, through a labour bureau, and very often one gets them from other mental hospitals.

7227. Is the London County Council nursing staff interchangeable among the different asylums?—It is capable of interchange. There is promotion to another place to a higher rank—they will have that opportunity.

7228. Do you interview nurses when they are engaged?—Yes, always, and not only do I interview them in regard to certain instruction, but the sister tutor is now always placed in charge of a probationer, so that she does not enter raw into very difficult work.

7229. And does she give them both clinical and theoretical instruction?—Yes, and takes them round and informs them of certain important rules. I think it is a terrible thing to send an absolutely untrained person into an acute mental ward. I should always avoid that for some time.

7230. Until they have had some experience?—Yes.

7231. Now with regard to the men, you have not apparently had so much difficulty in getting male attendants?—Not since the war. There has been quite a number of a very good type of man obtainable.

7232. Are you satisfied with your male side?—Well, I am always anxious for something better. I am thankful for what I have.

7233. We notice you have on your male side altogether 191 male nurses, and that you have 84 who hold the Medico-Psychological Nursing Certificate?—Yes.

7234. Do you encourage them to go in for that examination?—Yes; first of all they have to go in for it; it is compulsory. Then they very likely will be got rid of if they do not; and finally they get very much better remuneration for it. The acquisition of a certificate means staff rank, which, of course, carries with it higher pay.

7235. What facilities have the male nurses for preparing for the examinations?—A regular class is held, courses of lectures and demonstrations.

7236. And who conducts those?—The head nurses and the sister tutor; and the doctors, of course, give the lectures.

7237. Your assistants give courses of lectures?—Yes.

7238. And have the men opportunities of private study?—Yes. We provide now a quiet room for the men to work in if they like, but, of course, it is only a personal and private matter to what extent they do that. They have a great deal of time off now, owing to our system—both men and women of course.

7239. Have they books that they can study?—They have a library, and they provide themselves with nursing books, and so on. They are provided with a proper lecture theatre as well, and facilities for training generally.

7240. Now in so large a staff as you have under your charge, there must of course necessarily be some variation in the quality of the nurses?—Yes.

7241. Have you had in your experience at Claybury any cases where male nurses have proved unsatisfactory in their treatment of patients?—Oh yes, certainly.

7242. And how do those cases come to your knowledge?—Observation of myself or one of my medical officers, or the inspector or head nurses, or a patient himself.

7243. From all those sources you have had complaints?—From all those sources one gets reports not infrequently.

7244. And when you get a complaint of that sort, what steps do you take?—If it is a trivial matter the medical officer who receives the complaint will look into it, and if he is satisfied, nothing further need happen except a report. If it is in the nature of a grave matter, I invariably see into it myself and, if necessary, held an inquiry into it.

7245. You of course possess disciplinary powers, with the ultimate power of dismissing a nurse on the spot?—I can suspend him, until the next meeting of the committee.

7246. It would be interesting to know what number of serious cases have come to your knowledge in which you have had to take the step of suspending the attendant for misconduct after investigation?—They arise now and again. I do not think in the last year I have had any, nor in 1923; I think the year before that I held a big inquiry over a case.

7247. Was that a case of alleged ill-treatment of a patient?—Yes.

7248. And what was the result of the inquiry in that case?—The result was that the evidence was not good enough. My sub-committee investigated the matter finally. We had no positive evidence that the patient had been ill-treated. Of course it is very difficult sometimes.

7249. One recognises that the subject matter is naturally difficult, and also the obtaining of evidence. Have you had cases on the other hand where you have been satisfied that there has been ill-treatment of a patient?—I can recall one in which a male nurse admitted it himself, and was dismissed.

7250. Was dismissed by the visiting committee?—Yes; it was not a very serious matter.

7251. What had he done?—One likes a concrete case, you know?—I am afraid I am rather quoting from memory; it is a long time ago, but I think he rather violently pushed a patient on to the bed, and did a thing which a nurse should not do. This matter came out afterwards, and he immediately confessed;

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

it was very nice that he did. The committee thought it a very hard case, because he had been so honest; but he had to go.

7254. Earl Russell: From patients to you, do you mean?—From patients to me, yes. It may be nothing more than a desire to be moved from one ward to another because they are not getting on. I hand those requests on, and if possible they are carried out.

7255. Chairman: Of course one recognises that the duties of the nurses in a mental hospital are of a peculiarly onerous and difficult character?—Unquestionably.

7256. And I suppose you have many patients who unhappily are unable to appreciate that things are being done for their own good?—That is so, yes.

7257. And you will have also, of course, patients who for the time being have completely lost all control over themselves?—Yes.

7258. And you will also, I suppose, have patients the symptom of whose malady is that they are peculiarly irritating?—Undoubtedly, yes.

7259. What one is thinking of is this, that the staff of the mental hospital is more exposed to difficulties in the conduct of their duties than almost any other staff?—Yes, and the slightest want of tact goes a long way.

7260. Temperament is a very important matter?—Temperament is extremely important. I am quite sure of one thing, that the nurses are not unkind to the patients. It is a very rare thing to find a nurse who is deliberately unkind, but situations are bound to arise, and unless one is born with more than the ordinary amount of tact and self-control, it is not a question of ill-treatment, it is a question of whether you avoid trouble, and a small thing is very easily magnified.

7261. One can see that the atmosphere is abnormal altogether?—It is extremely difficult.

7262. But, on the other hand, the qualifications, I should imagine, for that work would be the possession of a very equable and placid temper, if possible, and a power of self-control in the attendants?—Yes, you are useless if you have not got it.

7263. The supply of persons so gifted is necessarily limited, is it not?—I am afraid it is rather; it is not always easy to find them.

7264. I should imagine that those are the qualities which you would look for in the selection of your attendants?—Certainly some of the qualities that are essential. If one finds anybody who is obviously unsuited one has the means of getting rid of them up to a certain point. I have the means of getting rid of every nurse I engage within six months. There is a probationary period of a week's notice. If they are obviously unsuitable, whether it is through an examination which is always conducted up to six months to test their intelligence, sometimes whether they write well enough even, or whether they are trainable in other respects, or whether by temperament they are unsuited, I have that power, which the committee allows me, to get rid of them on a week's notice.

7265. I suppose you find that some nurses are not able to bear the atmosphere of the asylum?—Quite a few will resign of their own accord within a few days.

7266. They find they cannot accommodate themselves to their surroundings?—Yes.

7267. On the other hand, on the women's side you tell us it is more difficult to get suitable nurses. Have you ever thought of having women attendants on your male side?—I have had them during the war and, of course, I am well acquainted with the work of women nursing men at Long Grove, where I was for 10 years.

7268. What do you think of the idea?—I like it very much.

7270. And I suppose one may say also that their powers of sympathy are perhaps greater?—Yes, and I think for certain kinds of male patients they are far better, whether it is a question of simple nursing, or elderly people; but, of course, there are limitations to their use.

7271. The problem seems to be rather difficult, because while you appreciate the value of the woman as a nurse, on the other hand your experience has been that it is more difficult to get suitable women nurses than male nurses?—That is so.

7272. I see that during the last five years, while you have engaged 97 new male nurses you have engaged no fewer than 492 new women nurses?—Yes.

7273. And that 124, that is, 55 per cent., of the female staff have less than three years' service?—Yes, that is the position now.

7275. Do you mean you find some young girls say they will try a mental hospital and see how they like it?—Well, they want employment and they try it. Then they move on, and perhaps find they do not like it and have a change; or, of course, there is the question of their capacity for the work—very often that is the reason that they have to go.

7276. What measures have you been taking to obtain nurses of better education and greater suitability for their work?—During late years, the hours of duty are far more reasonable, less unjust than they were, and the pay, of course, has improved—those are two points. Then a thing I like to see very much is that one tries to attract the right kind of nurse by taking her on to train; that is part of the condition on which you take her on; you hope therefore to attract a woman who is taking the work up seriously.

7277. And you endeavour to make it a career?—Make it a career, yes.

7278. What steps can you take to impress that aspect of their vocation upon your nurses; is this still the women you are speaking of?—Women or men in this case. You consider their educational standard; in engaging them, and then you interview them and have to form an opinion about them; the whole point of the training is placed in the very forefront. I invariably discuss this matter with them. A person who does not want to be trained you try to exclude.

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7279. I have no doubt your subordinate officers in the institution have a good deal to do with the attendants, and much will depend upon their capacity in turn, as you yourself cannot undertake the training of all your own nurses?—Exactly, and for that reason now one is insisting not only on a mentally trained nurse, but on their having a wider training in a general hospital; we try to introduce the atmosphere of the training school of large hospitals.

7280. On that matter have you found any difficulty with regard to your nurses passing from a mental hospital to a general hospital, to supplement their training?—Yes, undoubtedly.

7281. We have heard something of the trouble that arises. I suppose the difficulty will arise in this way, that a nurse who has attained competence as a mental nurse cannot very well enter a general hospital at the bottom?—She has to.

7282. But she would naturally resent that, to begin as a probationer in a general hospital after having obtained a position of competence in a mental hospital?—I do not think they mind that very much if they are the right sort.

7283. What is the difficulty—is it the reluctance of the general hospitals to receive them?—Yes, in certain cases. The Poor Law infirmaries will take them, and are very glad to have them very often. I get testimonials back that I am very proud of, and some general hospitals will take them; but, generally speaking, I think the general hospitals can get all they require without it, as they have given a mental nurse a bad name, quite unjustly.

7284. Who has given the mental nurse a bad name?—The public and the general hospital—I mean they do not think they are the class of people they want.

7285. Do you mean they have not had experience in general nursing, but have only had a specialised experience which is unsuitable?—Yes, partly.

7286. On the other hand, mental disease is, of course, frequently associated with physical disease of one kind or another, and I should imagine that there is a certain common ground of nursing, common to the whole profession?—Undoubtedly, and I am perfectly sure it would do the general nurse a great deal of good to undergo a mental training, which we also very much desire, of course.

7287. Then you would advocate some scheme of co-operation between the mental hospitals and the general hospitals, whereby there could be an interchange of staff from time to time?—Yes. I have advocated that for a long time.

7288. At present any such interchanges must naturally be voluntary?—Yes.

7289. And while you have had assistance from some directions, in others you have found that no place could be found for your nurses?—It is sometimes difficult, yes.

7290. May one say that the difficulty arises from the two sources, first, that the general hospitals have already an adequate supply of nurses, and have no room for others?—I think that is often the case.

7291. And, in the second place, that they find it does not fit in with their system or with the framework of their institutions to take nurses who have already had a considerable mental training?—I think so, yes. I know of matrons who do not like them, and that ends the matter.

7292. But while there may be difficulties in the way, you attach importance, I gather, to the nurses having as part of their curriculum a period of general training?—I think it is a matter of extreme importance, and I think the London County Council voices that also in making it now a regulation for filling their posts of matrons that they shall be generally trained.

7293. Then would you advocate the mental nurses having general training before or after they have qualified as mental nurses?—I do not mind a bit about that; it will surely be the latter in the majority of cases.

7294. Now you have told us of the importance you attach to instilling into the staff a sense of responsibility and a knowledge of the work. You have told us also of your provision for lectures, and the clinical and theoretical training of your staff. Are you quite satisfied that you have a reasonably organised system of instruction now?—I think I am getting it; it is a very long and difficult problem.

7295. Then we have spoken of the question of the general training of mental nurses; and in attracting the best class of nurse something, no doubt, depends upon what social environment you are able to offer them, the amount of leisure and comfort of their lives?—Yes, that is very important.

7296. Have you a nurses' home?—Not what is generally known as a nurses' home.

7297. Where do they live?—I might say, first of all, that I have over 50 female nurses living outside. The male nurses generally live outside; they only have to live in in certain proportions as they are required.

7298. That leaves you about 170 resident?—Yes, and they have quarters; they are rather mixed up, and, of course, many are sleeping in rooms adjacent to the wards; they have various recreation rooms and mess rooms, and lecture rooms, and so on.

7299. Mr. Jowitt: Have they separate bedrooms?—Yes, in nearly every case, but not invariably; very often I have sisters, friends, sleeping together, but that point has been one that my committee has considered very carefully, and has very recently altered a good deal.

7300. Chairman: One would sympathise with the nurse's desire to have a certain measure of privacy at some period of the day; she is moving about all the day among the distressing cases which she has to handle, and then perhaps she finds herself leading a more or less communal life in the meal times, and so on. Personally, I attach great importance to everybody having a certain amount of privacy. What opportunity has the nurse of being by herself without feeling that there is always someone else there?—Of course, the public room she has to share, but she has her own room.

7301. Her bedroom?—Yes. If I may just sketch out the hours of duty, say from seven to two, after that she is free.

7302. Free after two o'clock?—Yes, up to seven o'clock the next morning. The next week she will come on at one, and will go off at eight—it varies, eight or nine.

7303. On the day she is on duty?—On the day she is on duty in the afternoon. Then she may go away for the night by permission, or if she is off the next day she may have a night and a day off.

7304. The day she is on duty in the morning, that is to say, the seven to two period?—Then she has to sleep in the hospital.

7305. And has she a day off in that week?—She has one complete day off in that week, and six days in which she works this seven to two, or one to nine.

7306. And does that represent her total duties?—No; it is the total actual duty, but if a nurse is resident and she is called upon, if there is an emergency, or anything of that sort, say a fire, or a serious incident of any kind, she is bound, of course, to render assistance, but nothing more than that.

7307. The normal life of a nurse seems to be that she has alternate weeks from seven to two, or from one to nine, on six days in each week, and beyond that her time is her own, short of any special call upon her services?—Yes. We run social clubs. The women can play hockey, and the men football.

7308. Tennis?—Yes, tennis, and, of course, they enjoy the social amenities in the hospital; there are cinemas, plays and that sort of thing.

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7309. And a library?—Quite a good library, yes.

7310. Are the nurses moved about from one class of patients to another, and from one ward to another?—Yes; I encourage that as much as I can.

7311. Is that to enable them to have experience of all classes of mental illness?—Yes; if they want to get on they must have that experience.

7312. There is another aspect of asylum treatment that is important: you have, of course, inside your gates quite a number of industries carried on?—Yes.

7313. The principle upon which such an institution as yours is conducted is to make it as far as possible self-supporting in its internal economy?—We do all we can in that way. Of course, it is not really.

7314. You have a large staff of labourers, gardeners, and skilled tradesmen?—Yes, we have nearly 600.

7315. None of those are patients, I suppose, are they?—None of those are patients, no.

7316. Then having this large staff you must have a lot of work to do. Are you able to associate the patients with the carrying on of the work?—Yes; of course, that is a very important form of treatment in a mental hospital.

7317. 569 is the precise figure of labourers, gardeners and skilled tradesmen?—I include the nursing staff in that; that is the total staff at Claybury now.

7318. Earl Russell: Give us your numbers over and above the nurses?—36 farm labourers, gardeners, some 16 artisans, and then there is, of course, the domestic staff. Everyone has at the present time patients more or less in association; some are actually in charge, whether they are nurses or not.

Earl Russell: But 100 to 150 would it be?

7319. Chairman: That is almost exactly the figure I got, Lord Russell. (To the Witness): I suppose you include the medical superintendent and his medical staff in the total. It just looks round about 150, that we may call tradesmen?—Yes.

7320. Then you associate your patients with these people in carrying on various occupations?—Yes; about 60 per cent. of the patients would be employed themselves.

7321. And I suppose regular employment with supervision is itself a form of treatment?—Undoubtedly. It is a dreadful thing if they do not occupy themselves.

7322. Now there are all sorts of work?—Yes; one can always do any amount of this kind of thing. Of course I have a great many varieties of work, tailoring, bootmaking, laundry, needlework, gardening, woodchopping, actual work labouring on the farm—a great many varieties, mat making, and those sort of things.

7323. Would you give us the figure for the maintenance rate at Claybury at present?—At the present time it is 25s. 3½d.

7324. Is that merely maintenance, excluding standing charges?—Yes, that is just the maintenance, and it is common maintenance rate for the county.

7325. Just reverting to the question of the nurses for a moment, you told us of their hours. Has a nurse ever got to do a double turn on one day in a week?—Yes, under the system of hours I omitted to say that she has one long day in a week, and that is really a modification. I might say it is a temporary modification under the Council now, the one long day a week, and then five days either morning or afternoon work.

7326. What does the long day consist of?—The long day is seven to eight.

7327. That is 13 hours?—Yes, with, of course, intervals.

7328. Miss Madeleine Symons: How is the night duty arranged?—They have four nights off in a fortnight, and they work, of course just overlapping the day staff. They will come on—I have a little difficulty in saying, because we are just modifying our hours again, but on the male side they now come on at 9.15 and go off at 7.15.

7329. Chairman: Have you eight-hour shifts there too?—No, but it does not exceed a 96-hours fortnight.

7330. Earl Russell: They cannot come on at 9.15, because your other nurses have left at nine?—No, I was just saying the hours are under a process of modification again. The actual working hours now, and what will apply to the hospital now will be that the afternoon shift will run from 1 to 9.30, and the night staff will come on at 9.15; that is actually going on on one side and will be on the other shortly. Incidentally that was organised to enable patients to sit up till half-past nine.

7331. Chairman: That is rather an interesting point—the hours that patients get up and go to bed. What is the ordinary hour for getting up at Claybury?—Seven o'clock.

7332. And for going to bed?—If you are ill in any way and up in the day you will be in bed by about half-past seven.

7333. Is that compulsory?—Yes, that is to say if you are being treated in any way or are ill.

7334. Yes, but take the ordinary patient who is not for the moment requiring special treatment—do they all go to bed at 7.30?—No, they sit up till quite nine, and they will be in bed by 9.30; they have to be in bed before the night staff take over.

7335. When do they have their last meal before going to bed?—They have their last full meal at five.

7336. It seems a long time from five in the afternoon until breakfast next morning, which must be about eight, I should think?—It is, but one should explain that a certain part of that meal is always set aside, there is an issue of cake—I find, as a matter of fact, that that is taken as supper.

7337. There is no regular supper, is there?—There is no issued supper.

7338. Mr. Snell: But the patients reserve that for themselves?—Yes.

7339. They deprive themselves of it at tea?—The dietary I think is reasonably liberal. I should say the committee are interesting themselves very much in this point, and is probably arranging a supper meal, an actual issue of some beverage and, for instance, of cake.

7340. Earl Russell: At what hour, if they are put to bed at seven?—That would be given after, perhaps eight o'clock.

7341. After they are in bed?—No, to the people sitting up.

7342. I thought they went to bed at half-past seven?—Only the people who are ill.

7343. Mr. Snell: Do the people who go to bed ill get any food, if they need it?—If they need it, always, yes; there is always an issue of food for infirmary purposes.

7344. Chairman: But taking the ordinary residents, I confess it seems to me a very long period to go fasting, from five o'clock in the afternoon to eight in the morning next day?—It is a longish time. I think that is a matter which is under process of alteration. With the establishment of longer hours very likely the tea meal will be retarded.

7345. The distribution of the diet is rather an important thing, and I can imagine that, in the comparative monotony of an asylum, meals must bulk as a rather interesting feature in the day?—Yes, undoubtedly they do.

7346. Would you not be in favour of either rearranging your meals, or taking some other step to obviate that very long fast?—I am in favour of it, and I think that when these hours are changed it will possibly be so; I know the committee desire that it should be so.

7347. We have had a dietary put before us, the London County Council dietary which we know was adopted some years ago, and it has been modified. It may be quite an adequate diet; I have no doubt it is arranged on the best advice, but one has to consider not only the quantum of the diet but the way in which it is administered, that is to say, the distribution of the meals for the patients; and to have no meal after five o'clock is certainly different from what patients must have experienced in their own private lives. If one is wanting to assimilate the atmosphere of the asylum as much as possible to the feeling of home, there are very few homes in which nobody has anything to eat after five o'clock until the next morning at eight?—I agree that it would be desirable to have a later meal. I know there is much supplementing of diet.

7348. The fact that they do carry away some of their meal and reserve it for a later part of the evening is the best evidence that they feel the need of something later on?—I quite admit the desirability of what we were saying, but I do not think it does justice to the amount of food issued under the scale. I could quote a ward in which I was a few days ago where I asked a nurse what that large plate of cut-up cake was. It was not cake saved by the patients, it was cake that they would not eat, and was going to be used for their supper meal. What I mean is that the issue of tea, I think, is ample for that purpose.

7349. In short, they may pocket something?—They may pocket it, or what more often happens, the nurse reserves it.

7350. Mr. Snell: Is the tea meal a fairly substantial meal?—Yes; it consists of bread and butter and cake and sometimes jam or lettuce, and fruit sometimes, with a pint of tea.

7351. Mrs. Mathew: May I ask who settles those hours for meals?—They are settled really by the committee. There are points that present considerable difficulty—for instance, to retard this tea meal—in the sense that the kitchen staff have got to be considered. The kitchen have their hours too. I mean it is not an easy matter entirely to provide an enormous institution and pay all the staff and have an unlimited staff, as you might require if you go on extending your hours.

7355. When will they knock off at night?—They will knock off at four to half-past.

7356. That looks to me something like five or six hours' work?—I should say at the outside it was less than the average, but patients are not very industrious as a rule; it is rather a difficulty to get them to work. What I call a worker in many cases will be the men or women who take a duster and polish a floor for an hour or so and assist in the bed making—he will be classified as a worker, but the rest of the day he may be doing nothing.

7357. The laundries are more or less like little factories?—They will not work regular hours.

7358. What are the hours in the laundry?—They will work there from half-past eight or nine, they dribble in; there is no going in at a regular time. They are not paid hands, they just go in as they like, they are not herded there; they will work there till twelve or half-past. Some of the women are keen workers and will perhaps work better than a paid hand. I have men patients who are better than farm labourers, but it is done with an enthusiasm of their own.

7361. Now let us pass to the private male patients at Claybury Hall. What are the terms there upon which the patients are received?—The present rate is 56s. for London settlement, and 59s. 6d. for outside London.

7362. That is a very moderate rate, of course, for paying patients?—It is, as rates go.

7363. Is it designed to bring within the reach of patients of moderate means the advantage of the treatment you can give them?—Yes.

7364. And do you find that it is taken advantage of and appreciated?—The rate has had to go up owing to the increased cost of living, and I think since then Claybury Hall has not been filled in the way it used to be.

7365. It is getting too expensive, is it?—I think so, yes.

7366. Then, apart from the patients at Claybury Hall, you have private patients in the general institution, have you not?—Yes, we have some 50 private patients on the private list cases.

7367. I am putting aside ex-service men for the moment, but are these persons who, having been admitted as rate-aided cases, have been found to have means of their own, and then are classified as private patients?—Yes.

7368. I think the only difference in their treatment is that they are entitled to wear their own clothing?—Yes.

7369. On that matter of wearing their own clothing or not, what is the rule in your institution for all patients, apart from private patients?—The hospital provides for all patients who are not on the private list, but I never refuse patients leave to wear their own clothing now, if they make a request or if they themselves object to institutional clothing, and they can produce their own clothing.

7370. Of course, clothing is a matter which has a psychological effect, one knows. May I take it that there is no uniform in your institution?—None whatever.

7371. There is no impropriety in saying that I recently visited one of the London County Council's asylums myself, and paid particular attention to that matter, and I noticed that the women had no uniforms at all; there was a very great variety of clothes. Are the clothes made in the institution?—Yes, practically always.

7372. When one hears of the clothes being supplied in the institution, as far, at any rate, as the London County Council is concerned, it does not mean that the patients are all clothed in the same way?—Certainly not. A special ladies' committee has been sitting on this for a long time, and we have a very great variety of clothing, both male and female. There is no uniform whatever, and that is encouraged.

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7373. The effect of a uniform may be depressing, as one knows?—Yes. I regard that as very important.

7374. There is the further question of the difference between clothes that are supplied to you and your own clothes?—Yes.

7375. Can a patient who is not a private patient get liberty to wear his or her own clothes, if they are supplied by their friends?—Yes, I always allow that at the friends' own risk. I do not undertake to care for their clothing, but if they like to provide it, it is always allowed.

7376. It must be consistent with it being sufficiently warm and adequate?—Yes; one has to consider that, of course.

7377. Where do you accommodate your service patients?—As far as possible in service wards.

7378. Are they by themselves?—They are by themselves.

7379. They are, of course, in the category of private patients?—Yes, they are.

7380. You have told us a great deal about your system generally. I would like now to ask you a little about your experience in the admission and detention of patients. Of course, you do not come in contact with the patient until the patient has been certified and sent to your institution?—That is so, yes.

7381. At that stage you meet the patient for the first time. Do you personally see each patient who arrives?—Not on arrival, no. I see them always within a few days.

7382. Where do they go when they come, first of all?—They are admitted in special admission wards.

7383. And what is the feature of those wards—what is the treatment and the routine of those wards?—They are wards set apart for new cases. They are more highly staffed, and the staff, of course, is selected specially, and they are hospital wards in the sense that they are set out as hospitals where patients are kept in bed.

7384. Have you adequate accommodation for keeping patients there for a time until you can investigate their cases and form some diagnosis and prognosis as to them?—Yes, I have.

7385. You do not find yourself cramped for space?—That depends on the admission rate.

7386. And I suppose that fluctuates?—That fluctuates enormously.

7387. When do the patients first come under your personal observation in these admission wards?—By statute within a week, but I generally see them at varying periods; I am often down there, and I often see new cases.

7388. Who actually receives the patient on admission?—The medical officer who is on duty. Then, of course, one of the senior officers will see that case also and is responsible for that case.

7389. Now there is an examination made on admission by a particular officer who receives the patient, and there is a further examination by you with a view to report?—There is a further examination before that by the medical officer who treats the case.

7390. And then there is the responsible examination by the medical superintendent, upon the result of which I suppose the future of the case largely depends?—That is so.

7391. What steps do you take to investigate the history of the case, which is so important in relation to mental illness?—We send out a form for the friends to fill in, and, if necessary, we write personally to the friends if we want to know anything specially. We also have the information from the hospital visitor, who will, on request, visit the home.

7392. That is a very important functionary, but do you always try to get in touch with the relations of the patient?—Yes, and they are, of course, notified at once of an admission and are allowed to see the patient as soon as they like.

7393. There are some cases where there are no suitable relatives to communicate with, of course, but where there are any relatives you communicate with them?—Yes.

7394. This hospital visitor is an interesting person. Is that a voluntary worker?—She is a voluntary worker, and she has been there about a year. I regard her as of enormous value. She helps me extremely by being an outside friend to a patient. She wanders round the wards; she has no official standing, and they know she has not.

7396. Earl Russell: Do you mean that through carelessness they have lost sight of the patients?—Through carelessness or family indifference or what not.

7397. Chairman: Has she any uniform?—No. She writes reports which pass through my hands, and find their way ultimately into the case records, and therefore form very valuable information for that patient's case.

7398. She seems to fulfil a function of great importance as a sort of liaison between the patients and their relatives outside?—That is so, yes.

7399. She is unpaid, of course?—She gets nothing for it.

7400. Mr. Snell: Is she appointed by the Mental Hospitals Committee?—She is appointed in the sense that one is granted permission to get a hospital visitor.

7401. Anyone could not walk in and offer to do it?—No, but there is room for more help.

7403. Sir David Drummond: You suppose there is room for more?—Unquestionably if you get the right kind of people.

7404. Chairman: Yes, but one would want to keep out altogether the idea of her being an official?—Yes.

7406. They would simply become the same as the other officials; the important point is to have the other outlook for this purpose?—I think so, yes.

7407. She must give a great deal of time—does she attend every day?—No, she at present attends twice a week, but, of course, her work involves a good deal of visiting and outside investigation, and she always helps patients after discharge. She has found them homes.

7408. Does she to some extent fulfil the function of after care?—On her own, and by request, she sometimes will do that kind of work.

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7409. Now in the admission wards are you able to make, even at the outset, anything in the nature of a rough classification of the cases?—It is possible to do so. Probably patients are admitted into one ward, but I have a variety—what I call an admission unit in the hospital where there is classification. I can put a patient in a quiet ward, and so on.

7410. What one has felt is this, that the early stages of the onset of this malady may be the most important stages—I think you will agree with me there?—Yes.

7411. And it is very desirable, is it not, to eliminate, if possible, all circumstances which might tend to aggravate the illness just at that critical stage?—That is most important, yes.

7412. One cannot but feel that a patient who we shall say is in a nervous state might suffer from association with cases of a more advanced or distressing type, and might in that way in the early stages, instead of benefitting, really suffer. You see what is passing through my mind. It is a difficult problem, I know, because you cannot have each patient treated individually; but cannot you by classification prevent cases which appear to you to be hopeful cases, temporary cases, or slight cases, from suffering by association with more extreme or distressing cases?—I think it is possible to do so. It is done up to a point. That is to say, I do not think I should ever subject a person, who we knew was a sensitive educated person who might have come down in the world and got into a mental hospital, to that sort of thing; if they were suffering from depression, or any incipient condition, I have a perfectly quiet and nicely conducted ward where I place women of that sort.

7413. That is what is in my mind. If one may put a practical case to you: suppose in one day there are presented to your institution a case of violent mania (what the public call a raving lunatic), a case of mild melancholia, and then possibly a case of depravity or a moral pervert—there you have three totally different classes of cases altogether. I could imagine that the second one, the case of mild melancholia, might have his or her condition greatly aggravated by finding herself or himself associated on the one hand with a raving lunatic, or, on the other hand, with a moral pervert?—I have always thought so too and have acted on that. I could go back many many years thinking of my admission hospital at Long Grove where such patients were specially classified, they were given the privacy of screened-off cubicles. You quote three cases. The mania cases will probably find their way into a special room, or into a continuous bath; the depraved case as likely as not will remain in the admission ward, or find its way into a room by itself; whereas the case you want to get at is the one which is given special consideration.

7416. The only solution would be to have admission wards of more than one class into which you could make a rough classification of cases so that they might not do mental injury to each other, and this would be preliminary to your more careful diagnosis and ultimate allocation?—Yes; that is really in effect what we are doing.

7422. Of course it is difficult to see what treatment you can give for the mind diseased apart from the case where it is associated with some definite or specific physical disease. Mental disease is so much on the psychological side that the treatment of it must be on lines of its own?—I think it is increasingly difficult, but by constantly watching a patient, by trying to rehabilitate his mind when you discover what is wrong with him, by methods of persuasion, diversion and correction, it is wonderful what you can do in that way. Of course, if you get an actually willing patient who wants to be treated (that being the great difficulty with mental cases—they do not want to be treated) it becomes much easier.

7423. Environment must have a great deal to do with it?—Yes, I think environment is extremely important.

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7424. And in environment I would include recreation as well?—Anything which means help for patients. The appearance of the ward, the way dinner is served, literature—they are all adjuncts, of course.

7425. And possibly one may say the orderly character of the environment may help to have a steady effect?—Yes, I think the routine and discipline that some patients undergo is in the long run probably a benefit to a case that otherwise seems quite unamenable to treatment.

7426. On the physical side, have you a dentist?—Yes, a visiting dentist.

7427. And have you an oculist to look after their eyes?—We can always get the service of any specialist; we have no one specifically appointed.

7428. Suppose one of the patients wants a pair of spectacles?—I have the means of providing that, and I always send him up to an eye hospital if it is possible to send him; if it is not my committee will give me the services of an oculist.

7429. Then if a patient goes sick what happens? Have you special infirmary wards?—Yes, there are several infirmary wards.

7430. What steps do you take to satisfy yourself as to the condition of the patients under your charge in the matter of their recovery?—The doctors in charge of the various patients, especially admission units, gradually draft their patients into convalescent wards, and there they have a great deal of liberty and occupation, and as soon as he thinks they are fit he draws my attention to them.

7431. So that really the doctor who is actually in charge of the case is the medium of telling you whether the case is one approaching fitness for discharge?—The one infallible medium according to his own judgment, but of course it is not the only way.

7432. What other means are there?—My own personal observation, and perhaps I should say more than anything else by the friends, and the patient himself, of course.

7433. One of course is struck with this, that you must have very important administrative duties to perform; and with so large a population under your charge, do you find that you can get to know your individual patients?—I only know individually a few of them. When I say "know" I must be understood to mean that I know a great deal about them. It involves an enormous knowledge of a patient to say you know a great deal about him. I know a great many patients, of course.

7434. If one may put a common test, if you are going through a ward would you know the names of all the patients?—Oh dear, no.

7435. Then for your knowledge of the individual case are you dependent really upon the doctor who has charge of that section of your institution and on the records in your case book?—In general that is true. The doctor is a senior doctor who is my deputy on either division, and he is supposed to know all about the patients.

7436. Do you favour the view that the functions of the medical superintendent should be separated from those of the executive officials in an asylum?—I think it would be very helpful to the superintendent if it was possible, but I am rather convinced that it is impossible.

7437. There is an aspect of it that occurs to one: that in a mental hospital, unlike other institutions, the organisation of the institution, and of the system, is itself part of the curative treatment. You have told us that occupation, for instance, is a very important therapeutic agent. One would imagine that the person who was providing the occupation would have to make all the arrangements about that, the selection of patients, the work to be provided, and so on. All these things would really in a sense relate themselves to the treatment of the patients. I am thinking for the moment of the difficulty of dividing the functions. I can see the advantages of it, but I am also envisaging the difficulties. Is it not rather a feature of a mental hospital that there must be someone who has control, not only of the medical side, but of the management of the institution which is itself connected with the treatment?—There must be a division certainly; but as regards an actual patient I think one official can control the treatment, the knowledge of the patient, and his recreation and occupation.

7438. Do you have much routine administrative work to do?—A great deal, yes.

7439. Can you delegate it at all?—Yes.

7440. You have a clerical staff, I suppose?—I have a large clerical staff, but, of course, the amount of writing and references that are made to the hospital are very large.

7441. Is the emphasis in your functions on the superintendent rather than upon the medical?—My inclination is upon the medical.

7442. But does your duty compel you to give more attention to the superintendent's side?—Well, Sir, it is inextricably mixed up, half of my clerical and administrative duties concern in one way or other the welfare of the patients.

7443. If you are taking up the question of discharge, for example, where you see letters from a patient, it may be said in one sense to be administration, but in another sense it is doing medical work?—Legal and compensation cases arise which take up a vast amount of time.

7444. Would it be possible for you to have an officer who, although under you, would be sufficiently responsible to relieve you of more of that administrative work, and enable you to follow, what appears to be your inclination, to do more on the medical side?—I think it is capable of development, yes.

7445. For instance, on the medical side you have, I think, seven or eight medical officers. I shall assume that those are gentlemen of competence in their profession to whom you can delegate a considerable amount of your work. Have you on the executive side officials comparable in status who could relieve you equally of superintendent's work?—Not quite in the same sense; but, of course, I have a good deal of help.

7446. I am trying to see if you could be released to some extent from the routine work. Recognising for the moment that you must be the ultimate court of appeal for the whole institution, if you had an official under you comparable in status to your senior medical assistant, such a person could relieve you to a large extent, could he not?

7447. Earl Russell: You have a steward?—I have a steward and a clerk of the hospital, who has perhaps six clerks under him; then, of course, there is the central organisation in London.

7448. Chairman: Is there any administrative means by which you could be relieved to a greater extent—any method you could suggest from your experience?—It is very difficult to know how it could be done. More clerical assistance, possibly.

7449. It seems to me that it is the responsibility rather than merely the clerical work that is involved?—It seems to me that the man in charge of such an institution has ultimately to keep the reins in his own hands largely, and the post must be more or less administrative. It ultimately comes back to that. Really what one requires is possibly more doctors, and that is recognised as the situation just now; they are increasing them.

7450. That may be so, but you are, of course, yourself the person ultimately responsible medically for the detention of the patients, that is to say, for deciding if their condition warrants their detention; the ultimate responsibility is, I think, with you?—Yes, that is so.

7451. Therefore, when so responsible a duty is laid upon you, you would naturally desire that you should have as ample an opportunity as possible of knowing cases under your charge, and being able to gauge their condition from time to time personally as well as through the medium of your officials?—Of course,

I have to devote that amount of time to every case that is of importance, where either the patient has brought himself to my attention, or my attention has been drawn to him by others as being a difficult case, a case that requires investigation.

7452. I can quite see that you attend to, and no doubt have time to attend to, the cases which are brought to your knowledge, but the initiative in dealing with those cases comes from others, not from yourself?—Not invariably.

7453. How do you deal with a case on your own initiative?—I am constantly perambulating the hospital, one way or another; I am going round as much as ever I have time. I know a great many of the patients; they do not leave me alone, I can assure you of that. They soon explain their condition to me, and if I have any doubt in my own mind I do not leave it there; I invariably carry an investigation through.

7454. Perhaps one should take along with this topic a fact which is worth bringing out, that, of course, while you have so large a population in your institution a very considerable number of the cases are cases as to which there is no difficulty at all?—That is so.

7455. I mean cases of senile dementia, and so on, for whom nothing can be done except to give a comfortable residence?—I think that is true, yes.

7456. Therefore, the field of enquiry, so to speak, is to that extent narrowed; the actual number of cases which require consideration from the point of view of their continued detention is not anything like the total number of your patients?—No, it does not represent the numbers at all.

7457. Is one difficulty about patients going out that they may not have homes to go to?—It does present a great problem, but, as you know, no doubt, we have the After Care Association, who help us loyally.

7458. After a patient has been for a considerable time in the institution, and has been relieved, are you sometimes apprehensive of sending the patient out in the world again, unless there is some place where shelter can be given for the time being and a new start made?—Yes, I am.

7459. You have, as you know, under Section 79, power to release patients to the care of relatives, even though they are still of unsound mind, more or less?—And that is acted upon a good deal, of course.

7460. There again do you have to satisfy yourself that the home is one in which the patient will not suffer?—My rule always is to make an enquiry through the After Care Association, or the hospital visitor, as to what the home is like. Then the application comes before the sub-committee with a report. Generally speaking, it takes effect.

7461. Do you have this difficulty, that patients may have recovered to the extent that in the institution they have steadied up and are more or less normal, but if exposed to the outer world, unsheltered by the routine of your institution and its protection, might break down?—It happens over and over again. I might perhaps quote one case.

7462. Yes, do please.—I have just re-admitted a very nice man, an educated man; he has a little means of his own. He was resident at Claybury for years and years, a very long time—I could not quote how many years. He had his parole, he was perfectly free; he had his liberty to go out whenever he liked. He did not want it. His contention was always that he had not confidence. He was extremely difficult to certify, but the Board of Control accepted my certificate, and he did not want to go. Had it been possible for him to have been a voluntary boarder he would have been one. Then came the point. Last spring I said to this patient: "You can go out when you like, you have only got to come and tell me, and I will discharge you under any conditions you like." He finally did come, and I was satisfied he was well enough to go. I made a good many enquiries to help him, and so on. He went out fully discharged, and he came back a few days ago. He was out some months altogether.

7463. Was it a success?—An absolute failure. From the very start of his discharge he became absolutely miserable; he could not manage his own affairs; he simply dare not touch his money affairs at all and he has come back in a very profound state of depression, very much worse than when he went out. That is not a very rare instance of the kind of case you are referring to.

7464. Sir David Drummond: What were his home surroundings?—He had good relatives, but people who would not live with him. He could not of course get any work. Had he been able to get work he might have rubbed along better than he did.

7465. Chairman: Was he living with relatives when he went out?—No.

7466. Where was he staying?—I think he was staying in lodgings. I think the After Care Association helped him in the first place, but of course that does not last for ever.

7467. Earl Russell: He came back re-certified, I understand?—Yes.

7468. Chairman: And his last state was worse than his first?—Yes.

7469. Mr. Snell: He had no mental strain upon him. It was not inability to conduct his affairs, because he had none to conduct?—He had a certain amount of money. He had a Receiver when he was in the hospital. When he was discharged that money was handed back to him. He would not face the question of dealing with his own dividends; he has informed me that was so, since he came back.

7470. Sir David Drummond: Was he doing any work in the hospital?—Yes, he was always doing work.

7471. Mr. Snell: Was it the fact that he could not get work that depressed him?—I do not think so entirely; of course the absence of work encourages a morbid state of mind.

7472. Chairman: Yes, that is an interesting case. Now will you tell us the number of patients discharged in the present year up to the 30th October. It is 184 in all, I think?—Yes.

7473. What was the experience with regard to those? 126 were discharged as recovered?—Yes, that is the number.

7474. And 32 were discharged "relieved" to the care of friends; 13 are still on trial; one patient on trial has died and 12 cases sent on trial have relapsed, making up the 184 patients?—Yes.

7475. Do you find that there is rather a tendency on the part of friends prematurely to ask for the discharge of their relatives?—We have a lot of trouble in that way; it very often ends disastrously, but on the whole I think the freedom of discharge is now very marked and no good applications are refused.

7476. In the case of a patient who is recovering I suppose you find it difficult to say at what moment of time the patient has passed from mental unsoundness to mental soundness?—It is impossible. It is difficult to say the moment of course, but in connection with mental cases it is often a question of the tendency to relapse; and you hesitate to send a patient out prematurely, because you know that if a relapse occurs it is a most discouraging feature and will do the patient more harm than a month or two months longer detention.

7477. It seems that at that end rather than at the beginning your difficulties are most prominent?—They are very often. It is very responsible work discharging patients.

7478. Are the relatives inclined generally to ask for the earliest possible discharge?—I have an enormous number of applications.

7479. And do you find that if you, so to speak, accelerate the discharge in the case of convalescence, you may have a relapse which would not have occurred if you had gone a little slower about it?—I think that is undoubtedly so in a certain number of cases.

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7480. Do you give financial assistance to the patients who are out on trial?—Yes, the committee allows an on-trial allowance.

7481. You told us in your précis that 63 patients on trial received allowances up to 15s. a week?—Yes, and of course on discharge they are allowed more, generally through the After Care Association. They get money granted to them from the Queen Adelaide Fund; 39 patients received grants up to £121 during those 10 months.

7482. You look after the patients; you give them cards which will allow them to go to Maudsley Hospital?—Yes, they are told to go there if they feel they are requiring help again.

7483. You have told us about your hospital visitor. You have got the usual chaplain, I suppose?—Yes.

7484. And clergymen of various denominations?—Yes.

7485. Finally there is one other matter we will discuss with you. You know that the second part of our Reference relates to the possibility of treating mental disease without certification?—Yes.

7486. We have already touched on it. Do you come across many cases which might be described as incipient cases of mental disease?—Yes, quite a good number.

7487. And of that number are there cases which by treatment or temporary rest might escape certification altogether, if there were some provisional method of treating them?—Unquestionably; a very considerable number I think.

7491. Of course in dealing with rate-aided cases you appreciate there may be difficulty?—In rate-aided cases it is most likely to be a mental hospital or a clinic of a general hospital. I take it that the clinic of a general hospital under a scheme of this sort would be a reception house for early cases, and I feel that if there were only liberty in the matter and relatives were consulted more, they would send their friends to places like Claybury or a mental hospital quite freely.

it may be thought undesirable to associate such a system as this with the existing régime. If you could dissociate the two, we would need to find some means of dealing with the cases. The general hospital occurs to one, but is it not the case that there is a considerable reluctance on the part of general hospitals to receive mental cases?—They will not receive them in their ordinary equipment but they have received them; it is a fact; it is in existence.

7493. There are some general hospitals which have wards for such cases?—Yes, and I think others will follow when they know more about the matter.

7494. Of course one can see at once how very desirable it would be if the incipient cases, cases to be under observation, could be taken to a general hospital where they would incur no stigma at all, any more than a person who breaks his leg in the street and is taken to St. Thomas's Hospital?—Might I suggest that if the certification stigma were removed, it would not make a great deal of difference where the patient went, provided that the accommodation was suitable.

7495. I am not sure that the public discriminate between being in an asylum and being a certified person in an asylum. The public is inclined to say: "He has gone to an asylum." It is rather the aspersion which is supposed to attach to having had to go to an asylum?—After all the stigma will attach to the facts and not to the name you give them.

7496. You may put it either way you like. The unfortunate malady has attracted to itself the stigma?—I know it is so now, but still the clinic of a general hospital may get to be known as the mad ward, and the stigma would remain, if there is any stigma—that I would dispute; I do not think there is necessarily any stigma attaching to these conditions. It is a false public notion.

7497. That is a very good definition of a stigma, is it not? What one is concerned with is, is it possible to dissociate this form of provisional treatment from the circumstances which at present deter people from resorting to the institution. There are deterrents, as you know, against being certified; nobody likes to have his relatives certified. One wants, therefore, to dissociate as far as possible the atmosphere in any such institution for observation and treatment of incipient cases from the asylum atmosphere. I rather gather you think that the general hospitals should brace themselves to undertake that work?—I think they should; obviously they cannot possibly undertake the whole of it, so that I feel that it is perfectly evident if all general hospitals did their duty in the matter and there were clinics, it would still be necessary to admit early cases to mental hospitals. Therefore every hospital should have the proper equipment.

7498. Would you rather see the unfortunate patient, the incipient case, in the asylum than in the general hospital?—I do not mind where they go. As I said just now, I hoped it would be a matter for choice. If you like to go to the general hospital, do so, but I am not sure that the general hospital can do so much good as the mental hospital in many cases. If I get a case that I see is obviously suffering from certification and is unsuitably placed in a mental hospital, I move heaven and earth to get that patient out and treated elsewhere; but I do not find that so in the majority of my cases. They do not mind being in a mental hospital particularly. Nobody likes to be in a hospital, whether it is mental or general, but, generally speaking, I think the majority of the patients who come in are grateful for the treatment they have had; at any rate, they express their gratitude, and I do not think that the majority say they have suffered from being there; others undoubtedly do. It is to those cases I would like to say, "Well, if you do not like my treatment and my hospital, your friends may remove you," and I do, in effect, do so.

7499. That is not quite the problem I was putting to you. It is rather this: that certification is really a barrier to treatment at the moment, because you have to have the process of certification with all that that means; and, after all, it does mean a good deal to an ordinary citizen to have to be taken before a justice of the peace and to have medical certificates, and so on. That could be avoided in incipient cases, and the case could be assimilated rather to an ordinary illness and dealt with on the same lines without these formalities?—But surely one way out of that is some form of provisional order under the voluntary boarder system.

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7500. It is very much on those lines that our minds have been working. You would approve, I suppose, of voluntary boarders in the asylums?—Yes.

7501. You would wish it done?—Yes.

7502. You have no boarding-out system such as has obtained a good deal in Scotland?—No, not exactly in force. Occasionally we let patients out, but not in the sense that Scotland does. I know roughly what the system is. There are not people in England whom I have discovered who will take the patients.

7503. As you know, to-morrow we are going to have evidence from the British Medical Association. Have you participated with them in the evidence they are going to give?—I was a member of the committee, yes.

7504. Then we may take it that you will be in agreement with the views presented to us to-morrow?—Yes.

7505. Mr. Micklem: Doctor Barham, in making provision in the future for people suffering from mental disorder, do you think it a wise thing to have such large institutions as your Claybury Hospital?—I hope if they build any more they will not build them so large; they are too large.

7506. They are almost out of hand, are they not?—I will not quite say that, but it is that very difficulty which we were discussing just now; the question of administration and medical work; the larger the institution the more is that accentuated.

7507. You have told us frankly that it is quite impossible for you to be conversant with the numerous cases that there are in the hospital?—I cannot know everybody in the hospital, certainly.

7508. Do you think your hospital is staffed sufficiently with doctors?—For the time being, yes. I can remember the time when there were five.

7509. You have seven now, have you?—We have gradually increased; we have increased in the last month, I think. The Council have allowed an eighth doctor.

7510. The figures you gave us with reference to the staff and the attendants cover Claybury Hall, as I understand, as well as the hospital?—Yes, that is so.

7511. In cases where patients are admitted, as I understand, you do not in the first place see them at all; they will be all seen by some of your medical staff?—I do not necessarily see them, no.

7512. The reception order lasts for a particular time, and then comes to an end unless some further certificate is given?—Yes, that is the eight-day certificate.

7513. Do you give that certificate?—I will give it in the vast majority of cases, but naturally I have to be absent sometimes from the hospital, and then it is done by my deputy.

7514. But in most cases you will personally give it?—In most cases I will personally examine the patient and write a statement.

7515. At the end of the year, for instance, when there has to be a continuation of the reception order, would you personally examine the patient in every case?—In the majority of cases, yes.

7516. Earl Russell: And where you do not examine them you do not give the certificate?—No, the deputy who examines will sign the certificate.

7517. Mr. Micklem: In your précis you say that every patient in the hospital receives one statutory visit by the medical officer per day?—Yes.

7518. I do not quite know what that refers to?—I think it is a statutory matter that he should be seen every day by the medical officer.

7519. Do you mean there is some provision in the Lunacy Act to that effect?—Yes.

Earl Russell: I have been looking it up and cannot find it.

Witness: I think it will probably be in the Commissioners' Rules, anyway; but it is a recognised thing, and it is the rule of the committee that a medical officer shall visit his ward and see every one of his patients every day.

7520. Mr. Micklem: Does that mean an individual interview, so to speak?—No, that would be almost impossible.

7521. It simply means that he goes to the wards?—He goes there, and every patient has an opportunity of seeing him and of making a complaint.

7522. When an application is made for discharge, are those cases all ultimately brought to you, or would the doctors under you make the orders?—That will depend upon the nature of the application. If it is an obviously undesirable one or one that I know has been made before, as frequently happens, as a matter of fact I would not necessarily see that patient. I have friends who apply every committee day very nearly—cases which are impossible to let out.

7523. Are all those cases very carefully considered by you or by one of the doctors?—Yes, certainly, as a rule. If it is any question I do not know about, I first of all receive the doctor's special report upon it, and, secondly, I see the patient personally and see whether I agree with that report.

7524. In your opinion is there any reasonable possibility of a patient being detained in your hospital at a time when he has recovered from insanity?—No, I do not think so. I consider that discharge is exceptionally easy, except in cases that are positively dangerous to themselves or to the public.

7525. Miss Madeleine Symons: Dr. Barham, you told us that 60 per cent. of the patients were occupied in some way?—Yes.

7526. Of course, that is very largely outdoor work?—Yes.

7527. What about the women patients, those who do not actually work in the laundry or in the kitchen—are there any special occupations for them?—No. You mean art work, mat-making, and so on?

7528. Yes, I was just wondering whether anything was done?—No, I have nothing of that kind organised. I have seen such things in mental hospitals and have admired them very much. There is a certain amount of needlework of various kinds, either in the workroom or the laundry, for the women to work at; but, of course, the bulk of the patients will always be doing domestic work—assisting in the kitchens, mess-rooms, and so on.

7531. I want to ask you a little more about the question Mr. Micklem put to you with regard to the size of an asylum. Of course in a large asylum you have better opportunity, I suppose, for classification,

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

for arranging work and for arranging entertainments and for general administrative things of that sort?—That is so, yes.

7532. As against that, of course you have necessarily rather less individual attention and much less individual knowledge on the part of the head of the asylum?—That must be so.

7534. Now you gave us a figure at the beginning of your evidence of the admission in the year of 503 patients?—Yes.*

7535. And a discharge in the year of 195 patients—or was it 195 out of the 503?—It is 195, but not out of the 503 necessarily.

7536. And a death rate of 8.22 per cent.?—Yes.

7538. That leaves a remnant of 100 to 120 patients unaccounted for. Does that mean that the asylum population grows at the rate of 100 a year?—No.

7539. What happens to them?—I do not know that those discharges did not necessarily deal with transfers to other institutions, and of course the population will increase one year and will diminish in another; it is never stationary.

7540. On the figures you gave us you said there were 500 admissions a year and you accounted for 400 of them. I want to know what happens to the other 100?—You mean my averages?

7541. Yes?—I have given the death rate in the form of a percentage.

7542. 8.22. On your population I make that out at about 190 or 200?—The discharges of 195 refer, I think, entirely to those who leave the hospital recovered.

7543. Supposing you did not get rid of some surplus by transfers, does that mean that the people remaining certified will be increasing at the rate of 100 a year—is that what it means?—It would be so if that were true, but it does not mean that there is an increase at that rate; it would be impossible.

7544. My only difficulty is to see how they are disposed of, but perhaps there is some other explanation. You are going to give us some tables, I think, about early discharges?—Yes.

7545. Could you tell me, without preparing tables, if you get many discharges after five years or more in the institution?—Yes, there are discharges after 20 or 30 years.

7546. Quite a number?—No, not a number.

7547. Would it be any trouble to add to your *table discharges after, say, 5, 10, and 20 years?—No, not at all.

7548. I think it would be interesting to see how many recover after that time?—If I give it to you for the last five years it will certainly include cases that have been there over 20 years.

7549. Do you find it necessary to do much artificial feeding in the asylum or not?—Oh yes, a good deal of it.

7550. Is that done without any trouble on the whole?—As a rule, yes. Sometimes it is very difficult; sometimes it is quite easy.

7551. What provision in your asylum, and in the county asylums generally, is there for female bathing. Is it comparatively private?—On the whole I think I have very good arrangements. Claybury is a very luxuriously built place compared with some of them. The bathrooms are very capacious, and nearly all the baths are slipper baths, and are each provided with a cubicle. I have recently added a curtain to each cubicle so that each female, who wishes it, can be private.

7552. You have had no complaints?—No, I have not had a complaint about bathing for a long time.

7554. Now a question about admissions. You get a history of these cases when they are admitted, and in that information you learn how long they have been detained in some other place before they reach you?—Very often, yes.

7555. What do you find in London as to that? Do you find that they are detained for a week or fortnight in a workhouse infirmary, or elsewhere, or do they generally come in straight?—They have always been detained a certain time in the observation ward of a workhouse.

7556. Generally only the three days, or generally longer?—It varies very much; they may have been detained there for 14 days or more.

7557. Apart from any question of stigma as to certification, and so on, purely from the point of view of the patient's treatment, would you attach importance to their being brought to an asylum at the earliest possible moment?—I think it would be probably very much to the advantage of the patient.

7558. Of course that is at present impossible unless they are certified?—Yes.

7559. Just one other question about discharging. Have you ever known of a case of three members of a visiting committee discharging a patient against your advice?—Not a case under my supervision.

7560. Have you ever known one at all at Claybury?—No. I have heard of one.

7561. Mr. Jowitt: I want you to tell me a little more about the life in the asylum, the recreations and that sort of thing. Take this time of the year: the patients would be indoors, all of them, by what time?—Between four o'clock and half-past; it depends on the light.

7562. Then tea, the last formal meal of the day, takes place about five o'clock?—Yes.

7563. And then, as I follow it, unless the patients are ill, they do not go to bed until nine to half-past nine?—Yes, that is so, nine o'clock.

7564. Tea is over, let us say, about half-past five?—Yes.

7565. We have got an interval from half-past five to nine o'clock at this time of the year, which has got to be filled up somehow or other?—Yes.

7566. Tell me, first of all, with regard to the women: what do they do?—They have private work. They have music, and they read; and occasionally there would be an entertainment.

7567. Sometimes you have an exceptional evening with an entertainment; but take the normal ordinary evening—reading, music, and games?—Yes.

7568. Have you any organiser?—No, not for that kind of evening.

7569. Do you provide facilities like Halma, draughts, or cards, or whatever it may be?—I think I can best answer that question by saying what a ward looks like under these conditions.

7570. Please do.—If you go into a ward in an evening after the ordinary bedding time of sick people, you will find patients sitting round crocheting and knitting, and some are dancing, some may be playing the piano, or there is a gramophone in the ward; it varies; others will be playing cards, and some may be doing nothing at all.

7571. Such facilities as are necessary to enable them to play these games are provided for them?—Yes.

* See Appendix XXI.

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7572. And the same with regard to the men?—The men, of course, have their smoke in the evening, their cards, and billiards; most of them are able to play billiards of some sort.

7573. They have smokes provided for them, do they?—They earn it, you know.

7574. You told us that working was quite voluntary, but is there remuneration for work?—You cannot call it remuneration, but if a patient works he is entitled, if he is a male, to a certain amount of tobacco, and a woman gets some dry tea and sugar. They always get extra lunch and food for working.

7575. How often do you have entertainments?—Every week. On an average there is a weekly dance, and another entertainment of some sort.

7576. There of course the males and females are together; it is a joint affair?—Yes, it is a social evening. Now I have a cinema working.

7577. How often does that go?—If I get a film down I get it for three days, and people sitting up late will go in and see the film on a Thursday, and then there will be a long performance of it on Saturday.

7578. Amongst the various duties of the superintendent, do you have to select suitable films?—Yes, I have to have some control over them; they have to be cheerful.

7579. Do you remember what the last film you had was?—Yes.

7580. What was it?—I cannot recall its title, but it made me laugh very much; the patients enjoyed it immensely.

7581. Just one other question. You told us that your daily postbag was rather bulky, and that a good deal of that is internal—I mean to say it comes from the patients themselves?—I have a great many patients' letters addressed to me. I did not mean that when I was referring to my correspondence.

7582. But you do have a large number of patients' letters addressed to you?—An enormous number, yes.

7583. What topics do they deal with? Are a large percentage of them requests to be discharged?—I should say rather a small percentage are of that type, but quite a number, of course.

7584. A substantial number, anyhow?—Yes.

7585. And then I suppose a large number deal with complaints, either real or imaginary?—Yes, and the bulk of them I should say are absolute nonsense; I mean you cannot understand what they mean; they are illiterate, and they have delusional ideas.

7586. You gave us an instance of one man who was reluctant to go. That is quite exceptional, is it not?—Not so exceptional as one would think. I think, of course, it is part of a state of slight deterioration of mind in which initiative goes, and a patient hesitates to face the world again sometimes.

7587. But the other class is a good deal commoner, I suppose?—Yes, they would much rather go out.

7588. I suppose you are worried a good deal by patients who are importuning you to be allowed to go out?—A good deal, yes.

7589. That is the most responsible part, perhaps, of your task?—I always look upon it as such.

7590. And, if I may say so, it seems to be one of extreme difficulty?—I do find it very difficult.

7591. I ask you that because it seems to me that you assented rather too readily to a question put to you. You said there was no reasonable possibility of a patient being detained who ought to be allowed out. That all depends upon whether the doctor makes a mistake?—Yes; he is fallible like anybody else.

7594. How would you formulate to yourself the question which you ask yourself? (Would you ask yourself: is this person suffering from some disease of the mind? Or would you ask yourself: can I discharge this person without any reasonable apprehension of danger?—I should ask myself both questions.

7595. Supposing you came to the conclusion that the person could be discharged without any apprehension of danger, either to himself or to the public, but at the same time was suffering from some disease of the mind, would you keep the patient in?—Not if the patient wanted to go out, or the relatives wanted to take the patient out, or I thought from my own observation that the patient would be better away from the institution. That situation arises frequently, and I act upon those principles. I discharge a number of patients under conditions like that.

7596. Generally speaking, that is the test you apply?—Yes; I certainly consider the mental state of the patient, what degree of abnormality there may be present, and also the question of danger obviously arises.

7597. But, generally, if you are satisfied with what I may call the danger point, you would allow a patient out if that were the patient's wish?—Yes, with a proviso, I think, that I do feel called upon to exercise a certain amount of judgment as to whether the patient's wish is a wise one in every case. I would put the case again of patients who are constantly coming back to the hospital, patients who go out and stay out a few months, a week or two, or a day or two, and come back. If those patients ask me to let them go out again, although they may be extraordinarily well, I do not necessarily accede to their request; but I take a lot of trouble to satisfy myself that the home outside is suitable.

After a short adjournment:

7598. Mr. Jowitt: I had nearly finished all I wanted to ask you, Dr. Barham, when you told me about the difficulty which you experienced in making up your mind as to discharge, and the extreme responsibility of your task. I should just like to ask you this: in your view is it a question upon which a layman—I mean an intelligent layman—can form an opinion which is of any value, or is it purely a medical question?—I am sure an intelligent layman can form a very valuable opinion, though I do not think in every case it would entirely serve the purpose.

7599. But at any rate an intelligent layman has an opinion to which you would attach weight in making up your mind?—Yes, I should.

7600. As a matter of practice, when you have got to adjudicate upon a case, and to make up your mind as to whether or not a patient shall or shall not be discharged, what have you got to aid you? Of course, you have the opinion of your Deputy Medical Superintendent, or the medical officer in charge of the ward. Do you get opinions from anybody else?—Yes; I should take into consideration the opinion of everybody who is in contact with the patient, if I want it.

13 January, 1925.]

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7601. But those in contact with the patient are almost always, are they not, part of the establishment—I mean either doctors or nurses?—Yes, but not entirely. I should not be unprejudiced by the opinion of the hospital visitor, or of the chaplain.

7602. Do you find, as a matter of fact, that the opinion of the hospital visitor is sometimes useful to you?—Undoubtedly. My hospital visitor is a peculiarly tactful lady who never imposes her opinion upon me, but I appreciate everything she says; I consider it of value.

7603. It is quite obvious that you do attach very considerable weight and importance to what she says and what she does?—Undoubtedly.

7604. That is the homely touch, the extra-departmental touch, apart from the visiting committee?—Yes, and of course you would include the friends and relatives of the patients. I mean, there again their opinions are considered, and sometimes they are valuable; they are often perfectly worthless, of course. But if the friends happen to be intelligent and educated people and advance a certain point of view, it is always considered, of necessity.

7605. Do you find that the visiting committee (of course they have many duties to perform) as a matter of practice give you much assistance in the question of the discharge of individual cases?—The visiting committee as a rule only see cases that are recommended by me; but, of course, if a patient writes to the committee, and they see the patient in consequence, they sometimes come to a perfectly independent opinion as to what should be done with the case.

7606. With the exception of the hospital visitor, have you anybody outside your staff going round the wards, seeing people, and making suggestions or reports to you as to what they see or hear?—Reports to me about what?

7607. About the condition of patients, and possibly the discharge of patients?—We have the visits of the boards of guardians periodically, who come to see their own patients, or patients chargeable to their parish, that is to say. Then I have the official visitors, who come from time to time, and who often make suggestions.

7608. Does it not occur to you that without in any way wanting to belittle the official element, perhaps one might from this point of view usefully increase the unofficial element?—Yes, it does; in fact, it has been rather a policy of late to throw the hospitals open as much as possible. One tries to avoid, not only the appearance of the locked door, or the shut-up window, but, on the contrary, we are leaving doors open wherever we can, and removing blocks from windows, and at the same time encouraging outsiders to come in and visit as much as possible. My complaint is that the outside public do not want to see.

7609. You think the aim of the policy should be to encourage the outside public to come and see for themselves?—Very much so. It would be very helpful indeed if they knew what the inside of a hospital was like. The general observation that is made is one of intense surprise.

7610. And the mere fact of somebody being unofficial perhaps in itself commends itself to some of the patients?—I think undoubtedly it does.

7611. This system of the hospital visitor is the beginning of it, and it is a system which exists in some other mental hospitals?—Yes.

7612. But in a large number of mental hospitals they have no such visitor?—As far as I know, no.

7613. Now there is only just one other matter which I should like to ask you about, and that is with regard to the discharge section, Section 83 of the Act. When a patient has recovered, you send a notice. In the case of a non-pauper patient you send a notice to the person on whose petition the patient was certified. In the case of a rate-aided patient, a pauper patient, you send a notice to the board of guardians?—Yes.

7614. I am told that the pauper patients would value such a notice either being given to them, or being sent to their own relatives. Have you come across that at all—a request for a notice of recovery?—I think every relative gets such a notice.

7615. Is that so, as a matter of practice? The law is Section 83 of the Act. It does not seem to be so under the law?—Our practice in the case of a patient going on trial or discharge is to enter into correspondence with the friends, and to arrange for that trial. I could not do it without. Perhaps you are thinking of a case in which one is not very sure of the friends.

7616. I am thinking of Section 83 of the Act. The substance of it is this: That the superintendent of every hospital shall upon the recovery of a patient send notice thereof, in the case of a patient not a pauper, to the person on whose petition the reception order was made, and in the case of a pauper patient to the guardians of his union. I am told—you can tell me whether there is anything in it or not—that the pauper patients who are discharged would very much like the notice of recovery to be given either to them or to their relatives, or a duplicate of it?—I have no experience of such a request. It seems hardly to arise with the material that I deal with.

Chairman: It does not affect the merits of your question, Mr. Jowitt, but Section 83 does not apply to asylums such as Dr. Barham administers.

7618. In practice they do sometimes ask for a certificate?—Almost invariably I have to sign several certificates to say that a patient is discharged on such and such a date.

7619. And was discharged as recovered?—Yes, or as the case may be, whatever it was. That certificate is frequently asked for and given.

7620. But it is not given as matter of course. It is given by special request?—No.

7623. You appear to be quite satisfied with the experiment during the war of having one or two, or a few, female nurses upon the male side?—Yes.

7624. If you tried this experiment and were satisfied it was helpful to the patients, why was it not continued and developed after the war?—At Claybury it was discontinued for several reasons. First of all, the women went over to replace the men; when the men came back they had to resume their posts. Secondly, the structure at Claybury is not designed for the purpose, therefore there were arrangements which were not satisfactory, always causing a certain amount of anxiety; but it was not because I am not in favour of it; and, as my committee have under consideration the structure of two villas, one for male patients, I have advocated the nursing of that villa by women nurses.

Dr. G. F. BARHAM, M.D.

7625. That is to say, if those particular difficulties had not been in the way, you would probably have continued what you were doing?—Yes.

7626. There was a point about ex-service men being all put in one ward: does that mean that they are not classified in any way, that the noisy and refractory cases, for instance, would be in the same rooms as the quiet cases?—No, that is not so. There are 157 service patients roughly, and I have two almost entirely service wards, but those wards do not accommodate more than perhaps two-thirds of the patients. They are classified in those two wards in two categories, but any service patient who is sufficiently acute, and who would require an acute ward, would go to the wards provided; so the classification of ex-service patients is very much the same as the others, in fact.

7627. To me one of the most interesting suggestions in your evidence was that as to the value of the honorary hospital visitor. I would like to get your opinion, if I might, as to whether, based on experience, it is your opinion that one or more suitable voluntary visitors should be attached to mental hospitals?—Yes, I can find work for several.

7628. Helpful to the patients in every way?—Yes.

7629. You stated that you held an enquiry into cases of alleged ill-treatment on the part of attendants to patients. Is any minute or record of such enquiries kept?—Yes.

7630. With the evidence attached?—With the evidence attached, yes.

7631. Mrs. Mathew: I suppose, Dr. Barham, you attach great importance to dietary in the treatment of patients?—Yes, I do.

7634. Does the average patient ever have butter?—No.

butter (it is within my right to do so) for any patient I thought ought to have it.

7636. Then there was the question of supervision. When the patients are out in the fields, for instance, working, who supervises them?—It may be a farm labourer, and it may be what we call a garden nurse or attendant, or one of the gardeners, or artisans.

7637. Not a male nurse?—Those we call garden attendants are trained as male nurses; there are a certain number of those. They are under the supervision of an officer whose business it is to go round and inspect.

7638. Are those gardener nurses paid extra?—No.

7639. They are in fact labourers?—Not entirely, because they have certain duties in the hospital, and they have gone through ward experience, and very often they hold nursing certificates. They are paid at a different rate from the labourers, and they are interchangeable. Sometimes it is a question of ill-health. I have got ex-soldier nurses who, for various reasons, are better working out of doors all day long, and they are put on the garden staff.

7640. What are the gardener nurses paid?—The same rate as the indoor nurse. They start now at a total wage of £2 11s. 6d. a week, and they may rise to that of a chief charge nurse, which may raise them to £3 7s. 6d. That includes a bonus.

7641. Sir Humphry Rolleston: When you were speaking about the period between supper and the time at which they ordinarily went to bed, which I think you suggested was half-past nine, is it not within the power of the patients to go to bed earlier if they wish to? I mean they have not got to stay up and spend the time between six and nine—if they feel bored they can go to bed and sleep?—Absolutely, they can always go to bed and, as a matter of fact, since the later sitting up has been in vogue it is rather difficult even to suggest to some patients that they should sit up, they are rather inclined to go. There is no obstacle to their going to bed as a rule, I think.

7642. With regard to the difficult question of getting suitable women to take to nursing, I suppose that you have to take them at a comparatively early age, otherwise they are all specifically earmarked for something else?—Yes.

7643. What age do you take them at?—Eighteen.

7644. That of course is rather an early age for a girl to take up responsible duties?—I prefer them to be older, but it has been a necessity to lower the age to get the nurses.

7645. Do you think the proportion of those that stay comes to 25 per cent. of the entrants?—Do you mean the proportion that ultimately go through the training?

7646. Yes.—I think more than that, I am not prepared with the exact figures.

7649. Sir David Drummond: Dr. Barham, I judge that you would not countenance separation of the executive from the medical aspect of your appointment?—Again it is rather difficult for me to answer. All my interest is medical, or a great deal of it—I would not say all.

7650. Does the fact that the two are combined militate against the possibility, or the probability, of getting, if I may be allowed the expression, our best men in positions such as you occupy? We know you cannot imagine a physician to a general hospital having to do the executive work of the hospital as well; his interests would be all medical, and you, I take it, are appointed because of your executive knowledge and skill as well as your medical. The two are difficult to combine in general medicine, I take it?—They are, and one must militate against the other, I am sure. I mean this is such an old question that one has thought of it backwards and forwards, and I do not know how it can be done.

7651. If it could be done would you favour it—is that your idea?—Yes, I should. It seems to me to be very much like the high positions in the Army Medical Service, the higher you get the more administrative you become.

7652. Yes, but you know what was found during the war—a great deal of the work of the medical service was performed by non-military men?—Yes.

7653. You have had 21 years' experience, have you not, in this kind of work, I think?—Yes.

7654. During those 21 years have you seen great or fairly considerable advance in the management and treatment of the insane?—Yes, I have, undoubtedly.

7656. Particularly. You need not go over the whole subject?—As regards the actual medical treatment do you mean, or as regards the general care of the patient?

7659. But you do not judge by the number of recoveries?—No, because the recovery rate sometimes seems to go down the more you know about your cases; your discharge rate does not alter, or probably goes up. That is really a technical question, as to what you call a recovery. It does not alter the fact that I send patients out if they are not recovered, but if you are going to take a recovery rate and say what you really think to be recoveries, some have different standards. Some are very stringent and narrow.

7660. It is a little discouraging to think that though things have improved so much there are not a greater number of recoveries?—It is discouraging in a certain sense if you like, but there are many aspects of it which are quite encouraging as well.

7661. Now in what direction would you look for further improvements specially. If matters were to go on advancing, in which particular directions would you look for further improvements?—In a general way, as regards my hospital, I should like to see it linked up with a general hospital and attached to a school of medicine, and I should like to have the co-operation of an outside staff.

7662. An increased staff, perhaps?—And an increased internal staff. The further you go in this treatment, and the closer the investigation, the more medical men you will want.

7663. Sir Ernest Hiley: Dr. Barham, supposing you were able to divorce yourself entirely from the administrative side of your work, would it be possible to take complete control over all the patients in your institution?—No, I do not think even that. I mean I think the Board of Control consider, and I think quite rightly, but depending upon the nature of the case, that a section of more than 200 or 300 patients is undesirable.

7664. You have about 2,000?—2,400 nearly; we have nearly that number of beds now.

7665. So that even an examination of your subordinate's report on each patient every day would take up a good many hours?—Yes, it would, it does take up a lot of time; but again if one has acute and recent cases, 50 patients is a lot to look after.

7666. How many medical officers have you under you?—I have seven now. In considering that, it must be remembered that hundreds of patients want very little attention at all, many are practically looking after themselves within the supervision of the place.

7667. Do you think that medical staff adequate?—I consider it sufficient for the moment, but if work develops on certain lines I shall want more assistants. For instance, I have one medical officer whose time is taken up with pathology. He has a couple of laboratories, and an assistant, it is very important work; that may develop enormously. I could increase the medical staff considerably if that work were to develop.

7669. The question of medical supervision then does not come in?—I think one could easily quote institutions of, say, 300 or 400 patients with a medical superintendent and one medical officer, where in some of those places outside work is allowed. I do not know, I cannot say exactly, what supervision goes on; but it seems to me that with eight medical men in the place and with over 2,000 patients, the comparison is not unfavourable.

7670. You are satisfied that there is sufficient personal touch between the medical officers and the patients who require attention?—Yes.

7671. Just one other small point. Is there any real difficulty in altering the time of your evening meal—moving it on a little?—Yes, there is a real difficulty.

7672. What is it?—It is a question of kitchens.

7673. Do you mean the kitchen staff is to decide the time of the meal?—No, it is not the kitchen staff who decide it; but the kitchen staff, like all workers nowadays, have a certain limited week of work, and to meet that you have to close your kitchen down at a certain hour; it can be extended, but it may be very costly.

7674. Are the hours of the kitchen staff limited?—Yes, exactly; they have a 48-hour week.

7675. They come on and clock off?—Yes.

7676. And whatever is wanted in the institution has got to come within those hours?—Yes, unless you make special arrangements. Occasionally they are kept on, and the overtime question comes in.

7677. That is really the only objection?—That is the main objection, I think, yes. I think it will be overcome; it is a question which, I feel sure, will be solved shortly.

7678. I must say it seems rather a peculiar position if the patients cannot have a meal later because the cook wants to go out?—Well, you have got to remember this—it is a question in evolution. Until quite recently patients were all bedded by eight o'clock. That was the hour. The evening meal was some two hours before they went to bed, which was not unreasonable. These things come gradually. The process of altering the tea hour is coming after the sitting up. The sitting up at Claybury is not universal to-day. It exists on the male side; it is coming on the female side, and the modification of the tea or supper meal is under consideration, and is likely to follow. It is not an easy matter to organise.

7679. Are these kitchen rules the rules of the visiting committee, or are they trade union rules?—Primarily they are the rules of the visiting committee. They are responsible for the number of hours a cook works. The limit is 48 hours a week, and the time is arranged accordingly. It works perfectly well for bedding at eight o'clock, as I say, and it is a matter which only the committee can deal with really.

7680. Sir David Drummond: With reference to the attendance of the dentist—how often does your dentist attend?—He visits twice a week—two afternoons a week all the year round.

7681. Is he able to deal with 2,400 patients?—He is doing very excellent work, and it is often against a good deal of resistance.

Mr. Walter Stewart (representing the National Society for Lunacy Reform): Would you ask the witness, Sir, out of the 25s. maintenance a week rate at Claybury, how much is in respect of the simple diet that the patients have?

7682. Chairman: What would you say, Dr. Barham? I think the 25s. included establishment charges. How much of the 25s. is allocated to food?—I have not got the figure by me. For patients' food and provisions you mean?

7683. Chairman: Yes.—I believe the round figure (I speak subject to correction) for patients' provisions will be 5s. a week.

7684. Chairman: And how much for the attendants?—The attendant pays for his own food, and he is charged so much a week for it.

Mr. Stewart: I can give you the Board of Control figure for 1923: 4s. 3½d. for patients, so it is better; it is now 5s.

Chairman: If it was 4s. 3d. in 1923, prices are rather down since 1923, are they not?

Witness: The dietary has increased since 1923. I know it is veering round about that figure, but I have not got it in my mind.

7685. Can you get that figure?—Yes, I can send it to you.*

7686. Can you give the comparable figure for the attendants?—Quite easily, yes.

Mr. Stewart: Would you ask the witness if he is acquainted with the report of the Inter-departmental Committee appointed to inquire into this question of diet, and that they reported in 1924 that out of the 95 mental hospitals whose diet they investigated only six showed returns of any sort of food after tea time. That is at page 65.

Chairman: Does it matter whether he knows, if it is reported as a fact? I have read it already I may say.

Mr. Stewart: Your institution was one of the six, I take it, in 1924?

7687. Chairman: He has no meal after six, you know. His last meal is five o'clock, except for something that they may save. (To the Witness): I think

*Note.—The cost of provisions for patients for the year 1923 was 4s. 7½d.; and for 1924, 5s. 0½d. per week. The charge made to a nurse if she takes all her meals in the hospital is 14s. per week.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Miss VICKERS, called and examined.

7695. Chairman: Miss Vickers, you are Secretary of the Mental After Care Association?—Yes.

7696. Is that an Association which has its offices close by—at the Church House in Dean's Yard?—Yes.

your last stated meal is at five o'clock at Claybury?—Yes.

Mr. Stewart: I thought he supplemented it. Could the witness tell us, if you think it right he should, how many of the newly-admitted patients are accommodated in the admission ward, and how many in the quiet ward that he spoke of.

Witness: Well, the female admission ward, I think, has 55 beds in it, and the quiet ward contains 23 approximately.

7688. Chairman: I suppose the numbers in those would fluctuate with the character of the cases that come in?—Precisely.

7689. Mr. Stewart: Then with regard to the treatment, could the witness be asked how many of the 2,282 patients are the subject of psycho-analytical treatment?—In my experience in the last few years, perhaps four or five.

Mr. Stewart: That was one of the methods of special curative treatment which was stressed by the witness.

Witness: Might I correct that statement?

7690. Chairman: Yes.—I do not think I did stress that point. I pointed out, on the contrary, how rare it was that it was applicable.

7691. Mr. Stewart: Would the witness welcome any method whereby observation by the medical staff of the underlings amongst the attendants could be facilitated, so that cruelty, if there were any danger of it, could be prevented by observation?—I take it that the question suggests that the underlings, who I take it are the nurses and attendants, should be more directly supervised by the medical officers.

7692. Mr. Stewart: May I put the question, Sir, that occurs to those who instruct me? As in the case of a billiard room it is possible for a person outside to see what is going on inside without being himself observed, would it be desirable, in the opinion of the witness, that there should be some simple method of observation of the wards from without?—As a matter of fact it does exist.

7693. Do you regard that as desirable?—No, I should be loth to treat my staff like a spy, but I do not hesitate to walk around my hospital at all sorts of hours night and day, and it certainly is not always known where I am, nor is it known where other doctors are who are walking about. Obviously, for most of the time he is not there; and this question of supervision is, of course, a difficult one.

7694. Would the witness welcome the formation of a small class of convalescent patients which he would thereby be enabled to keep under his sustained personal observation, as he has to decide about discharge—a small percentage of convalescent patients under his individual sustained attention?—I should not in the least object. I think the work, as it is done in that respect by a very experienced doctor, can be equally well done, if not better, in the sense that he is less occupied with other matters than I am, and it does not in the least prevent me from having a considerable and close touch with the convalescent patients, patients that I know and see individually, and they are very often personal friends. They are people who are, of course, much more companionable. I may say I never refuse the request for, and I often invite, a personal interview. I had a patient for five hours in my office one afternoon—who has now gone out; I do give them personal interviews and let them talk themselves out, and I get a great deal out from the patient under those conditions.

Chairman: We are much obliged to you, Dr. Barham, for your kindness in coming, and for the great assistance you have given us in your evidence.

after illness. It is a charitable society, and nearly all the funds are raised voluntarily; but now that boards of guardians have seen the value of the work they are subscribing to the work. The Board of Control also gives us a private fund, but there is no official fund. When we receive cases on trial in our homes they have the usual maintenance grant while they are with us.

7698. Have you any rules of your Association? Have you any Report we could see?—Yes, I have.

7699. One would like to know the constitution of the Association.—May I hand this in? (Handing document to the Chairman.)

7700. I see you describe it as the only charity of the kind in the United Kingdom, and that you assist cases from all parts of the country?—Yes.

7701. What funds have you at your disposal? You say you get charitable contributions from the public; are those collected in the usual way?—Yes.

7702. And that you have some money from the guardians?—Yes.

7703. And then you receive some money from the Board of Control, not directly public funds, but from some special fund?—It is a private fund of theirs.

7704. Does that exhaust the sources of your income?—We have grants from the visiting committees and from the various mental hospitals almost throughout the country.

7705. Are your activities confined to London or do they extend throughout the country?—Last year we had cases from 117 different mental institutions, not only in London but throughout England, and from clinics, from observation wards, and from mental departments of general hospitals.

7707. Do you have a staff at these cottage homes?—Each cottage home is run by a retired mental nurse, so that they can understand the illness and not be afraid or nervous of anything that may happen; but in every case they are registered as boarding houses and we try to do away with the idea of an institution, so as to give them, as far as possible, a fresh start.

7708. What does your actual organisation at headquarters consist of? Have you any council?—Yes, we have a council of 32 members. A good many of them are doctors and others are people who are interested in this matter, chairmen of various visiting committees and members of boards of guardians.

7709. What executive staff have you, and people who visit, and so on?—We have six ladies who visit.

7710. Are they voluntary or are they paid?—They are paid, but they are supposed to give part of their services.

7711. The pay does not represent full remuneration?—No.

7712. Now let us see what your activities are. First of all, I suppose you make inquiries with regard to the home conditions of patients in advance of their being discharged?—That we consider one of the most valuable things we do, to find out really what the home conditions are and to what surroundings the people are going to be discharged, because if they are sent back to exactly the same conditions they are not likely to be any better when they go back; it is waste of time to send them back really.

7713. Who invokes your services?—The medical superintendents in almost every case.

7714. Are you informed in advance that a particular patient is convalescent, may shortly be discharged, and are you asked to ascertain the home conditions to which the patient is about to return?

—Yes. Then we go round and visit the homes and find out what we can, and establish friendly relations with the people to whom the patients are returning.

7715. We had a most interesting account from Doctor Barham this morning of a hospital visitor. What is the relationship of your inquiries to the inquiries which the hospital visitor would make?—The hospital visitor deals entirely with the patients still in the hospital, and we take them on from the time they leave, making a few inquiries before they leave. Doctor Barham is one of the doctors who sends us a list of his patients who are about to be discharged every fortnight, and we send him an account of the home and also whether the patient shall be allowed to be sent out on trial or not, and I think on this report the discharge will generally be decided by the committee. We also find out what chance there is of patients obtaining work, whether their clothing has got to be augmented, whether their tools are intact, and all that sort of thing.

7716. But the organisation is entirely voluntary?—Yes.

7717. As we know there is no provision made in the Statute for the services of such an organisation as yours. You supplement the public service with this voluntary aid?—Yes. It has been felt that this is almost a national work, and yet it obtains no official support in that way. I believe there was in the Bill which was dropped a provision for funds to be allocated to the after-care of patients discharged from mental institutions, and it was thought that it would be used to help our institution in increasing its work and its activities.

7718. In addition to investigating the home conditions to which a patient may return, I think that after patients have been released on trial or permanently, you also keep an eye upon them in their homes or wherever they may be?—Yes, we visit them and try to make them understand that we are someone who understands their illness, and is willing to help or advise them.

7719. Do you find the ex-patients appreciate your visits?—Oh, yes, and we find that for years afterwards, if they are in any trouble or difficulty, they write to us.

7720. Then you also, I suppose, consider whether they require further medical or surgical assistance?—Yes.

7721. And are you able to afford them such help?—Yes. Nearly all the doctors on the council will give them appointments free of charge, and we also take them to the various hospitals and supply them with teeth or glasses.

7722. Are you able out of your fund to help them to start in a trade or business?—Yes; we make grants for that when we are satisfied that there is quite a satisfactory start for them. Of course, many women go into residential posts which we find for them. We have also lately had homes which we have opened for paying patients, those who can afford to pay something; we take them in homes where they pay for themselves 35s. to four guineas a week—very carefully graded.

7723. Have I exhausted the various forms of your Society's activities, or are there any others?—Of course, we still like to keep in touch with them afterwards and let them feel that if they are in trouble they can come to us, because in so doing we feel that we prevent relapses to a great extent. We know all about their illness and we do our best to prevent anything causing a relapse.

7724. How much accommodation have you in those cottage homes?—We have 136 beds.

7725. Are they fully occupied always?—Yes, but I do not think we have ever refused a patient for want of accommodation; we have always one or more homes waiting that we can open.

7726. What is the condition of eligibility for admission to one of these homes?—They must be recommended by the medical superintendent as convalescent or recovered. We do not take cases that are unimproved.

13 January, 1925.]

Miss VICKERS.

7727. But in the large number of cases, of whom obviously only a small proportion can have the advantage of the cottage home, what is the principle on which you select those cases?—The medical superintendent does that. He writes to us and says, "I should like this patient to go into one of your homes," and we can generally fit them in between the time he lets us know and the date of his discharge committee.

7728. Are all the ex-patients you receive in that way rate-aided cases?—No. We have these homes for private patients who come from small hospitals or who have paid for themselves in the paying departments of large hospitals.

7729. Do some of those in your cottage homes pay and others not?—Yes.

7730. Is there no differentiation between them?—No, not in the homes to which they go.

7731. How many cases altogether has your Association assisted up to date?—Last year, 1,167 altogether. We had more before the end of the year; I think that was the figure on the 22nd December.

7732. And altogether up to date your Society was assisted, I gather, between 10,000 and 11,000 patients?—Yes.

7733. Do you think there is scope for an extension of your activities?—Yes. I think every mental hospital ought to have some branch of the work so that they can keep in touch with the people and get them a fresh start.

7736. You have not any provincial branches, have you?—Yes, we are forming them now. We are in touch with 43 medical superintendents who are desirous of forming branches of the work, and the whole scheme is being considered by them now.

7738. Are you in favour of the method of dealing with this by voluntary agency, employing in turn a certain number of paid officials?—Yes, I think the people prefer it altogether, someone from quite outside, quite a private person as far as they are concerned. Also with regard to the cottage homes, I always find they are very glad to go to quite a small one. There are five as a rule in most of the smaller ones, so that they get individual care, and we are able to find out just what they are fitted for and find them the right sort of post.

7739. Could you give us any idea what the cost per head of your guests is in one of these houses?—We pay 27s. 6d. in most of them.

7740. Is that all?—That covers board and maintenance and laundry. Some of them are a little more expensive; some are less.

7741. Will that cover your establishment charges, rent and everything?—That covers everything.

7742. For that are you able to give them good dietary?—Yes, we have never had any complaints about food; they are always very surprised at and pleased with what they have.

7743. You have no really official link between your Association and the asylums, but it is a voluntary relationship; they utilise your services?—Yes. The London County Council have always very much recommended that their medical superintendents should use our Association as far as possible, and so have the Board of Control.

7744. Do you approve of that type of relationship?—Yes.

7745. You think it is satisfactory?—Quite.

7746. And partly because it represents a transition from the institution on the official side to normal life?—Yes. I think it is a great stepping stone from the institution back to their home lives.

7747. We have heard a good deal about the desirability of publicity in connection with institutions of this sort. Do you find that the people who are in your organisation, the members of your Board, and so on, take an interest in the work?—Yes, very much.

7748. Do you find that they ever visit patients in the asylums?—I think those who are also members of the boards of guardians do, but I do not think many of the private ones do. I go down to see many of the hospitals in turn throughout England and Wales.

7749. That is the institutions of the London County Council and others?—Yes. I have been to a great many.

7750. Have you always found that you could have every information placed at your disposal?—Yes, I have never found any reluctance to tell me anything I want to know, or to show me anything I want to see. Of course, I see so many patients that I hear a great deal about the institutions. Altogether, I have interviewed over 7,000 patients.

7751. Has any obstacle been put in your way when visiting these institutions?—None.

7752. Have you been allowed to interview anybody you wished alone?—Yes, always alone.

7753. Have you discussed with them the circumstances under which they were proposing to return to ordinary life?—Yes; and of course when they come to see me at my office they talk very freely about their time in the hospitals.

7754. I am going to commit the indiscretion of asking you a question as to the impression you have yourself formed of the administration of the institutions you have seen?—My impression is entirely favourable. Of course there are minor complaints from time to time, but I think the majority of the people are very much surprised, after they have been in an institution, to find how much better everything is than they thought it would be, and how different the treatment is. I mean, they often say, if people who talk about it a lot outside could only come in, they would see how unfounded a great many of the complaints are.

7755. Do you think that some of the suspicion which attaches to such institutions is the relic of unhappier times when there was much more amiss than there is now?—Yes, I do. I think the people have very much more freedom altogether, and are treated quite differently now. I do not think any of them have grounds of complaint.

7756. It is not a question which was in your précis at all, and I ventured to ask you as a person who had visited a large number of institutions what your own candid opinion was?—I am very pleased to answer it.

7757. Mr. Micklem: Miss Vickers, have you been able to purchase these cottage homes?—No, we only rent them; we have not had the funds, unfortunately.

7758. Miss Madeleine Symons: Can you tell us, Miss Vickers, how many districts outside London have branches of the After-care Association?—Very few have at present, but Durham and Oxford are forming branches. Cardiff has formed one; York is talking of doing so, and four or five of the others up in the North.

7759. There is some kind of association, however loose, with those organisations?—Yes, by affiliation.

7760. You are suggesting a development of that?—Yes, all to be in touch and help one another with advice and experience.

7761. As to these cases that you have helped, are they all cases that have been certified, or are some of them early cases sent to you by clinics?—A few have been sent out from observation wards, not certifiable at the end of the period of detention, and a few of them have been treated at the out-patient departments of general hospitals, the Mental Department at St. Thomas's and Guy's, and so on.

7762. So they are not all certified?—No.

7763. Could you tell us anything about the steps you take to find work for them?—We generally advertise and quite frankly state that the person has had a mental illness, because we think it is only fair to the employer and to the patients; but we tell the employer that we regard it as a secret between the patient, ourselves and the employer; otherwise I think we should be doing an injustice to the patient, and the employer.

7764. Do you mean that you obtain work for the patients mostly by advertisement?—Certainly, by advertisement, and certain people help us to find posts; we have a number of employers who will always take some of our people.

7765. It is not done by the regular machinery of the Labour Exchanges, or anything of that kind?—No, we do not find them very much good, because most of the people cannot produce references, of course.

7766. Earl Russell: I think I am right in saying that Mr. Macdougall, who was Chairman of the London Council Council Asylums Committee, always took a very keen interest in your association, did he not?—Yes.

7767. Have you any objection to telling us what your expenses were last year?—£5,674 10s. 4d.

7768. Mr. Jowitt: Miss Vickers, I want, if I may, to join the Chairman in his indiscretion. You told us that you saw a very large number of patients after discharge from hospital?—Yes.

7769. I have no doubt that they unburden themselves quite freely to you?—Yes, they do.

7770. Would you mind telling me this: is it quite an exceptional thing to find any complaint made at all?—Yes, quite exceptional.

7771. The vast majority of patients who come out and see you express themselves as satisfied and contented with the treatment they have received?—Yes, a very large majority.

7772. I suppose you see hundreds in a year?—Yes.

7773. And it is quite a few who make any complaint at all?—I should think it is about 4 per cent., roughly speaking.

7774. Would quite a small number of those complaints have any reference to ill-treatment?—Quite; that would be still smaller.

7775. That would be very exceptional?—Yes.

7776. You might go through a whole year and perhaps have only two or three complaints of ill-treatment at all, although in the course of the year you would see hundreds of these patients?—Yes.

7777. The bulk of the complaints would be, what?—Perhaps one person complained that he or she was kicked or punched in the chest, or something like that, by a nurse.

7778. That is rather a case of cruelty?—That would be about one in the year.

7779. Would the bulk of them be about lack of privacy, and so on?—Yes, and not being discharged soon enough.

7780. That is the commonest type of complaint of all, is it?—Yes, it is really.

7781. Tell me, if I may continue my indiscretion, have you had any material upon which you could form an opinion as to whether that complaint—that is to say, not being discharged soon enough—is not well-founded in a considerable number of cases?—No, I do not think it is well-founded. Only in a very, very few cases have I ever been really convinced that it has been so.

7782. In certain cases you have?—Just a few, but very few in the course of six years.

7783. Mr. Snell: I understood you to say, Miss Vickers, that you board these ex-patients for 27s. 6d. per week?—Yes.

7784. Does that include all the establishment charges?—Well, we have to allow them pocket money and things of that sort.

7785. I was wondering whether under such a price you found you could give them a dietary sufficient to build them up after an illness such as they have had?—I wish I had some of the letters from the patients here to show you.

7786. It seems an extraordinarily low price?—Most of these people have gardens and poultry and things like that.

7787. Sir Humphry Rolleston: As far as I remember from the meeting we had in the City, Miss Vickers, you depend entirely for money on voluntary subscriptions?—Yes, except for the grants that are made to us with the cases on trial.

7788. But you do not get any substantial grant from any Government Department?—No. That is what we should like to have.

7789. Sir David Drummond: Is your approach ever resented?—No. I have only had two people who have refused to be visited in the last 14 months.

7790. You visit a large number of asylums, I gather?—Yes.

7791. Do you visit any in the North of England?—No, I have not seen any in the North.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Would you ask the witness if she usually gets into touch with the patients through the medical superintendents?

7792. Chairman: How do you come into touch with your cases for after-care?—As a rule through the medical superintendent, who sends us, in most instances, a list of patients who are about to be discharged and asks us to visit, or to visit as soon as the patient is discharged; in some cases to act as almoner for the grant, and in others to find any employment we can for them. Others apply through their friends; they get to hear of the work because there is a notice in most of the hospitals of the work, and the friends who visit hear of it and they come to see us and ask if we will visit as soon as the patients come out. In many instances we have letters from patients who are still under treatment hoping to come to us in a short time. The guardians occasionally notify us. Kensington notifies every patient chargeable to them.

7793. And in some cases the relatives?—Yes.

7794. How far do you think you are brought into contact with all the cases? To what extent do your activities cover all the rate-aided cases that are discharged?—I think last year there were between 6,000 and 7,000 discharges—something like that number. There are among those all the people who have comfortable homes to go to, senile cases, and so on.

7795. I was just wondering how far your labours are co-extensive with the demand?—One of the members of the Board of Control was saying that he hoped before long every case would be notified to us; they are anxious for it to be so, but of course we cannot go further afield without further funds.

Chairman: We are very much obliged to you for your evidence to-day, Miss Vickers.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Evidence (on behalf of the British Medical Association) of: Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P. (London), Member Medico-Psychological Association, Chairman of Lunacy Law Committee, B.M.A.; Dr. J. W. BONE, M.B., C.M. (Luton); Dr. F. H. EDWARDS, M.D., M.R.C.P. (London), Member Medico-Psychological Association, Medical Superintendent, Camberwell House; Dr. C. O. HAWTHORNE, F.R.C.P., M.D. (London), Consulting Physician, Hampstead and N.W. London Hospital; Dr. E. W. G. MASTERMAN, M.D., F.R.C.S. (London), Medical Superintendent, St. Giles Hospital; Dr. CHRISTINE MURRELL, M.D. in Mental Diseases and Psychology (London), late Clinical Assistant, Northumberland County Asylum; Sir JENNER VERRALL, LL.D., L.R.C.P., M.R.C.S. (Leatherhead), Consulting Surgeon, Sussex County Hospital; Dr. C. COURTENAY LORD, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., Assistant Medical Secretary of the Association.

7796. Chairman: We have before us this morning representatives of the British Medical Association who have come to assist our deliberations by giving evidence. The Commission have received from the Association a valuable memorandum summarising the views entertained by the Association on the subject matter of our reference. We recognise that it is a considered and deliberate statement of the views of the Association, and I think it is desirable that we should preserve the statement in the form in which it has been drawn up, obviously with great care; and we therefore intend to incorporate in the record of our proceedings the memorandum* as it stands in its entirety. At the same time it would be very desirable to investigate a little more in detail some of the topics which are dealt with in that memorandum; and we propose to utilise this sitting by going into those various matters, elucidating any points of difficulty and expanding other matters which are dealt with in more summary fashion in the memorandum. I understand that Dr. Langdon-Down is good enough to act as spokesman this morning for his colleagues. It is superfluous that we should place anything on our notes as to the standing of the British Medical Association. Of course, it is recognised that the Association speaks for the profession throughout the country, and that it uses in this matter the most authoritative voice.

I understand that when the announcement was made that this Royal Commission had been set up, the Council of your Association appointed a special Committee to consider possible modifications of the Lunacy Laws?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): Yes, that is so.

7797. And to prepare evidence for submission to our Commission?—That is so.

7801. I have been struck in reading your memorandum with one aspect of the case—that while mental ailments differ in this important respect to which you allude in paragraph 8, on the other hand there are varieties and degrees of mental ailments which do not necessarily involve compulsory restraint—I mean compulsory restraint is not necessarily incidental to every case of mental ailment?—Yes. On that point I would specially call attention to the fact that that is one of the difficulties inherent in the present position; the Lunacy Acts only regard mental disorder from the point of view, as far as I can judge, of detention and restraint.

7803. But you point out in the course of your memorandum that there are, as I put it, varieties and degrees of mental ailments which do not require the putting in force of those compulsory powers of detention?—Yes.

7804. It is not every case of mental unsoundness that requires compulsory detention?—No.

7806. The special element of compulsion in the treatment of mental disease is only necessary, is it not, in cases where the patient is unwilling to be detained, is unable to co-operate in his own treatment, and therefore must for his own good be subjected to the unusual measure of compulsory detention?—Yes, either for his own good, and of those about him, or for the protection of the public.

7807. And again I think that running through the whole of this memorandum there is emphasis upon the criterion whether the case is one in which it is necessary to invoke the exceptional measures of the Lunacy Act, or whether the case is one which, consistently with its own good and the safety of the public, can be treated without resort to such measures?—Yes. At present the voluntary treatment to which you refer, the consent of the patient to treatment, has been very little used, because, as you are aware, at present the voluntary boarder system only applies to a limited number of institutions under the Act; therefore for the most part the compulsory element is predominant to-day.

7808. I would infer from your memorandum that in the view of the profession the extreme measure of the reception order, the compulsory order, should be the last resort rather than the first resort?—Exactly. It should be recognised that there are stages before that.

7809. And, further, in considering the stages before the last resort is reached, there may be more than one expedient which can be resorted to in the interest of the patient and of the public?—Yes, certainly.

7810. You suggest a grading, if I may so put it, of the cases, a classification of the cases?—Partly that, and partly that the processes should be step by step, instead of precipitate.

7811. Again we are talking of general policy just now, and one wants to get the principles in one's mind. It is useful if one takes the larger view first before coming to the details. The view being that certification is really the last resort instead of the first resort, you take this further view, that if various methods adapted to different cases were introduced or developed, there would be a tendency to avoid to a large extent the unfortunate consequences of certification, which seem to be firstly to prevent people coming for early treatment, and, secondly, to involve an unnecessary stigma upon persons who have suffered from this particular form of ailment?—Yes. What we feel is that the machinery for its purpose, which is rather an eighteenth and nineteenth century purpose, is very effective and on the whole works very well, and, as a matter of fact, we think the machinery is almost too efficient; at all events, it tends to obstruct the twentieth century attitude towards disease; and what we want to do is to get a new attitude, I think, both on the part of the profession, and more especially on the part of the public, towards the handling of these diseases. The public attitude will not be changed until the provision made for the treatment of the disease and the medical knowledge available are different and better and more varied. I think you will see my point of view.

7813. Of course, one must recognise this also, must not one, that this particular form of ailment in its various manifestations is peculiarly obscure in its causation?—Extraordinarily difficult, yes.

7814. You are dealing, whatever be one's views on the matter, with an element in life that is different from the ordinary pathology of the broken leg, or the dyspeptic patient?—Yes. I think in any case it would have been the last field for medicine to develop apart from the circumstances, but the circumstances have made development difficult, I think.

7815. Of course, there are two aspects of the question. There is one, the legal aspect, which is this: to what extent is it legitimate or necessary to interfere with the liberty of the subject? And there is the medical aspect: what is the appropriate treatment for such cases? And the two seem to be associated, because in order to give appropriate treatment in certain cases it is necessary to invoke a legal element of restraint?—Yes.

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

7816. And we come back again to what I started with, the accommodation of those two interests?—We recognise the difficulty. We are not prepared to lay down any complete solution, I think.

7818. Now as a result of the consideration of the present position, I think the Association has selected a number of points in the existing law and administration upon which they have suggestions of amendment to make. You have already said that in your study of the existing law you have been impressed with the number of safeguards from the legal point of view contained in the present code?—Yes.

7820. That evidence, of course, would no doubt be obtained from medical superintendents?—Doctors, yes. Of course, we could not cover an extraordinarily wide field, but we invited information in the Journal, and put specific questions to the gentlemen whom we asked to attend.

7821. The criticism from the point of view of illegality of detention has not really emanated from the profession—that has emanated from outside?—No doubt.

7822. But I gather that so far as the safeguards under the existing system are concerned, you think, and the result of your investigation has been to assure you, that there is adequate protection?—It is so, yes.

7823. Then in paragraph 9 you say that “where the law appears to be defective is in the unsatisfactory character of its terminology, in the differences made in the treatment of patients because of differences in social or financial standing, in a failure to regard the person of unsound mind primarily as a patient—a sick person, and in the failure to provide adequate facilities for treatment without a reception order.” The first point, the question of terminology, is to a certain extent one of sentiment, is it not?—Yes.

7826. If you are desirous of encouraging persons to come, say, for early treatment, you do not want them to be discouraged by depressing associations clustering around the nomenclature of their state. I do not know what my colleagues feel about it, but I have been much impressed with the view that “person of unsound mind,” which is the phrase selected by the Association, seems to be the happiest phrase for the description of the persons we are concerned with. Do I understand your view to be that the “person of unsound mind” should be restricted to the class of case where legal measures have to be taken—that is to say, where compulsory detention is necessary?—Should be restricted to the class of case where the person is such a person as might properly be submitted, if necessary, to legal measures; yes.

7827. It is a phrase that would, of course, have to be defined, because there are all degrees of unsoundness of mind, and even your suggested voluntary patient would be abnormal, at least, in his mental condition?—We have suggested a definition, as you will notice, and we think that that is important, otherwise it will be used in a loose way which will only bring in confusion. The definition is on page 5 at the top. “‘Persons of unsound mind’ means persons who by reason of mental disorder may properly be taken charge of and detained for care and treatment.” The term “lunatic” was never defined in the Act, is not at present defined in the Act so far as a real definition goes; it is only certain synonyms that are stated. “Lunatic” means an idiot or person of unsound mind—that is the statement in the Act. Of course that does not define either of those words; it only says that they are in some ways synonymous.

7828. This also is not a definition in the medical sense at all, it is not a pathological definition?—No; that would be quite hopeless, I think, and quite useless.

7829. It proposes to define it by the question of whether the person is appropriate for a particular method of treatment or not?—Yes, exactly, that is what we want to fix upon, what are the particular measures to be applied to particular cases, that is much more important than other matters.

7830. Then under this definition no person would be classified as a person of unsound mind unless he was such a person that the measures available for compulsory detention were appropriate and applicable to his case?—Exactly.

7831. Short of the person of unsound mind so defined there would be a whole series of gradations of mental ailments?—Yes, quite so; they would all come under the heading “mental disorder,” and we suggest for the other cases the term “mental ailment,” just for clearness of understanding when we talk.

7833. I was thinking, for instance, of a voluntary patient who may be a person not of unsound mind, but who is to subject himself in an institution to certain terms, about not leaving within a certain time, and so on, which you do not impose upon a person who comes in with a broken leg to a hospital?—We do not impose that; we say the person shall be at liberty to submit to treatment under those terms in the various institutions which receive such patients; but we do not propose to put any legal obligation upon persons of that category being detained, nor should we regard it as a wrong thing for any person to treat such persons without a formal order.

7834. Of course we do not escape under your definition, or, indeed, under any definition, the difficulty of the classification of the individual patient. Whether the case is one where it is proper that the person should be taken charge of and detained for care and treatment or not, will always be a matter to be determined on the individual case and in reliance upon skilled judgment?—That is true, but we do suggest that with a greater variety of accommodation the difficulty will be eased.

7835. I think your suggestions do render it easier to work, but in the ultimate resort the discrimination between the person who must be detained, and the person who need not be detained, will always be a matter of discretionary judgment in the particular case?—Yes.

7836. And I suppose ultimately the discretionary judgment of the doctor who is attending the case?—Yes; it would be the discretionary judgment of the justice who signs the order.

7837. Proceeding on medical evidence?—Yes.

7838. And proceeding also, to some extent, upon his own judicial view of the case?—Certainly, yes.

7840. It would be a more deliberate judgment founded upon more data and more observation?—Yes, and, of course, therefore fewer mistakes.

7841. I should imagine that no system which human ingenuity can devise dealing with a matter of this nature could be absolutely perfect?—No, it is impossible.

7842. You always have the human equation in these matters, and there must be a margin of error in the application of any system?—We quite recognise that.

7843. But one's goal would be the elimination of error as far as possible?—Yes.

7844. And, of course, the effort of myself and my colleagues is to see whether we can assist in the elimination of possible error in the cases where error is possible, which always must be the cases about the borderland. I think that has been the effort, if I may say so, of your Association also?—Yes.

7845. As regards terminology, just to pursue that topic, you think that the expression "asylum" with its unfortunate associations should be abolished?—I think we are not very pronounced on that particular point.

7846. It is paragraph 10.—We say that the change may be justified. I think there are some members of our committee, at all events, who are quite content with the word "asylum." It is in its beginning a very harmless and proper and expressive word.

7847. I am afraid its etymology is not what the public think of; they think rather of its associations.—Yes, but the difficulty is that whatever word you apply will also be coloured by associations in the course of a very short time.

7848. I am afraid it will attract to itself the unhappy ideas which relate to such an institution?—Yes.

7849. But for the time being at least the use of the expression "mental hospital" seems to be more in the line of development?—Yes; that has already been adopted in many cases, and that is a very good reason for adopting it throughout.

7850. It is not a statutory term?—No.

7851. It has been adopted more or less at their own hand by certain officials?—Yes.

7852. But there is just the danger that it may in turn attract to itself unhappy associations?—Yes.

7853. That is one of the terms to which you draw attention. Then the word "lunatic" you have already discussed; etymologically of course it is merely a vestige of superstition?—Yes.

7854. And its associations also seem to be unnecessarily harsh. Your refer to Section 315 of the Lunacy Act of 1890 in this connection, and Section 315 has caused a good deal of anxiety to members of your profession, has it not?—Undoubtedly.

7856. And I understand that in the case of many patients whose condition is not very easy to diagnose, and who are sent to nursing homes for treatment, very difficult questions have arisen in the mind of the doctor who conducts the nursing home, as to whether he is within or without the law?—It is inevitably difficult. Patients do not remain in the same condition continuously to correspond to any Act of Parliament.

7857. Quite. I am afraid the human body does not regard the sections of Acts of Parliaments, therefore it is the same trouble that one has in the grading off at the other end, the recovery end?—Exactly.

7860. I follow, and probably the solution to which you are attending is to eliminate the cases in which this problem will arise?—Exactly, that is the point.

7861. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Will you indicate how the broad impression of a person of unsound mind differs from your definition, excepting in the provision that a person of unsound mind is a fit and proper person to be detained?—In our Committee who were discussing matters, I gathered that people were willing to apply the term of unsound mind to the very mildest forms of ailment for which no measures of control or detention were desirable, that is to say, it is used by some people, and perhaps pretty generally, to cover all mental disorders, all departures from the normal other than mental deficiency. That would be impossible and undesirable if you are going to apply the term “persons of unsound mind” to persons who need certain measures of restraint and control.

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

7862. Chairman: It looks as if this specialised connotation which you are going to give to a person of unsound mind has perhaps one disadvantage, and that is, that it dissociates it from reality, because a person of unsound mind may be of all degrees of unsound mind, but in the technical sense is a person whose unsoundness has reached such a stage as to justify detention?—Yes. You must reserve certain words for certain purposes, and we suggest for the general purpose we should reserve the term “mental disorder,” then we should be clear. “Mental disorder” does not necessarily connote the need for detention or control. Where that arises then let us reserve for those who are properly to be submitted to measures of restraint and control “persons of unsound mind”—then we are clear.

7863. Then the whole class of those who are disordered mentally would be divided into two. On the one hand there would be the person who is not of sound mind in the technical sense, and, on the other hand, there would be a large class of persons whose minds, though disordered, are not unsound in the technical sense?—Exactly.

7864. Are we to give them a name, or are we just to leave them at large?—We suggest the term “mental ailment,” or the “mentally ailing” for the intermediate class, for convenience.

7868. I think that that conception is one of very great value; the conception that before the person is classified as a lunatic in the old sense, a certified person with all that that entails, there should be a series of stages for observation, diagnosis, prognosis and preliminaries of all sorts, which will protect the subject against resort to what, after all, ought to be the last resort, the certification. That seems to be the general scheme on which the whole of your principles are based?—Yes.

7869. Then do you and your colleagues think that the very real difficulty which arises just now under Section 315, although it would not be eliminated by your definition, would be alleviated by the definition in conjunction with the other proposals which you have to make for what I may call preliminary treatment?—That is our view, yes.

7871. But I suppose it will depend very much upon the temperament of the particular medical attendant as to whether he is afraid of the law, or not afraid of the law—whether he is prepared to take risks, or not?—Yes.

7872. That one recognises is a rather undesirable state of matters?—Yes.

Sir David Drummond: Does it not entirely turn upon the question of whether the patient is certifiable or not? It is conceivable that many patients may be of unsound mind in a sense, and yet not certifiable.

Chairman: I think the difficulty of the particular case is that the medical attendant has a patient—he is not sure whether he is a certifiable case or not—he sends him to a nursing home where he is taken charge of for payment by a brother practitioner, the brother practitioner is also not quite sure whether the patient is certifiable or not; if in fact he is certifiable, then an offence has been committed.

Sir David Drummond: Is not that the whole crux of the question?

Witness: We try to avoid the word “certifiable,” as I daresay you have observed in the document. We say, “a proper person to be placed under a formal reception order.”

7873. Earl Russell: It involves consideration of exactly the same facts?—It does, but still it has a different implication and suggestion; but the point I was going to make is this: We have laid down here in our definition certain criteria which shall enable you to judge, and those criteria were never laid down before, that is to say, does the patient in fact need and have for his treatment measures of restraint?

7875. Sir David Drummond: That is just the question of licence again, is it not?—I am not quite sure what Sir David means by licence, but it would not mean the formal full certification certainly; there would be no doubt some possibility of knowing about these patients, but it would be a very different thing, I take it, from the full reception order at all events in the view of the public, which is what we are aiming at partly.

7876. Chairman: But you would still be left, I think, with at least a residuum of cases, as to which it might be difficult to say whether the particular patient was one who did or did not fall within even your improved definition of “person of unsound mind”?—I quite agree; we have not completely solved all the difficulties.

Sir David Drummond: May I ask whether the witness proposes to eliminate all kinds of restraint in connection with the early cases, e.g., the 72-hours notice?

Chairman: I do not think that is the view, is it?

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

Witness: Oh no. Taking that 72 hours, I imagine the patient is under full control.

7880. Turning from Section 315 of the Act to the Form 16 to which you make reference, it uses the expression "mental disability." I see you find that a useful and convenient phrase?—Yes, we think it is useful and convenient, and being useful and convenient we say why not use it throughout for similar cases?

7882. Mental disorder is the genus, so to speak?—Yes. Of course, those who are mentally unsound are obviously mentally disabled from managing their affairs. But among the mentally ailing there are some who are able to manage their affairs, or, at all events, do not need to be treated as mentally disabled from that point of view; but there are others who are mentally disabled from managing their affairs, and for them arrangements for the management of their property should properly be made.

7883. This, of course, relates only to a property matter?—Yes.

to show where these people come in this scheme, and to suggest a uniform term for them. The provisions for managing their property, as you are aware, already exist.

7885. Yes, Section 116. I think probably there is a certain lack of uniformity of expression throughout the statutes. In Section 116, sub-section (1) and paragraph (d), to which you also refer, we have a class of person who is described as a person "not so detained and not found a lunatic by inquisition, with regard to whom it is proved to the satisfaction of the Judge in Lunacy that such person is through mental infirmity arising from disease or age incapable of managing his affairs"?—Yes.

7887. The scheme which you set out in paragraph 23 of your memorandum as a scientific classification of cases starts with "mental abnormality" as the genus?—That is so as not to lose sight of the other group of "mental deficiency." I may say that we hardly claim to lay down a scientific classification in this little table, but only a convenient logical arrangement. "Mental abnormality" includes both "mental deficiency" and "mental disorder." I understand that you are here not dealing with "mental deficiency" at all.

7888. No.—It is the other sub-division, "mental disorder," that we are concerned with.

7889. It may be treated as a subgenus for our purpose?—We wanted to show where we place "mental deficiency" in relation to this.

7890. I confess I was a good deal puzzled when I read the definition of "mental deficiency" in the Act of 1913; it seems to me to cover a very large number of things which the ordinary layman would call "mental disorder," not only the congenital case, but a number of other cases which would fall into the category of lunacy. I do not know whether the medical profession find it easier to relegate cases to the one category or to the other. You remember the definition under the Mental Deficiency Act?—I do very well, yes.

7891. It is certainly very remarkable. It includes idiots and imbeciles, both of which categories are more or less intended to cover the congenital case. Then it goes on to feeble-minded persons—that is probably intended to cover congenital cases also, and then moral imbeciles. Some of these cases struck me as cases which might be possibly found in the other category of "lunatic," and certainly I imagine there are cases of that sort to be found in asylum records, are there not?—Yes, undoubtedly there tends to be in nature an overlapping here, but the unfortunate thing about the Mental Deficiency Act was that it endeavoured to set up a psychological classification to some extent of these patients; and it is partly with that in our minds that we suggest you should not attempt any scientific definition of mental disorder or mental unsoundness. The real thing is that you should get the practical measures adopted and provided which are needed for dealing with these young persons for the most part; their malady begins either from birth or at an early age. That is the essential factor, and they need, even where they are really at the beginning of insanity, different treatment in different institutions from the fully-grown insane.

7892. Of course, we have not to consider, as you know, the Act of 1913, or the case of "mental defectives." You select therefore as your genus "mental abnormality" for the purpose of including both classes, i.e., the case of the "mental defectives" who probably fall under the Act of 1913, and the case of "mental disorder," which is taken by you as the class of case governed by the Lunacy Acts?—Quite so. I must safeguard myself again in saying that

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

the Lunacy Act only regards the persons who need detention and control.

7894. Is it Section 50, "Provisions as to approved homes"?—Yes.

7896. It excludes from such a place the persons who are subject to an order?—Yes, it recognises there are people who are "mental defectives" but who need not be made subject to an order. That is the point of my comparison.

7898. Sir David Drummond: Would you include under "mental ailments" all these cases that have a physical basis such as a condition of anæmia and other toxic conditions?—No doubt any mental symptoms would be mental ailments, but of course in that case the predominant fact is usually the physical one.

7899. Does it not complicate the whole question as to the law to deal with these cases?—I think I have already made it clear that large numbers of the mentally ailing will and must remain entirely outside the provisions of the statutes and the law.

7900. Chairman: I think that is so. We shall examine a little more closely the class on the left-hand side of your table here. You have given us your definition of the mentally unsound, but when we deal with the class of cases on the other side, what you call the "mentally ailing," I suppose that would include all sorts of people who are, for the time being, mentally disordered. Even the person who is in delirium would be mentally disordered for the time being, but of course he is not "mentally unsound." How we are to deal with him you will disclose in the sequel?—Yes. At all events I would safeguard myself against the suggestion that they should all be put under statutory arrangements.

7901. We have heard it suggested that in some of the Poor Law infirmaries where mental upset follows upon pneumonia or may be a symptom of Bright's disease, the patient is hurried off and certified because it is difficult to impose the necessary restraint in the infirmary; the patient is certified and taken to the asylum or removed to the mental ward. I think that is what Sir David is probably recalling.

Sir David Drummond: That and quite a number of other chronic conditions that depend upon a physical basis, which are dealt with in general hospitals.

7902. Chairman: I think you do not contemplate that that class of case would ever find its way into the category of the "mentally unsound" in the statutory sense?—No. All we want to do is that they shall not be lost sight of. We recognise their existence, as we must, and place them somewhere.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Before we leave this point, it is really perhaps rather a quibble, but I am not quite sure whether the term "mental abnormality" is preferable as a main heading to "mental disability," because one might say the term "mental abnormality" would apply to a good many who might be anything. Would not the term "mental disability" be a quite good one instead of "mental abnormality"?

Witness: You see we have selected a word already used in the Act, "mental disability" and applied it as far as possible to that particular purpose, to all cases that are allied to that particular case; therefore we are precluded to some extent from using that term for the biggest class of all without creating confusion. I know the difficulty of choosing right and proper words. Any word you may choose will have its difficulties.

7903. Chairman: There is a point, if I may suggest it to you, in Sir Humphry's criticism. Abnormality does not necessarily suggest a pathological condition, or a defective condition, because you may say of a person that he is abnormally clever. Disability does suggest defect of some sort or other, does suggest something that is less than the normal?—Well, what do you say to "mental disease"?

Mrs. Mathew: "Mentally deranged"?

7904. Chairman: I do not know whether you call a congenital idiot "mentally deranged"?—That is the difficulty.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: "Subnormality" would hardly do?

Witness: After all, there is no suggestion that these terms should be incorporated in any statutory document.

Chairman: No, but it is very useful; a discussion on terminology is never wasted, because it always brings one up against the real questions of principle which one has to consider.

Mr. Snell: I was wondering if there is such a person as the perfectly normal person. What is the normal?

Chairman: It is like what is known in law as the reasonable person who, I understand, does not exist.

Witness: In the same way if you use the word "disease" some people say that nobody is perfectly healthy.

Chairman: I do not suppose any of us is in the precise poise of health at the moment of which any doctor would say: "You are absolutely well."

Witness: No; so long as we understand the meaning we apply for the purpose of this document to that word, I think we shall be clear.

7905. Chairman: I do not think for the purposes of our investigation it is of so much importance what is the genus with which we start, because we do not become interested until we meet the class of "mental disorder." Your first classification is really outside our purview; we start with "mental disorder," and I think upon that, Sir Humphry, you have no difficulty with the phrase. We are concerned with the sub-classification under "Mental Disorder." (To the Witness.) May I just ask your view for the moment on the word "pauper." There again we have a word with unhappy associations, and the classification of patients into private and pauper patients runs, of course, through the statute at present?—Yes. You see the whole attitude of the law has altered since those words were introduced and it really is used factitiously now.

7906. It is a very artificial definition that is attached to the word "pauper" in the Lunacy Acts?—Yes, very.

7907. I shall want a little later on to consider with you how the element of Poor Law administration

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

comes into this topic at all. For the moment I will only say this, that it seems peculiar that a person stricken with this kind of ailment, and who obtains assistance and treatment, should by that very circumstance be classed as a pauper, although he may up to that time have been a well doing working man, or professional man; while the person who breaks his leg or who is damaged in an accident in the street, and is taken to St. Thomas's or St. George's, is accommodated there, treated, and in due course leaves, and nobody ever suggests he has been a pauper. But because a man gets the treatment which is given to patients mentally afflicted in a particular way, he thereby en route, so to speak, attracts the legal character of "pauper." We have been much impressed with this, particularly in the early part of our deliberations, that it seems an unfortunate thing that there should be added to the misfortune of the illness a social stigma of pauperisation. I am sure my colleagues share that view with me, but we will have to consider how that comes about. It is partly due to the fact that there are no places other than Poor Law premises to which a patient can be taken, and no places where he can be treated other than public institutions, that is to say, places which are rate-aided, with the exception, of course, of a certain number of the registered hospitals and licensed houses. Then do I take it that the view of the British Medical Association is that while we are about it we should try to eliminate, not merely the word "asylum" with its associations, but also, if possible, the word "pauper" from the Lunacy Acts?—Yes, and particularly with its associations.

7908. Of course if we can cut out the associations then we get rid of the word which is the result of those associations?—Yes.

7909. Now we come to your criticism of the procedure, apart from the matter of nomenclature. In the first place you emphasise the fact that at present persons are often deterred from resorting to institutions for treatment by those very associations to which we have been alluding?—Yes.

7910. The association on the one hand of the asylum and the association on the other hand of the notion of pauperisation, both of which elements enter into certification in so large a number of cases?—Yes. If I may enlarge a little, we hear from the people that have to deal with these cases that the public is partly deterred very much by the mere formality of the reception order. It really is a terror to many people. Then they say that the people complain, not of the treatment they receive in the institutions that they are placed in, but of the association, in the early days at all events, in the insane wards of the workhouses—the association with very objectionable cases from their point of view; and they object to the wearing of the workhouse clothes.

7911. On this question of clothing which I see you refer to in paragraph 25, I suppose that Carlyle was right when he regarded clothes as having a very important effect; he figured a certain House of the Legislature without clothes, and thought it would have lost most of its dignity; but it has, I suppose, a very important psychological effect upon the patient?—I think so, and a physical effect.

7912. But one has to remember, I suppose, that one is dealing with persons who may be in a peculiarly sensitive state, whose sensitiveness may be abnormal, and therefore things which to the robust mind might seem unimportant may have much more importance in the mental state of the patient?—Yes.

so were the men, and I asked "Are these provided by the rates?" and the answer was "Yes." "But," I said, "there is no uniformity among them." The answer was, "Oh, no, we do not put the patients here into uniforms because that is the very thing we want to avoid. It is destructive of individuality, and the sense of independence." It seemed to me that that made a great difference. If the clothes are varied, the drawback to their being provided by the rates has to a certain extent disappeared?—I was aware of that. When the patient reaches the institution, in many of the institutions the uniform is gone. I am simply recounting to you what we hear through our sources of information of the objections of the patients; and the objections of the patients are to the wearing of the workhouse clothes in workhouses, or on immediate reception during the first few days.

7914. What I wanted to get at was this, is the objection of the patient due to the fact that it is uniform, or is it due to the fact that it is provided by somebody else's money, and not their own?—I am afraid I cannot give you any useful answer to that. One of my colleagues says that no doubt the friends feel the indignity of clothing being supplied in that way.

7915. Of course one has to recognise this, that there are many cases unhappily which reach asylums, where neither the patient nor the patient's friends are in a position to supply clothes and renew clothes which would be suitable for the patient. I am afraid sometimes poor people are rather anxious to cling to garments which it is very undesirable they should retain in an institution; there is always great difficulty there?—I quite recognise that.

7916. In some cases it will always be essential, I take it, to supply clothes for a patient?—Yes.

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

safeguards. We have suggested a few modifications and improvements, but in the main we think the machinery is very good.

7921. But with those modifications, and the modification you are going to tell us about in a little while, the machine as a machine is probably as good as we can get?—I think so.

7922. Of course we always have to come back to this, that the machine is worked by fallible human beings?—Yes.

7924. On the other hand, one has to recognise that one is dealing with patients, with persons, that is to say, who for the time being are suffering and in whose case the multiplication of formalities seems undesirable. Certainly the person who is suffering from an ordinary physical ailment would like to have as little as possible to do with lawyers and justices, or anybody else. He wants to get off to bed and into the hands of a kind doctor as quickly as possible, whereas suggestions are made that in certification the formalities should be of quite an elaborate kind, and there should be cross-examination of witnesses and a more or less forensic tribunal set up before any person is deprived of liberty. That is one view that has been suggested?—We are aware that there are two streams of thought in the matter, one tending to the eighteenth and nineteenth century view, and the other tending to the twentieth century view; but we think that the risks of wrongful detention are infinitesimal, and that the stringency of the law vastly outweighs in the interests of the patient the ills that may arise from wrongful detention.

7926. And if one were to have elaborate machinery which would be very detrimental to a large number of patients but might possibly prevent one or two doubtful cases being improperly detained, which is the better course to adopt?—Oh, I think the welfare of the great majority of the patients. (Sir Jenner Verrall): But we so far increase the formality by suggesting that there should be two certificates, and that the magistrate should see the patient.

7927. Yes, but I rather put it in this way, that taking Dr. Langdon-Down's additional safeguards, taking it as so strengthened up, your view is that there is enough of the law about it?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): Yes, honestly. We have strong views upon the importance of safeguarding the liberty of the subject too—we are not at all apt to lose sight of that—our Committee I mean, and the Association; but honestly we feel that the safeguards will be adequate.

7929. It has been suggested that the patient shall be apprised that his liberty is at stake in this investigation, that the result of what may happen before the justice is that he may find himself detained against his will, that he should be afforded the assistance, shall we say, of a solicitor, or even possibly of counsel, at any rate legal assistance, to have the doctor or the relatives (in the case of an application by a relation) cross-examined, and a considered judgment arrived at by the judicial authority or justice of the peace after an investigation conducted on these lines. Now let us see where that would lead us. Take the case of a person who is really furious—I know that these cases are relatively few; the public are apt to think they are very much commoner than they are, but they do occur, of course. Let us take the case of real fury—such a person of course would not really be in a position to give instructions to any legal person, would he?—No.

7930. Can you conceive of any useful purpose in a judicial investigation in such a case?—No, I cannot.

7931. Then, on the other hand, there are cases, not of fury, but take the case of a patient with deep-seated melancholy, a lethargic case, who will not respond to any outside stimuli of any kind. Again such persons would not be able to avail themselves of any forensic machinery, would they?—No.

7932. Do you think it would be good for such a person to be brought into a forensic atmosphere, a controversial atmosphere?—Quite the reverse.

7933. I am putting for the moment the points against it rather than the points for it. If you had a person in a very unstable state of mind, possibly not over the score, but in a very upset state of mind, to hear his condition in his own presence discussed and debated, with possibly a prognosis of his future, in the presence of a justice of the peace, or of a judicial authority—would not that be rather distressing?—Most.

7934. I am very familiar with judicial disputes, because I have spent a good many years in that atmosphere, and I can imagine that if an unhappy patient, whose only desire was to get rest and peace for the time being, heard a solicitor cross-examining the doctor, and saying: "You examined this man, do you think there is any chance for him?" and the doctor may have to say: "No, I am afraid it is a hopeless case," it would be unhappy for the patient sitting by to hear that?—It would be terrible.

7936. Yes, but let me put this suggestion to you: It has been said that the intervention of the judicial authority, or the justice of the peace, is a mere formality?—It is what he likes to make it.

7937. Yes, but then the question is this: What ought he to be compelled to make it? For instance, we had one gentleman before us who said that the cases were brought to his house commonly in a taxicab, he was handed the medical certificates and he looked into the 'cab and said "All right" and signed them. That is hardly an exaggeration of that gentleman's evidence. He said the patients did not come out of the taxicab. I ask him if he took them into his house and discussed matters, and he said: "No," he was satisfied; he would look into the 'cab and sign the certificates?—Our view is that it is one of the most difficult questions that we have discussed among ourselves, this question of the justice, and we do not feel that it is our duty to lay down, or to advise you what should be laid down, with regard to the duties of the justice. We found it very difficult to define in our own minds how far the duties of the doctor went, and how far the duties of the judicial authority went in regard to this matter of the order. But we do feel that he should regard himself more or less as a court to satisfy himself that the evidence put before him is prima facie sound. I can conceive a case in which the certificates would be so convincing in their information, the evidence laid before him, that it would be really quite superfluous for him to do more than to look into the 'cab. What he has to do is to weigh the evidence before him; he has not got to descend into the arena and write a certificate, or go fully into the case and produce evidence as to the patient's insanity; he has not to be the expert, or to regard himself as the expert necessarily. All he has to satisfy himself about, in our view, is that the evidence put before him appears to be genuine, logical and convincing, that is to say, to justify the conclusions which are founded upon it.

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

7938. Earl Russell: I rather wanted to put this question to you upon that point: If the judicial authority is to act really as a court on very strong uncontradicted evidence, as he would in the majority of plain cases, he really need not do much more, need he, than be satisfied that the evidence is honestly given and that the patient appears to be on the face of it a proper patient for detention?—Yes, and that the patient has an opportunity of saying something if he wishes.

7939. Do you think that the justice ought to intimate to the patient that that is the time for him to say anything or not?—I think of course that the justice must be guided by the evidence given in the medical certificates as to the mental condition of the patient, the strength of the form before him.

7943. I think you are quite right to say that the question of legal machinery is really not in your province; but what I think is very much in your province is the welfare of the patient, and you can assist us upon the question of how far a more elaborate system of investigation might be prejudicial to the patient. That is a thing that is troubling my mind, I confess, a good deal. I cannot figure without dismay the holding of an investigation which would involve cross-examination and so on in the case of a patient suffering from mental upset?—Quite so. We have gone a very large way to meet those cases by the suggestion of a provisional order, where the patient is under supervision and observation for a time, and where it will be quite clear to him that his mental condition is under consideration, and where a right judgment will almost inevitably be formed, as far as human nature can form a correct judgment.

7944. The ordinary citizen accustomed to courts of justice figures the case where the evidence is not all on one side; that is to say, where testimony is directed to a particular end, and counter testimony is given, and evidence is explored critically. It is true, of course, though perhaps it may be due to the necessity of the case, that the evidence upon which a justice of the peace is called upon to proceed in certification is evidence from one side only. It is not subjected to what, after all, is the most searching and useful instrument of investigation, namely, cross-examination. It is one-sided evidence, and it must be so probably. Therefore it is not a judicial investigation in the ordinary sense; it is an administrative jurisdiction that he is exercising, but a discretionary jurisdiction founded upon evidence. The only point is this, that it is evidence from one side?—Yes. I think the answer to that question is to get some concrete cases of the certificates, and see them before you, and say: "Now, should a justice seeing these certificates have been satisfied to sign the order, or should he have gone further?"

7945. Now that raises, of course, a question at once. We shall assume the competence of the medical man. After all, we have to rely at some stage upon some person. We shall assume he has examined and has given his certificates, and we shall assume there are two certificates. These are examined by a justice of the peace, and the justice of the peace and his clerk are, no doubt, competent enough to see that the formalities, because they are fairly simple, are observed?—Yes.

7946. They are not competent, I should imagine, to say whether the data which are set out in the certificate lead necessarily to the inference that the person is of unsound mind. A justice cannot do that; that is the doctor's affair, is it not?—Yes.

7949. Earl Russell: I rather want to go back to the justices' difficulty because I do feel the difficulty. Assuming I were the judicial authority in this case, and that I were conscientiously anxious to do everything I ought to do, I do feel a difficulty if I am not in some way or other letting the patient understand that I am making some sort of enquiry, that is to say, if the case is in the least doubtful, so that he at any rate may have the opportunity of putting his version before me. Supposing afterwards he has been detained and when he recovered he turned round and said "Oh yes, it is perfectly true I saw you, but you never told me you were a justice, or had anything to do with it." Should I not feel that I had failed in my duty, and is it not difficult to know what a justice must do in these cases?—I think he must use his discretion. It is open to him, if he thinks it is right, to intimate to the patient before him that there was a special reason in this enquiry, and he should do so.

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

7950. I agree there may be only one per cent. of the cases in which real difficulty will arise, but it is in those cases that it is a little difficult for a conscientious justice to know whether he should give the patient some sort of opportunity?—I quite agree, but that is the solution we suggest.

7951. Chairman: We must bear in mind that the cases which attract public attention, and upon which unfortunately a good deal of the impression of the administration of this branch of the law depends, are not normal cases of treatment. It is the exceptional case, and people are liable to judge of the generality of the cases from these special cases; but we do not judge railway travelling in this country by an accident now and again. Therefore one must not judge of a system merely because it occasionally breaks down; but one is concerned to see that the possibilities of a breakdown at any stage are reduced to a minimum. Now on this question of apprising the person whose fate is in issue that judgment is being passed upon him by the justice of the peace, again you must envisage what actually happens. It would be rather a futile proceeding, would it not, to say to a person who was brought to you by a couple of men, and who was in a state of violent excitement, "My dear Sir, I am a justice of the peace; I hope you fully realise that I am about to perform my official functions." In that way again one must deal with these cases sensibly. As Lord Russell points out in one per cent., or possibly more cases, a patient is able to appreciate that something is happening to him, and does want to say something. No one can go through the wards of an asylum without knowing that there are a great many patients who are quite able to speak about their own condition, and to talk to you. It would be almost impossible to compel the justice of the peace to satisfy himself that in every case the patient realised he was being dealt with by a justice. On the other hand, there are a number of cases where the person is able to take quite an intelligent interest in what is happening to him, and where he would like to say things to the justice if he knew he was a justice. How are we to accommodate those two things, do you think?—I think it is by flexibility, and the spirit in which the justice deals with his certificates—the evidence before him.

7952. That comes back again to the discretion of the justice?—Yes.

7954. Yes?—There are other codes besides the law, and I would rather rely upon other codes, traditions, and the attitude of the public mind towards the law, than that the law should lay down precisely what he is to do.

tions?—Well, I think it is partly because the attitude has grown to be wrong. I think this constantly talking of certifying the patients tends to accentuate the matter—the power of the doctor to put a patient away; whereas if you stick to what really is the fact, the making of an order, the justice would realise more that something hangs upon him—a great deal hangs upon him.

7956. Miss Madeleine Symons: There was another difficulty on this point, which I think was brought before us in evidence on the right of the private patient to have a friend present when the justice is seeing him. That is rather difficult, is it not, unless the patient is given to understand something of what is at stake? I think we had that difficulty brought up by a justice who told us that he always visited the patients quite informally, and told them it was merely a friendly visit, because he felt so strongly it would be bad for them to suggest any formality or the purpose for which he had come. Presumably in a case of that kind the patient would not avail himself of the right under the Act to have a friend present, if he did not know in the least what was going to happen. That was a difficulty that I think arose?—But I suppose the justice would enter into conversation with the patient. He would either be satisfied that the evidence was valid and led to the conclusion that the patient should be dealt with as insane, or he would still be in doubt. He would then act accordingly. He could either go and see some of the friends, or he could tell the patient. He must use his discretion, it seems to me.

7957. Earl Russell: There is a statutory difficulty here. The section that Miss Symons has drawn attention to is Section 6, subsection (3), and that says that "The petition shall be considered in private, and no one except the petitioner, the alleged lunatic (unless the judicial authority shall in his discretion otherwise order), any one person appointed by the alleged lunatic for that purpose" and the persons signing the medical certificates shall be present; that is an actual statutory direction. Obviously the alleged lunatic cannot do that if he does not know what the purpose is and what is going on?—We are anxious to assist, but we really feel it is rather beyond our powers.

7958. Chairman: Yes. I do not think it is quite fair to put to you these legal difficulties, but the point to which you always come back is the question of how far proceedings are desirable in the interests of the patient. I am always thinking of the patient. I can imagine a person who is in a disturbed state of mind, and to whom every form of procedure is repugnant; the last thing he wants is to be exposed to a justice of the peace or anybody else?—I feel that to make it a general rule would be very unfortunate.

7959. Earl Russell: We might ask whether this statutory provision is difficult of fulfilment in many cases?—It is; in many cases it is a dead letter.

Chairman: One reads the Act, and all of us may feel that you may have what appears to be 'an admirable code; then you come to deal with the crude material of human beings, and you find one case—as I put it, the case of a furious maniac—is it possible to go through all the machinery of this Act of Parliament for the purpose of literal fulfilment of what is required here? On the other hand you may have cases of all varieties. I may say that in Scotland the certifying authority is the Sheriff substitute, who is the equivalent of the County Court Judge. Indeed he has a much larger jurisdiction in Scotland than the County Court Judge has here, and I know that the Sheriff substitutes in Scotland frequently decline to accept the medical certificate that is put before them; they read it through, and say, "That is not enough; I must have better evidence than that before I sign my certificate." He at once brings to bear upon it a trained mind; he is a trained lawyer with a responsible position.

Sir David Drummond: May I ask if the witness thinks the difficulty would be got over if special justices were appointed?

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

Witness: We have considered that, and we feel that anything which would add to the difficulties of getting easy access to a justice would be very much to the bad. If I may make a suggestion entirely my own, it is this, that there should be some method of training justices in their duty.

7960. Chairman: A school for justices?—It is a curious thing, but it is being done, I know, by the Central Association for Mental Welfare which is working under the Mental Deficiency Act; and they do hold courses for justices to make them familiar with the very difficult provisions of the Mental Deficiency Act, and quite a number of justices attend at these courses; so that something can be done. But if public opinion is focussed upon the point of view that the working of this Act does depend upon something more than a mere formality on the part of the justice, I think the justice will rise to the occasion.

7962. It may, at any rate, have that effect?—Yes.

7963. This is a matter out of the order of your précis, but I think we had better exhaust this topic while we are at it. You think that so far as the legal code is concerned, with certain improvements which you propose, it would be adequate. Now, looking at those improvements, I think the view of the Association is that there should be two medical certificates in every case?—We think so, yes.

7964. There are two certificates, as you know, required in the case of the private patient, and there are two certificates required in a certain class of pauper patients?—Yes.

7965. It is one of the anomalies which exist in the law?—Yes.

7966. Is it the considered view of the Association that no person should be certified and detained except upon two medical certificates?—It is, except, of course, in the case of the provisional order. I would also limit it to, say, where it is proposed to apply control, not in voluntary cases.

7967. But the cases where a subject is to be deprived of his liberty ought to proceed, I understand, in your view, on the evidence of two medical practitioners?—Yes.

7969. No, I do not think it is. I should say not, but I am not the Chancellor of the Exchequer?—Naturally I do not wish to increase the public expenditure at the present time unnecessarily, but I think it is quite certain that in some cases it is very necessary that there should be two medical certificates.

7970. I think that is undoubted?—And if you are going to make exceptions how are you going to do it? You cannot leave it till the justice is there; it complicates procedure so much.

7971. Earl Russell: I should just have thought you could do that, if you could detain him provisionally on the one?—Yes; that is adopting our provisional method; but I am supposing now the full order.

7972. Chairman: We must look at your scheme as a whole because it is very carefully adjusted, and one thing bears upon the other all the way through?—Yes, but if it is to be the doctor I think it is an unreasonable responsibility to put upon him to say:

"In this case one certificate will suffice." I do not think he ought to be asked to make such a decision, because it is the very people who may be quite clearly insane at the time who subsequently have the grievance that they have been wrongfully detained.

7973. Of course there is this point, that I do not understand why the mental state of a private patient should require two medical certificates, while the mental state of a pauper patient, on the other hand, requires only one?—I suppose we have to go back into the last century again to appreciate that point of view.

7974. Therefore if two certificates are appropriate for one class of society and that is regarded as an appropriate and necessary safeguard, one has difficulty in seeing that the same safeguard should not be applied to all cases?—That is the view we take.

7975. It is not as if the task is easier in one case than in the other?—Or more important.

7976. Earl Russell: It would add a good deal to the difficulties of relieving officers and to delay probably, if you have to get two certificates?—The provisional order, and other things, come in to simplify that.

7977. Chairman: We know the large extent to which patients are at present detained under an urgency order. You contemplate the modification or the continuance of that system?—Yes, certainly.

7978. One has always to think of the difficulties that are to be encountered in the provinces. In London, as one knows, everything is very carefully organised. One has, however, to think of the instruments of local government in the country. The difficulty of getting two doctors in some cases may be quite a serious one.

Earl Russell: On the Welsh hills, for instance.

Sir David Drummond: May we have the opinion of Dr. Langdon-Down upon the desirability of altering the statutory provision, that the doctors must see the patient separately and apart?

7979. Chairman: You, first of all, think there should be two doctors where detention is to be imposed upon the subject?—Yes.

7980. Then, further, you take the view, I observe, that the present requirement that the doctors should see the patient independently and give independent certificates should not be continued?—Should not be necessarily continued, not be required by law. We think the doctors can be trusted to form their opinions genuinely and not make collusive statements; that it is really this, that in the interests of the patient in many cases it is a misfortune to submit him twice to the examination by a doctor which is necessary to elicit the evidence. In some cases it is very difficult to procure adequate evidence to put down in writing to form the ground of a certificate, and if the two doctors can hear the evidence at the same time it saves the patient unnecessary strain; moreover, the two doctors can consult about the matter—those are the principal points. Moreover at the present time the two doctors do see the patient very often together, and then one goes out of the room and the other makes a few further inquiries.

7981. And so does lip service to the statute?—Yes.

7982. It obviously is a vestige of distrust?—Yes, we rather resent that.

7983. Earl Russell: It has no other object, has it?—No, I see no point in it.

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

Lords last year they do not require it—in fact they require that they shall see the patient together. We feel that it would interpose no difficulties and obstacles, but in that Bill, I think I am right in saying, the requirement is that the doctors who sign the two recommendations shall examine the patient together.

7987. Sir David Drummond: Before you pass away entirely from the question of magistrates, do you think it is at all desirable that the patient should be taken to a police court to see a magistrate?—No. I think we have a specific clause dealing with that; we definitely express the opinion that that is very undesirable, that patients who are not charged with any offence should be examined as to the state of their minds in a public court?

7988. Earl Russell: What is the number of that paragraph?—That is among the miscellaneous provisions at the end, page 14.

7989. Chairman: I just wish to say one thing further on this topic of the double certificate, and the idea of collusion. If you cut deep enough into the question, what is it we are anxious to guard against? You say collusion, two doctors in conference deciding to give an opinion which is not their genuine opinion, for some ulterior object. There is nothing like trying to unmask these things and see what is behind it. What is the suggestion? That these two doctors desire, contrary to their professional duty and their professional opinion, to incarcerate the patient or the person they are examining? What could be the object of such conduct on their part?—It is very difficult to see, because they have no common interests. Their relationship with the patient is already precluded by law, and relationship with the person who is going to see the patient is also precluded by law.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: On this point might we take paragraph 65: "The Association does not support the suggestion that second certificates should be signed by specially approved practitioners"?

7991. Chairman: Yes; we have got two certificates, according to your proposal, and two certificates by two medical practitioners who had been in consultation on the case.—Who may have been in consultation.

7992. Are not forbidden to consult together—that is the point?—Yes.

7993. The next point is the question of the qualification of the practitioner; at the present moment any medical man will do. A young fellow who has just graduated, or two of them, may the next day be qualified to sign medical certificates in law?—Yes.

7994. Do you think there is any necessity for exacting from the medical practitioner, on whose evidence the justice proceeds, that he should have any special qualification?—We have very carefully debated that question, and we think not, excepting that we do think it is desirable whenever possible that the usual medical attendant of the patient should be one of the certifying doctors, for the obvious reason that disorder of mind implies a change, and the habitual medical adviser of the patient is best in a position to judge of change. That is clear, I think. For the rest, we think that the medical curriculum does provide sufficient education to qualify a medical man in signing a certificate, having regard to what the certificate contains. We have carefully set out our analysis of the certificate, and we do not feel that it is asking too much to allow a qualified medical practitioner, who has been through his curriculum and passed his examinations and obtained admission to the register, to act in the filling and signing of such a certificate. Naturally in most cases the youngest medical practitioners would not be those usually sought to sign the papers. The friends in difficult cases very often go to other practitioners. But if you are going to lay down distinctive qualifications for the doctors who are to be allowed to sign certificates, how are you going to do it? What is your test to be? As far as we can see any very rigorous test, such as a specific qualification in psychological medicine, would at the present day reduce the number of available men so much in the country as to add to the difficulties of obtaining the necessary certificates to a grave degree. If you are going to adopt the plan of allowing the local authorities and the Board of Control to set up a list of men whom they may approve, we do not know by what criterion they would form the list; but presumably doctors who happened to be on the register would apply, and provided their general professional reputation was good they probably would not be refused admission to the list; but in some cases I have no doubt it would happen that all the medical men would apply, and I do not see why all the medical men who applied should not appear on the list. It appears to me it is very probable in some cases that the local authority would have a list which would include all the qualified men in the district. Those are practical difficulties. But the other thing is, what are your objects in having an official list of doctors of special qualifications? If you are going to have men who have passed some special test, and who have had some very special experience, is that going to be a greater safeguard to the patient? Is the specialist more likely to detect insanity or to fail to detect insanity? I do not wish to say anything which would be derogatory to specialised professions, but I have heard it stated that the specialist is very apt to see the disease in which he specialises. I have heard that stated. But there is no doubt that in some cases the friends will feel: here is a very doubtful case. It is always open to them to say: "We want a real consultation with a highly qualified man to advise us in this matter," and that very often happens at the present time. But we think that it is a great pity that this work should be narrowed down into very secluded channels. We believe that the profession should work as a whole in the main. We do not believe in these compartments in the profession. We believe that our qualified men are capable and are to be trusted to sign this certificate, which, in the majority of cases, is not a difficult thing, and that it is a pity to narrow it down further than it is. For one thing, the first certificate would more and more fall to be signed by people who have had less and less experience of doing so. As it is, the tendency is for a very large number of certificates of patients that are received as so-called pauper patients to be signed by one man, and the experience of signing certificates tends to be very much localised, so that the number of certificates that any doctor signs tends to get perhaps less. It would tend to get still less if the signing of the second certificate were shut off to an approved section of the profession.

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

7995. Only two points arise to my mind on what you have been saying. One is this, that after all it is in a sense an act of diagnosis?—Yes.

7996. And you say in the generality of cases not a difficult act of diagnosis?—That is so.

7999. That is one point of view—the other is this, and I think it is rather fundamental. You referred in passing to the existing curriculum. Now the young medical practitioner newly fledged would have come from various schools of training, and what one would like to know from you is this: Does his curriculum at the moment contain a sufficient course of training in this branch of medicine to enable him to give a judgment of any value—straight from school, so to speak?—I think in most cases, yes.

8000. Earl Russell: Does he ever see any insane persons?—Yes.

8002. But what one would like assurance upon is this: your recommendation is that the general medical practitioner should remain as heretofore qualified to give the medical certificate. One would like to be assured from the public point of view that the existing training of the general medical practitioner is sufficient to equip him to discharge this duty without specialist training; and one would rather like to know what is the existing curriculum through which the ordinary medical student has to pass, and what element of knowledge of this subject goes to his make up at the present moment—what does he know about it?—May I refer that question to Dr. Edwards? (Dr. Edwards): 30 or 40 years ago the attendance at lectures dealing with psychological medicine, or the attendance at hospitals where clinical instruction was given was a purely voluntary act for the student. At the present time it is compulsory, both as to the clinical and theoretical instruction; students have to attend a course of at least 12 lectures, the lectures are given in the hospital, and a course of at least 12 theoretical lectures. As far as I know, it is universal to instruct the students in the filling in of certificates. I mean I very frequently myself at the conclusion of a course of lectures have given the students the opportunity to examine an individual patient, then get them to fill in the certificate, which I subsequently criticise. I think that that is the general practice now throughout the country. It is perfectly certain that all the examining boards insist on a schedule being signed showing that the candidate being presented for examination has received instruction, theoretical and practical.

8003. Is there a separate examination on insanity?—No, but there are in the examinations general questions inserted which bear on mental disorders, as on other disorders. I think any candidate sitting for an examination can be sure that he may get an individual question on any branch of medicine. He may be asked to reply to certain questions on certain forms of physical disease; there may be a question on mental disease; but he has to prepare himself to reply to questions bearing on every form of disease, whether physical or mental.

8004. Can you tell us whether that course of instruction obtains in the other medical schools other than the University of London?—It is the same everywhere.

8007. Of course one knows that in practice the young medical graduate does not enter at once into a position of great responsibility, and he amplifies his experience. You do not find him generally in a position of responsibility within a short time of his graduation. Still theoretically he is entitled to certify the moment he has qualified.

8008. Mr. Snell: Could we know from Dr. Edwards how long this newer instruction has been given?—It depends, I think I may say, on the regulations, not made by the General Medical Council, but on the regulations which are from time to time instituted by the various examining bodies. The tendency is for one examining body to level up its standards to the standards of other examining bodies.

8009. Would it be right to assume from what Dr. Edwards has said that more than middle-aged practitioners may not have had this clinical instruction?—Quite possible, in fact very probable. Speaking from my own experience as a student at Guy's Hospital it was regarded rather as an unnecessary thing for us to attend the clinical lectures which were given at Bethlem Royal Hospital, for instance. I personally attended some of them, and I believe I did in fact learn a very considerable amount by those comparatively few attendances.

8010. Chairman: We would rather like to have made available to us the information upon this point. Of course it must be contained in calendars, in regulations, and so on. Possibly Sir Humphry, or Sir David, might be able to assist us upon this, that is to say, the dates when the more exacting requirements have been prescribed, because it is a little remarkable if most of the middle-aged practitioners in this country have never had clinical or theoretical instruction in insanity?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): I think it would be a pity to under-estimate the value of experience in real practice.

8011. Sir Humphry Rolleston: This seems to be a most important point, and we have now got the collected opinion of the profession with regard to the question of having a whole-time practitioner who should go round and give an opinion to supplement the general practitioner's knowledge of the patient and it had occurred to me they might take a different view, because is there not a great deal of difficulty at the present time in getting medical practitioners generally to certify at all?—I do not think that is on the ground that they distrust their own capacity.

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

8012. No, but the penalties which may accrue to them are so considerable?—I do not think they feel that they have done anything wrong, and will therefore suffer any damage, but they are afraid of prosecution.

After a short adjournment.

8013. Chairman: Dr. Langdon-Down, we had, I think, almost exhausted the question of the suggested amendments upon the certification procedure. We must not forget that it is a recommendation also on the part of the British Medical Association that the justice or judicial authority should see the patients. I understand that you attach importance to that?—Yes.

8015. At the present moment the legal protection which a certifying doctor possesses is to be found, I think, in Section 330 of the Act, and, if one may read the part of it which relates to you, it is: "a person who after the passing of this Act signs any report or certificate purporting to be a report or certificate under this Act or does anything in pursuance of this Act, shall not be liable to any civil or criminal proceedings, whether on the ground of want of jurisdiction or on any other ground, if such person has acted in good faith and with reasonable care." So that the criterion of immunity is that the doctor—I am applying it to his case, although this also affects the justice—shall have acted in good faith and with reasonable care. I appreciate the point which you refer to in the memorandum as to the question of the onus. Is it upon the person who has brought the proceedings to establish want of good faith and want of reasonable care, or is it upon the doctor to establish positively that he has shown good faith and exercised reasonable care? Of course in law the distinction is a very important one on the question of onus. I gather that the view of the profession is that that protection is inadequate?—Yes, that is so, based upon our experience.

8016. In the case of an ordinary diagnosis where a doctor is examining a patient, not with a view to detecting mental disorder but to discover what ailment the patient is suffering from, of course he has no responsibility for the correctness of his diagnosis other than that it must be made with proper professional skill?—Yes.

8017. Every professional man has to answer for his professional skill and care, but no further, with the single privileged exception of the profession to which Mr. Micklem and I belong?—Yes.

8019. What is it?—When a doctor is questioned in the witness box, does the question of his professional skill ever arise?

8020. No, you are quite right. A doctor, like any other witness of course, enjoys absolute privilege in the witness box. Then you would assimilate the case of the doctor who gives his testimony, which may result in certification, to that of a witness in a court of law?—Yes.

8021. Earl Russell: But he may have to answer for the acts, as when he failed to diagnose appendicitis the other day; he may have to answer for the acts where he has failed in his skill?—Yes.

8023. You have collected in Appendix A a series of quotations from the Act of Parliament which go to show that the function which the doctor discharges is that of testifying, rather than that of exercising his ordinary professional skill in diagnosis?—At all events going to show that he is regarded as a witness. I do not think there is any desire to underestimate the duties and responsibilities of the doctor.

8024. No. Of course it is never proper that the terrors of the law should be such as to prevent a person from doing his duty when he is acting in good faith. I understand that some difficulty has actually arisen in this way: doctors say, "Well, if we are going to be made targets for litigation whenever we are called in, we shall decline to certify at all"?—We all felt that, personally and collectively.

8025. In short, it is not worth your while, to put it bluntly, to get a couple of guineas for certifying in a case and finding yourself exposed to an action for damages for £1,000 or possibly £10,000 or £20,000?—That is so.

8026. And as there is no obligation upon you to exercise your profession, the profession might go on strike. Is not that so technically?—Yes.

8027. You do not want to deter the medical profession from giving the public service?—No. The profession is ready to run risks, because it knows the great distress that is caused in family life by the occurrence of these disorders of the mind.

8028. The question really comes down to this then: does the state of the law at the present moment really deter doctors from performing their part in the administration of the Lunacy law of the land?—It would, if the interpretation of the law according to our recent experience were to become general, undoubtedly.

8029. Of course at the moment a doctor is not responsible for a wrong diagnosis in mental ailments, any more than in the case of any other ailment. As long as to the best of his ability he considers his case, he is under no responsibility for an incorrect diagnosis—that is just the common law?—Yes.

8030. The only question is whether in arriving at his diagnosis and in prescribing the treatment he has given a proper measure of care to the case?—In this particular case the evidence of the care that he has taken is to some extent apparent in the particular act.

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

8031. There does seem to be prevalent, to some extent, an impression that a doctor is liable at law for a wrong diagnosis. If he thinks that a person is insane, that is a diagnosis just as if he thinks a person has got measles, and he may be wrong in either case?—He may be wrong.

8032. But the legal question is not whether he is wrong, but whether in arriving at his decision he applied due care and arrived at his decision honestly? Yes.

8033. No one would wish to protect the medical profession against dishonest opinions, or opinions arrived at without proper care?—No.

8034. The only point then that seems to arise here is whether, if you were to give to the doctors, on whose testimony a reception order followed, the immunity which is enjoyed by witnesses in a court of law, you might not be putting the protection too high and, although it was not your object, be incidentally protecting a person who had acted carelessly and without due consideration?—Again I would call your attention to the safeguard, namely, that the action of the doctor is set down on paper; the grounds of his testimony are set down on paper in writing and submitted to an impartial authority. It seems to me that that is where the justice comes in. He can prevent action going forward, if he is not satisfied that due care is being exercised. That is where it should be stopped.

Earl Russell: Are you right in saying that, because if he has written a very strong certificate it is quite impossible for the justice to know whether he has written that certificate with or without due care?

8035. Chairman: Just figure the case, no doubt an unlikely case, of a doctor who is quite casual and reckless about it and has chosen to write down about a patient things which really would not hold water. These, presented to the justice, may be most convincing and conclusive and he would have no alternative but to make an order?—But you are presupposing something worse than carelessness, surely.

Sir David Drummond: Dishonesty.

8036. Chairman: I am perhaps; but take a case where it is nothing more than carelessness but which in the case of ordinary practice would have exposed a doctor to an action; that question could occur. Is he to be protected against the consequences of that carelessness in his diagnosis of insanity which he would not be protected against in his diagnosis, let us say, of diphtheria?—There is the official safeguard of the second certificate, by which one set of inquiries can be tested against the other.

8037. That carries you a certain length, but not the whole length?—Not the whole length. Still, if a doctor has to write down the grounds for believing a patient to be insane, he either writes them truly or not. If they are not true, then, of course, he has done something which is very grave.

8040. Earl Russell: Do you happen to have examined any number of certificates in ordinary pauper cases?—No, it does not happen to come within my experience.

8041. I was just wondering, if you were to look at that point, whether you would not find that some of them are what I might call extremely thin—the facts stated are very insignificant?—Have they been accepted by the justice?

8042. And they have been accepted by the justice, yes. I should be rather glad if you were at some time to take an opportunity of examining them and give us your opinion upon this question, because some of the certificates would not show the care that you have been suggesting?—I can only say it would not happen more than once or twice, if the justices exercised their proper discretion.

8044. That is perfectly true, but meanwhile the patient has been deprived of his liberty?—I quite agree with that point; that is a very unsatisfactory method. In a recent important case you will remember only one medical certificate is required. There is no doubt the second certificate would be a stiffener of both.

Earl Russell: Yes, very likely, particularly with consultation.

8045. Chairman: I think, as I say, one comes inevitably to a point at which you must ultimately rely upon the medical profession?—Yes.

8046. And, if one may again invoke the analogy of the sister profession of the law, take counsel's opinion, which is a diagnosis on a matter of business or a matter of law, for which at the moment he has no responsibility at all; one has not heard of persons giving opinions which are dishonest. There is that other code to which you refer which comes into operation?—Yes.

8048. Then the question comes to be whether there is sufficient justification for it, and whether one might not be overstepping the limit in the other direction. What it has come to is this: that the medical profession shrink from the performance of their duty because of the risk of vexatious litigation?—It is honestly afraid of that.

8050. Mr. Micklem: Do you think it would satisfy the medical profession if the onus were shifted the other way, so that, instead of the doctor having to prove good faith and reasonable care, he should be protected unless he was shown to have acted without reasonable care and not in good faith?—It appears to me that the protection wanted is from a Government official as well.—(Sir Jenner Verrall): He has to prove good faith now, according to the words of the section.—(Dr. Langdon-Down): It would help.

8051. Supposing the onus were shifted?—It would be an advantage. It is a legal question, but we feel that the status of the doctor is all the way through so definitely regarded by the Act as a witness, as we have shown by quotations, that it is anomalous that it should not be carried to its logical conclusion.

8052. Chairman: What Mr. Micklem suggests would be an alleviation, would it not?—Yes, it would.

8053. If you take an ordinary action against a professional man for negligence, there is no doubt whatever that the onus is on the plaintiff to establish want of care. He would have to set out in his pleadings

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

that he employed Doctor So-and-so and he neglected him, and would have to state specifically in what respect he neglected him; he would have to set out that the diagnosis was not a bona fide diagnosis and was made without proper care and consideration; and before a judge and jury he would have to establish positively all these allegations before a judgment against the doctor could be reached?—Yes.

8054. It does seem quite wrong that a doctor, because he has played his part in the execution of the law relating to lunacy, should, on that account, be put in the dock, so to speak, to justify himself, rather than that the person who is attacking him in the performance of his duty should have to prove he has done something that is wrong?—We feel that very strongly.

8055. But it is going rather far to go on and ask us to say that he shall have in this particular case an immunity which shall absolve him from all possibility of action?—Unless he perjures himself.

Earl Russell: That is criminal.

8056. Chairman: That does not involve any financial responsibility, you see?—No.

8057. It would go a long way?—We certainly think that the least we could ask is that the onus should be transferred and that prosecutions should have to be sanctioned by officers of the Crown.

8058. In short, that the proceedings should be with the consent of the Attorney-General?—Yes.

8059. Of course there is at present legislation relating to vexatious actions, but it is not much fun to have to go through half-a-dozen actions before a person qualifies as a vexatious litigant?—That is so.

8060. Mr. Micklem draws my attention to Section 330, Sub-section (2), under which you may apply to the Court to stay the proceedings and the Court may stop the proceedings if the Judge is satisfied that there is no reasonable ground for alleging want of good faith or reasonable care, but there again the onus is put upon you, so to speak?—Yes, and all the trouble and inconvenience have occurred, and, remember, there is an a priori possibility that the person who brings this action is likely to take erroneous views of things.

8061. Yes, you are dealing with an abnormal class of person?—Yes.

8063. Mr. Micklem: Is not a doctor in rather a different position from an ordinary witness? Is he not in most cases the adviser who is suggesting the proceedings? An ordinary witness would be summoned by subpoena or come voluntarily, and give his evidence and be protected, but here the doctor is something more than a witness?—One of them at all events is a mere witness. It may be that the family doctor has recommended a course of treatment. The second certificate is given by somebody who is not in that position, but in any case all through the Act he is treated as a witness in its specific terms.

8065. Chairman: Now may we go on to what is a very important contribution from the British Medical Association, that is to say, dealing with the cases short of certification. You deal with these cases in various ways. Your general proposition is that there should be greater flexibility in proceedings, that there should be more time for considering cases, that there should be different kinds of places in which patients should be kept, all of which are designed to preclude the necessity of certification?—Yes.

8066. There are now to be a series of pauses on the road to certification, pauses which may be taken advantage of for the purpose of better observation and better diagnosis and treatment incidentally?—Yes.

8067. And again in appropriate places and in circumstances that will tend to alleviate rather than to aggravate the condition of the patient?—Yes, that summarises our conception very well.

8068. Your first suggestion is this: that the case might be treated in the first instance by means of a provisional order or urgency order, that is to say, you may have a case for which something must be done at once, but there has been no time really to gauge what class of case it is, so that for that case you suggest that the present urgency order might be made generally applicable, with certain modifications. I see you do not like the term "urgency order"?—We do not like to call a thing by a name which implies its uses for only one particular purpose when in fact it is used very frequently for a different purpose. Therefore it seems better to adopt a new term, also for clearness of discussion. Probably when the urgency order was first introduced it was intended to be used for cases of extreme danger.

8069. We might call it an emergency order?—Yes. It was so worded in the Act that it could, within the letter of the Act, be used very generally for cases on the ground that it was good for the patient's welfare. We understand that a very large proportion of the patients who are detained are originally certified under an urgency order.

8072. I think "temporary" is probably the best word; it happens to correspond with the fact; it is something which it is intended to be temporary?—Yes. Then it would be necessary to use a different word in the other place, a word which could easily be found.

8073. Yes, quite. Now your view is, I understand, that this kind of order should be made in the first place and that it should be a three days' duration order?—Yes.

8074. At present in the case of pauper patients, by utilising various provisions of the Act, you can actually get a 17 days' moratorium, can you not?—We were very much impressed by that when we heard from doctors, who are concerned in Poor Law administration, that quite a large number of cases which come under their treatment actually recover during the period of 17 days. There is the three days first and then the 14 days' continuation.

8076. But that its duration should be limited to three days, which three days would be taken advantage of for sizing up a case, if I may so put it; and then that there should be liberty to prolong the period by an order of the justice, the civil arm being brought in at that stage; so that there can be no detention without the intervention of a justice beyond three days?—That is our view, yes.

8077. Before the three days are over, if the case is one that it is desirable to observe longer, you would suggest that the justice be brought in and that the patient be detained on an order from him, not as it can be done at present for 14 days further without an order, but with an order up to 28 days?—Yes.

8078. That being adjudged by you to be an adequate period for a consideration of the case?—Yes. It gives an extension to certain private patients and a certain diminution of liberty of action in dealing with pauper cases.

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

8079. Earl Russell: You have three days without any medical certificate now?—Yes, you have, but we suggest that there should be uniformity, if practicable. We should welcome uniformity of procedure in the whole matter so that there should not be this distinction.

8080. But you still must have for urgent cases the possibility of taking a man somewhere at once while a doctor is being found?—Well, if the Commission thought that that was necessary for the first three days I do not think that we should object to it.

8081. Assume a violent maniac?—Yes. Of course, in the case of a private patient who is so bad as that, he must be dealt with as a pauper.

8082. But with the petitioner equally I think you have an urgency order?—There must be a medical certificate under the urgency order at present.

8083. Chairman: I think what Earl Russell has in mind, and it did occur to me, is this: supposing you have some person out in the street suddenly seized with a fit of mania, what is to be done with him?—Of course action must be taken.

8084. Earl Russell: We are told that what happens now is that the policeman may take him to the workhouse and may say, "Here is this man; detain him under my order," and then you have three days in which you can find a doctor?—Yes. He would probably ride off on some other charge against him if there was any difficulty.

8086. Chairman: I should have thought that the proper place to take such a person would not be either the poor house or a police cell, but the nearest place where there are proper facilities for treatment. If you take a violent case of that sort to a police office or to a poor house, there may be nobody there sufficiently skilled and really able to take charge of the case?—I think that would be far more reasonable action.

8087. Then the asylum cannot receive him at the present moment at all without a certificate; that is the ticket of admission to the asylum.

Sir David Drummond: That pre-supposes the proximity of such an institution.

Chairman: It does, of course.

8088. Sir David Drummond: The police cells are there, the workhouse is there, but there is no other accommodation in many districts?—No, but we hope that if some of our further proposals are carried out, there will exist other places for dealing with and diagnosing cases of this sort in large centres of population.

8089. Earl Russell: You mean that a hospital would have one bed reserved for such violent cases?—Yes, and clinics and receiving houses, whatever it may be. We do not lay down exactly what the provision is that should be made, but we suggest that the law should be so widened that the possibility of these things may be recognised.

8090. Chairman: The fact remains that there must be a certain number of cases where something has got to be done at once; and where you cannot get a doctor at once, somebody has to take charge of the situation?—Yes, leaving the question open for the time being of the cause of his behaviour.

8091. Yes. All that you know is that a person is conducting himself in such a way that some step must be taken by somebody or else something is going to happen?—Yes.

8092. In the interest of the patient of course the desirable thing is to get him into skilled hands at the earliest possible moment?—Yes.

8093. However, your programme is, first of all, in the case, which is the ordinary normal case, that the three days' provisional order should be the first official order pronounced; whenever the thing becomes formal it must be a three days' order, and no longer, and that should have one medical certificate?—Yes. We think that the time a medical certificate should be valid should be the least possible period, for convenience, that is to say, without a further validation, and we think that three days is, roughly speaking, a convenient period to name as the shortest period.

8095. That will give us a programme which in your view, I think, should be applicable to all classes of cases?—Yes.

8096. Rate-aided and private alike?—Yes.

8097. Sir Thomas Hutchison: Is that 28 days including the three, or a further period of 28 days?—We think it should be 28 days from the time the justice comes in. The justice may come in at the very beginning and the justice would deal with the 28 days.

8098. Earl Russell: Anything from 28 to 31 days?—Yes.

8100. And that full order would proceed upon two medical certificates?—Yes, on two medical certificates.

Chairman: We can, I think, see the programme that you contemplate there.

Mr. Micklem: May I ask you this, Dr. Langdon-Down: You would not abolish, would you, in all cases the procedure by petition? You see at the present time the common form is to present the petition, and then, if necessary, an urgency order is applied for pending the hearing of the petition, in the case of private patients?—Yes. I regard the petition as part of the full order, and we contemplate in some cases the petition and full order being used straight away.

8101. But how would your temporary order apply in the case where a petition is presented?—It would not apply.

8102. But you would still want the urgency order, or you might want the urgency order?—Then you would have the two overlapping, as at present in the case of private patients. Pending the presentation of a petition, the urgency order is signed.

8103. You would not supersede the urgency order entirely by your temporary order?—I should substitute the one for the other, substitute the temporary order for the urgency order. It would meet all the requirements of the urgency order and do something further.

8104. It would not apply, would it, in a case where a petition is presented, because where a petition is presented then the proceeding goes on, and within seven days you have to get the certificates, and your three days would not apply there at all?—That is what happens at present where an urgency order is presented. A petition is concurrently made and

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

certificates are signed and an order is made. That supersedes the urgency order at the end of a week.

8105. Yes, but still the urgency order may come in while the petition is pending. If your order takes the place of the urgency order, the proceedings would not apply, would they, because you are only giving three days under your provisional order?—We think that that should be enough. We think it should be enough to enable a full petition and order to be presented and signed in cases where it was clear what the course should be, and if it was not clear what the course should be, there would be a further period of 28 days available during which the petition might be presented.

8106. Chairman: Would it not be better to be more radical and to cut out all the existing procedure applicable both to private patients and pauper patients and reform it all on a line such as you suggest, assimilating the procedure for all cases?—That is our view.

8109. Earl Russell: Dr. Langdon-Down, what you want to do is to get a first period of three days, then a provisional period, and then, if necessary, the full order?—Not necessarily in every case.

8110. I agree, but you want to be able to do it in doubtful cases. Of course you hope that during the provisional period some cases may clear up?—Yes.

8111. And you want to do the same for pauper and private cases?—Yes.

8112. Cannot you do that best by using something like the procedure in Section 6 now? According to your suggestion, the petition is to be deemed to be presented by the relieving officer, if it is not a petition by a relation?—Yes.

8113. You get the pauper case in in that way?—Yes.

8114. Under Section 6 you could get in a justice fairly early, and then you notice that under Subsection (4) he may adjourn the case for 14 days. Now if you increase his power of adjournment so as to enable him to adjourn it for 14 or 28 days, or even, if necessary, for a further period, during that time you get the advantage of not even having a provisional order; you merely have the adjourned consideration of a proposed order?—Yes.

8115. Will not that meet what you are trying to do?—It would.

8116. Before I leave that I want to ask you whether you consider that 28 days is sufficient. You have introduced the representative of the public to protect the patient. Might it not be in the interests of the patient if you gave the justice power to adjourn the case for a second 28 days if so advised?—I think so. We hardly dared to suggest such a thing.

8117. We are all concerned in avoiding certification, if possible?—We felt we were making a great demand in suggesting these 28 days.

8118. If you adopt this method you will give flexibility surely, will you not?—Yes.

8119. By calling in your justice you have someone there representing the public at large, who will make the necessary order and give the medical man a chance to do his job and cure the case before the person is certified?—Yes.

8120. Does that strike you as being a system that would meet what you want?—It does.

8121. Subject, of course, to what I think you will agree, that somebody must be able to lock a man up at once if he is violent in the street—that is still necessary?—Yes.

8122. So where he is to be kept meanwhile is what we need to discuss?—Yes.

8123. Chairman: Of course you have this odd circumstance, that although a petition for a reception order is a speciality of the private patient at the present moment, you are also aware that under Section 13 a pauper is to be dealt with as if a reception order has been made. It is a most unfortunate complication, if I may say so?—Yes.

8124. Earl Russell: It does seem to me that what we have been discussing would give you as flexible a procedure as you could get?—Yes.

8125. Mr. Micklem: Dr. Langdon-Down, the temporary order, of course, would be a reception order?—Yes.

8126. Now would not there be exactly the same stigma applied to a reception order of that kind as to a reception order of to-day?—I hope not.

8128. Might I put the point in another way? I understand you rather suggest that there should be two classes under any new legislation, the class of persons who are of unsound mind, and persons who are mentally ailing but not of unsound mind?—Yes.

8129. Now are you not really providing this provisional order, or temporary order, for persons mentally ailing, not of unsound mind?—No. (Sir Jenner Verrall): No; the fact that you are going to recognise a mentally ailing class will result in these people being dealt with in a different way, so there will not be any of these cases dealt with by a provisional order at all. That is our line anyhow.

8130. This class of case will only get into the circle if the other methods are inappropriate?—Yes, quite.

8131. This is a system which is designed really to deal with the certifiable case; the other class of case is a case which you would hope will never be certified at all. This is a process of certification which you are proposing to reform?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): Yes, it definitely applies to persons of unsound mind.

8132. Earl Russell: Many of those who cleared up quickest would be obviously certifiable at the beginning?—Yes, that is so.

28 days, as the case may be, or even, as Lord Russell suggests, there might be a longer period for particular cases, on cause shown, so to speak?—Yes.

8134. And in that way you would get a process which would be applicable to persons of unsound mind, but yet not stamped indelibly with that characteristic?—Yes.

8135. And you would so afford an opportunity for observation and so on, with the possibility that during the currency of this programme they might escape the ultimate certification. Is that the scheme?—Yes.

8137. He may go off into one of these other categories en route, so to speak, and therefore may never issue in a certified case?—Quite.

8138. Then you contemplate that there may be cases which, ab initio, will be voluntary cases as well?—Yes, a large number.

8141. How would you do it? You say it requires the approval of the medical superintendent; but you have not suggested any safeguards against a large influx of the population to the asylums, in preference to workhouses and other institutions, who might simply say they would like the protection of the institutions.—We think the medical superintendent should be able to exercise a sufficient safeguard against that.

8142. Earl Russell: Yes, but in addition to that I suppose you will still give the guardians the right to collect from their relatives, or themselves, their maintenance just as if they were in the workhouse?—Yes.

8143. If they have no means, then you must be able to reject them if they are frauds?—Yes.

8144. Chairman: I can imagine that a person would very much prefer to go in as a voluntary boarder to one of the London County Council asylums than to go into a workhouse?—Yes. Clearly some safeguard must be arranged.

8145. This is the person who is not to be certifiable at all?—No, he may not be certifiable at all.

8146. He is merely a person to whom it occurs that it would be suitable for himself to reside in one of those institutions for a time. Who is to be the judge of his suitability, because, after all, if he is going to have that privilege at the public expense you will need to safeguard the position?—Yes, it needs safeguard.

8147. Then you also think there is too much procedure at present about the reception of the voluntary boarder, and that it would suffice if his presence in the institution was reported to the Board of Control?—Yes, I think it is as well that I should mention that originally, when this voluntary boarder principle was introduced, the idea was that it should not be applied to persons who were certifiable. The practice in regard to that matter has altered of late years in view of the decisions of the Board of Control, and it is freely applied now to persons who might be placed under a full order. Therefore that class of patient is contemplated now as among the possible voluntary boarders, and the easier you make it the better. You do not want to interpose obstacles in the way of the voluntary boarder obtaining admission or to alarm him.

8148. Now the voluntary boarder, by the very force of his definition, is a person who does not require compulsory detention, because he is voluntarily submitting himself to the process?—I do not understand that; I understand that he voluntarily consents to be detained.

8149. Yes, I agree, you correct me quite properly; but, strictly speaking, his detention is the outcome of his own volition rather than imposed upon him by somebody else?—Yes.

8150. It is true that he must submit as a condition of his treatment to a certain restraint upon his liberty, but he has assumed that himself?—Yes.

8154. You want the law reformed in that respect; 24 hours is too short a time to put the law in motion, and 72 hours you think would be sufficient?—Yes.

8155. Miss Madeleine Symons: May I just ask what the view of the Association is on this point—if you do find it necessary at the end of the 72 hours' notice to take further steps for the detention of a voluntary boarder—I mean in a case which got worse—do you see any objection to that being done while he is in the institution, or do you take the view that has been expressed to us that it should be done outside?—We have not specially considered that in our Committee. (Dr. Edwards): If I might answer that question, I have had some personal practice in the method of dealing with such a matter. Generally speaking, if a voluntary boarder submits to treatment it is because that voluntary boarder has previously probably been a patient and has recovered. Alternatively he may be a patient who has been there as a voluntary patient before. If such a patient in the early stages of his or her illness realises that they are getting ill again they come to you voluntarily, and it may be perfectly certain that within a few weeks, or within a few days possibly, the mild symptoms would develop into acute symptoms, and we know we have no means of preventing it; and it would therefore be a matter of hardship if that person who desired to come to you personally for treatment had to be sent away in order to be certified. It would merely be a physical inconvenience to the person, and consequently the practice, which I think is the only proper one, is that the patients should be certified where they are.

8156. Earl Russell: On the other hand the Maudsley people told us that they never did that?—The Maudsley people are barred by their regulations from doing it; they have a special regulation which bears on it. The old practice was this—I am speaking of some years ago: if a voluntary boarder became insane, a notification was sent to the relieving officer to say that at such and such an hour a person of unsound mind would be found on the high road immediately outside my front door. Under Section 13 the relieving officer would have to act, and the patient would be taken to the insane ward of the workhouse, where he would be dealt with as a pauper, subsequently certified, perhaps on petition, and returned. The only advantage the patients would then have would be that they acquired a little experience of the interior of the parish workhouse.

8158. I think I am right in saying that that is not the whole of your suggestions, you have other suggestions?—Yes, I was trying to answer that question that was put to me by Lord Russell.

8160. Mr. Snell: Then what would you do at that stage?—At that stage I should notify the nearest relative, and I should say: "We have now reached a stage when another step by law must take place." You would then know that it would rest on the nearest relative to decide what should be done; and the nearest relative having knowledge that the patient has placed himself under you, would come forward and say: "We must obtain a reception order."

8161. That would take 24 hours at least, and in that 24 hours you would detain the person and persuade him to stay?—I would point out that where a case was exceedingly urgent, you would not obtain a reception order; you would apply for an urgency order.

8162. Detaining him meanwhile?—You have power to detain him for 24 hours.

8163. Chairman: Assimilating the procedure you are outlining to the general procedure: in that case a person who is a voluntary boarder with you is just like a member of the public, a guest in your institution. It is observed that symptoms of acute insanity are supervening, and action would then be taken in the case of that patient, exactly the same as in the case of a patient outside the institution altogether; but meantime the patient would have this advantage, that there would be compulsory protection and shelter for the period now proposed of 72 hours, which would enable you and the relatives to look round, and an opportunity would be afforded to a justice of the peace to make an order justifying further measures in the case. If such an order were not obtained, then you would have to release the patient, if the patient no longer wanted to stay with you. That part of it seems to be consistent. Now the next class of person which you propose to create is the person known as the temporary boarder, and in this part of your recommendations you are largely following the lines of the Mental Treatment Bill?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): We are, yes.

8164. Do you approve generally of the proposals of that Bill?—We do, in the main. The defect, from our point of view, was that it only contemplated utilising the existing institutions under the Act. There is one other point on which we rather differ: the Bill requires two medical signatures to a recommendation. I think our view is that one medical certificate would be sufficient in that case, seeing that the patient can determine his stay under the recommendation by giving notice.

8165. Are you not under a misapprehension in paragraph 43 in criticising the Bill? You indicate that the voluntary boarder principle does not apply under the Bill to county and county borough asylums. I think it does, doctor?—It is simply a misunderstanding between us there. The voluntary boarder principle I am speaking of is the voluntary boarder principle as at present in force under the Lunacy Acts.

8166. But under the proposed legislation in the Mental Treatment Bill it is provided that voluntary boarders should be admissible to any institution?—Yes, I recognise that, but what we say is that it does not effect the same result as would come about from extending to those institutions the voluntary boarder principle. You see the voluntary boarder principle is indeterminate in its duration, and can be renewed.

8167. Earl Russell: And informal in its inception?—Yes; whereas this proposal differs in both those respects.

8168. Chairman: There are two classes of people contemplated in the Mental Treatment Bill; there is the voluntary boarder and there is the patient?—Yes; the voluntary boarder and the person so-called a minor, or incapable of volition.

8169. Under Clause 2, sub-clause (3), provision may be made for receiving and lodging as a boarder a person who is voluntarily desirous of submitting himself to treatment, and who may be received as a boarder. Then in Clause 4 the reception of a person as a patient is spoken of; then a "patient," I think, is defined?—We have not contemplated any such distinction.

8170. I think that when one examines the Bill it is a little obscure, but, after all, it is not the law; it is merely a projet de loi; and therefore you need only consider it as an outline of a suggestion. But your view is that legislation should be enacted which would deal with the case of temporary patients?—In this way you see you entirely get rid of even the stigma of a judicial order.

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

8171. May I ask this? We have the voluntary boarder, a person whom you propose to make eligible for any form of institutional treatment or single care treatment; then this voluntary boarder may become a certified person?—Yes.

8172. Might he also become a person who might be subjected to this process of temporary treatment?—I see no reason why not.

8178. It may not be available; it may be too far away. There are police cells always with us, but asylums are not so available.—We have hesitated to recommend anything involving costly measures; but, of course, if money were unlimited, receiving houses and clearing houses could be established everywhere for these cases. That is an ideal outside our present purview, except in very dense populations.

8179. London, of course?—Yes; but we do think that there should be greater facility for direct transfer to asylums.

8181. I cannot but feel that some intermediate institution is the real solution if it were feasible—neither a poorhouse nor a workhouse nor an asylum, because they are in a transitional stage?—We contemplate various possibilities, possibly annexes to the asylums under the same supervision. We also have wards in ordinary hospitals, cottage hospitals even.

8182. In point of fact at the moment are not some of the general hospitals making provision for mental cases?—They are.

8184. Would it not be the ideal solution if you could get the patient taken to a hospital and then detain him for a time? Then just as, for example, if it were found that the case was an epileptic one, the unhappy subject may ultimately be sent to an epileptic colony from the infirmary, so also if he were found to be insane, and could not recover without a long interval, send him to one of the specialised institutions, namely, an asylum properly so called?

8185. Sir David Drummond: Would the Association not go a step further and advocate the ideal, though it may cost money?—We suggest that the law should be so drawn as to render these things possible; that is the first thing to do. The actual development of accommodation must be gradual and would be the result of experience under the law.

8186. Earl Russell: Could you tell me this: it is a purely medical point, but I think the Commission want help on it? Take the case of distance. You have an acute case at Red Hill in Surrey, where the asylum is somewhere near Woking, a matter of 30 or 40 miles. Would it be better from the medical point of view in the majority of cases for a patient like that to be taken to a very moderately equipped workhouse ward in the first place, or to be taken in a motor ambulance so long a distance as 40 miles to the asylum?—(Dr. Edwards): If I may answer that question, I should say, does it not inevitably depend upon the equipment of the workhouse? It is perfectly certain that you cannot get either the nursing or the medical care there. In such a case I should have no hesitation in saying that the ambulance should move the patient to the place where all such skill as is available would be obtained.

8187. The disadvantages of the journey would be more than outweighed by the advantages of the treatment?—The disadvantages of the journey would hardly count.

Chairman: I must say that if one had a free hand and were able to dispose of the destinies of the general hospitals, it would be an attractive method of utilising the general hospitals for these cases of mental breakdown, just as you would for cases of ordinary physical breakdown.

8188. Earl Russell: Of course, it would be very easy if you had one ambulance attached to an asylum. One in the County of Surrey would be probably sufficient.—I have constantly to employ an ambulance.

14 January, 1925.]

Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, M.B., M.R.C.P.

8190. Chairman: May we take up again the question of the general hospital being used as the first place of resort? I want to consider the drawbacks to that. The attractions of it are manifest. The first drawback that occurs to one is that the managers of the hospital may not wish to have this rather troublesome and possibly rather noisy and difficult class of patient introduced. That would mean that they would have to have a separate annexe, a separate section altogether, would it not? I mean you could not have your ordinary patients disturbed by possibly fractious mental cases. Another thing is this: from the legal point of view you would need, of course, because of the specialty this ailment requires, to arm your hospital authorities with powers of compulsory detention?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): Yes.

8191. You would then be extending the area of institutions in which persons may be compulsorily detained?—Yes. Still it would be a different period of detention; it would be a different type of case; it would be a temporary thing.

8192. It would be pending disposal?—Yes.

8193. But you would certainly require legislation for that, because otherwise the hospital might come under the lash of Section 315 and be infringing the law by detaining persons?—Yes, and of course the provision would be something similar to what is proposed in the Mental Treatment Bill.

8194. So that if a person were taken straight from the street to the hospital and were there found to be a mental case and not an ordinary street casualty, the case would be taken away to the mental ward. After a rest of 24 hours the man might say, "I want to get out"—but he might have shown symptoms of acute insanity. Then you would require to have power in some way or other to detain him. You would have to be able to keep him for a certain short period, until you got the requisite sanction entitling you to detain him longer. His case would then probably follow the same programme as you have described?—Yes.

8195. All that in a general hospital would introduce rather a different element. You would have to bring a justice of the peace to the hospital and have a certificate, and so on?—Yes.

Sir David Drummond: But would he not go as one of the minor ailment cases to the annexe?

Chairman: We are assuming that he does. How is he to be kept against his will? All the other patients in the hospital are co-operating in the treatment and wish to stay there, but this man wants to go out.

Sir David Drummond: But do all these cases which are kept for 72 hours require the attention of the magistrate?

8196. Chairman: We would require the hospitals to detain a patient. At present they cannot detain a patient for a moment. Technically he is entitled to say, "I want to go out"?—If in the long run the patient is bad enough and refuses to stay, he must be treated as insane—there is no getting away from it—and dealt with as such, and sent to an asylum.

8197. I can conceive that a patient who is being operated upon may be in a state of delirium after the operation and may wish to get up, which may mean death. I suppose in that case the doctor would have no hesitation in using, through the nurses, proper restraint.

Sir David Drummond: That is done constantly. Porters and men are put in charge where otherwise the nurses are women.

8198. Chairman: It is only consonant with good sense that that should be so. But if you are going to detain in a general hospital, pending disposal, cases for more than a very short time, one would require to give some form of licence to these places, would one not?—I quite agree.

Earl Russell: You might very much affect the flow of public subscriptions.

8199. Chairman: That again is a difficulty, of course. You cannot convert our general hospitals into rate-aided institutions. That is a question which, as you know, is being investigated at the present moment; indeed there is a Committee sitting on it in Scotland just now. Is it not the case that some of the hospitals are doing this work already? I understand that there are mental wards in some hospitals?—(Dr. Edwards): There is one, Sir; St. Luke's have one ward for very very carefully selected cases with a good physical basis. Of course the old method of attempting to nurse the insane in association with the general hospitals was tried at Guy's for very many years, but they had a separate wing; it was called the lunatic ward. It is now 45 years since that was given up. Such patients as there were were transferred to Bethlem.

8200. Did it fail as a method?—There was no generally adopted distinction between mental disorder and physical ailments at that time. They were merely regarded as among those chronic patients that Thomas Guy founded his hospital for, and consequently it was felt that there should be some provision for the insane sufferer as well as for the physically sick, so that some 40 patients were detained.

8201. Of course there is something attractive in the idea. It helps to break down the idea of the difference between mental and other ailments, if you have the cases treated in a general hospital, at any rate in their initial stages?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): I think I ought to say that we have not included that in our proposals. What we propose is reduced to what is said in section 71 of our memorandum.

8202. That really amounts to this, that you ought to have better provision in Poor Law institutions?—Yes, that is to say, although we recognise the value of the hospitals, should they be willing to help us, for cases under the Mental Treatment Bill or similar provisions, we have not contemplated making them receiving houses for the really acute and difficult patients.

Earl Russell: On the other hand, the superintendents of the mental hospitals say they would like the patients at the hospitals at the earliest possible moment.

Sir David Drummond: Some of them suggest the desirability of having them treated at a general hospital, if it were feasible.

8204. Chairman: The trouble with all the points we have to consider here is that the considerations on both sides are so balanced. Take the Poor Law infirmary; first of all, that is a pauper institution and any patient who goes there is classified as a rate-aided patient, if he is receiving treatment there. If he goes again to St. Thomas's Hospital he is not a rate-aided patient. It is a very odd accident?—(Dr. Masterman): Of course, that is an absurd position which we hope will be done away with.

8205. What is your suggestion with regard to that?—It cannot be done away with except by legislation.

8206. We are at your disposal. Tell us what we are to do?—The abolishment entirely of the term "pauper." We have patients with us who are paying fees, but who in the eyes of the law are paupers.

8207. That seems rather ludicrous?—Of course it is ludicrous.

8208. But the person who is genuinely rate-aided will have to remain.

8209. Earl Russell: Nine-tenths of the present asylums will continue to be rate-aided, whatever you call them?—One does not see why there should be any disgrace in it. If it is no disgrace to go to a hospital which is supported by voluntary subscriptions; why should there be any disgrace in a man going into his own hospital, to which he to some extent contributes?

8210. Chairman: It seems rather ridiculous that a person who is not a pauper at all should, by the very fact of his becoming ill and being taken to a particular institution designed to cure that illness, become a pauper in order to have the advantage of the treatment. The real stigma of the pauper is this: a person who is prepared to be a parasite upon his fellows rather than work for his own living; and that is a stigma which is a proper stigma to attach to a person, who, although able, is not willing to support himself. But there should be no stigma attaching to a person who is a good citizen and anxious to work, but who has been overtaken by a particular form of mental illness. If he had taken an infectious disease nobody would call him a pauper, but because he is afflicted with a mental illness and requires treatment he gets into the asylum and becomes a pauper?—It is a much bigger question. If you tumbled down in the street and were taken into an infirmary you would become a pauper. It is not only peculiar to mental cases.

but, after all, in the larger London institutions these people are accommodated in the infirmary itself. We use the term "infirmary" very much as applying to the Poor Law hospital or Poor Law infirmary, and I think you have there the accommodation needed. Our recommendation is that none of them should go to the workhouse; that they should all go to separate Poor Law infirmaries.

8212. Chairman: You have the institution of the Poor Law infirmary. That is an institution which, of course, is maintained out of the rates in contradistinction to the hospital, which is maintained by voluntary subscriptions and the produce of endowments. What determines, in the case of a person who falls ill—not mentally ill—whether he shall find his way into a Poor Law infirmary or into a general hospital? I am assuming that he is a case that cannot be treated at home?—In the case of many institutions, it is urgency, because they can be taken in at once there, and they do not have to wait. When it is an operation, in my own district it almost always comes straight to the infirmary, because they know they will be taken in night or day and dealt with at once, whereas the neighbouring hospital is so small that they could not touch it. I mean I have 800 beds and King's College has about 200 available.

8213. But it has no relation to the means of the party at all. In the one case a person becomes a pauper and in the other case he does not?—Yes. We never use the term, of course.

8214. I know its name is never heard, but still the substance remains.

Earl Russell: Of course it is a rate-aided institution to which everyone contributes.

8215. Chairman: I do not regard myself as rate-aided because I enjoy the parks of the City in which I walk about, although I have provided the parks out of my rates like anybody else. I am afraid it will not be possible to conclude the evidence to-day, and we should like to consider the evidence that has been given. Do you think, Dr. Langdon-Down, it will be possible to give us another morning later on?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): It will be rather inconvenient for me to come again this month.

Chairman: Our Inquiry will take longer than that. I think the most useful course is that we should adjourn now and ask you to come back at some time which is convenient to you. We have really got the great bulk of your evidence, but there are some other points in your memorandum which I do not want to take too quickly. Therefore I think we had better adjourn now and the date of your return visit can be arranged later.

THE RT. HON. H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (Chairman).

THE EARL RUSSELL.

SIR HUMPHRY ROLLESTON, BART., K.C.B., M.D.

SIR ERNEST HILEY, K.B.E.

SIR DAVID DRUMMOND, C.B.E., M.D.

MR. W. A. JOWITT, K.C.

MR. N. MICKLEM, K.C.

MR. H. SNELL, M.P.

MRS. C. J. MATHEW.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

MR. WALTER STEWART (instructed by the National Society for Lunacy Reform) appeared on behalf of Mr. H.

MR. H. C. DICKENS (instructed by Messrs. Hempson) appeared on behalf of Dr. Robert Percy Smith and Dr. J. G. Porter Phillips.

MR. R. P. CROOM-JOHNSON appeared on behalf of Dr. Reginald John Stilwell and Dr. Bulkeley Footner.

MR. D. B. SOMERVELL appeared on behalf of the Doctors Newington.

Chairman: The Commission are to-day to take the evidence of a witness, Mr. W. H., whom they have been invited by the National Society for Lunacy Reform to hear. Mr. H. some seven or eight years ago was an inmate in succession of Moorcroft and Ticehurst Licensed Houses, and as the précis of his evidence with which the Commission have been furnished contains complaints regarding his detention and treatment in these Houses, the Commissioners have thought it right to notify the persons concerned, in order that, if so advised, they might attend and take part in the proceedings. As controversial matters of fact are involved the Commissioners have decided to utilise the powers which by Resolution of both Houses of Parliament have been conferred upon them under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act, 1921, and to take the evidence of parties on oath. The procedure will be that Counsel for the National Society for Lunacy Reform who tender Mr. H. will, in the first place, examine him in chief. Then any parties present, who satisfy the Commissioners that they have an interest in the subject-matter of his evidence, will cross-examine by themselves, their counsel, or solicitor. Any relevant evidence which these parties desire to lead will then be taken in turn. It must be clearly understood that the Commission desire to hear Mr. H. on the subject of his own personal experiences only, and cannot allow the cases of other patients to be mentioned or discussed by him. It would obviously be improper to permit the cases of other patients to be publicly discussed without their express sanction.

The Commissioners have further to point out that, while they have certain judicial powers, they are not a Court of Law and cannot pronounce any judgment upon particular cases. The reference to them as regards this part of the investigation is to inquire into the law and administrative machinery in connection with the certification, detention and care of persons who are or are alleged to be of unsound mind, and to make recommendations. It is not within their province to announce decisions upon particular cases, and they do not propose to do so. The evidence to be given to-day will form part of the material upon which the Commissioners will ultimately base such recommendations as they may have to make.

Mr. Dickens: Before the case, if it can be called a case, is opened, may I say that I am instructed here on behalf of two gentlemen, Dr. Percy Smith and Dr. Porter Phillips, who have been asked by the Commission to attend, and who attend here purely out of courtesy to the Commission. It has been intimated to them, in the very courteous letter which they have received from your Secretary, that some sort of charges will be made against them in connection with certificates they gave with regard to the gentleman of whom you have spoken, some eight years ago. The Courts have been open to that gentleman to regulate any grievances which he may have had in that connection, for the last eight years; and he has not thought fit to take any advantage of the procedure that has been open to him by the law of the land. Is he to make use of the existence of this Commission to make these charges; and, if so, do I understand from the Commission that these charges are to be gone into, but that they cannot be determined because, as you say, you are not a Court of Law and are unable to determine this matter? If so, we are in a very strange position. In the first place, very serious charges, I gather (I do not know what they are) are made against two very eminent medical men. There has been no formulation of these charges at all. Some other gentlemen for whom my friends appear seem to have received some sort of précis of the charges against their clients. I have received none. Am I to have this matter tried without knowing what I am to be charged with? If that is so, and the matter is to be gone into, I presume I am to be allowed to go into the whole of the facts and to call evidence. I may tell the Commission at once that that will take several days, as far as I know, and, of course, I have been instructed at the last moment. I do not know that I have got sufficient satisfactory material to cross-examine Mr. H., and I shall have to ask you to give me leave to recall him on another day. I shall have at least eight or nine witnesses to call to justify the action my clients took eight years ago. As an instance of the difficulties in which my clients are placed, I may tell the Commission that two of the witnesses whom I would have called are dead. Then another point arises. You may not decide this matter; but if these charges are to be gone into it will mean very great expense: who is going to pay the costs of my clients for this? It is going to be a very expensive thing; it will be necessary for counsel to appear, witnesses to attend, and transcripts of the shorthand notes to be made. Has the Commission any power to reimburse my clients for this? All these difficulties I put before the Commission. My clients are in your hands, and are willing to abide by any decision you may come to. I put their difficulties before you, but I must in their interests say this, that if the matter is to be gone into, it will have to be gone into thoroughly, because it is a matter of very great importance to them that their reputation should not be challenged in this public manner without its being adequately answered.

Mr. Somervell: I am instructed on behalf of the Doctors Newington, and if I might make an application to this Commission at this stage, the facts are rather different. I support on the main grounds the contention put forward by my learned friend, Mr. Dickens, but I am in a slightly different position. The part of the case with which I am concerned is with regard to the institution at Ticehurst. Now, so far as the allegations made against Ticehurst are concerned, there is no allegation of any improper treatment; Mr. H. has no complaint as to the treatment he received there; his complaint is as to negligence, that he ought to have been released sooner. The Courts were open to Mr. H. on that matter as on the other matter, and he took advantage of them; and when he was sued for the expenses which were due from him in respect of his stay at Ticehurst, he defended, and in his defence and counter-claim he raised every single point which is raised in the proof, of which a copy has been sent to us by you, of the evidence which he proposes to give before this Commission. Every single point was raised, and a judgment which I think has been sent to you (I do not know whether you have perused it) was given by Mr. Justice Sankey. Now every witness who could be called was called; a very material witness, Dr. Newington, who actually was in charge of the institution when Mr. H. arrived, was dead and could not be called; and that is perhaps another reason why this particular case is not a very profitable one to investigate, because a very material witness is not available, owing to his having died. There is a long judgment by Mr. Justice Sankey, and he submitted the case to what he called a microscopic examination. He relied on various things, a statement by the defendant, as he then was himself, and the evidence of his own doctor, Sir Thomas Horder, a very distinguished authority, that the defendant was at the time he arrived a very suspicious and suggestive case; and Mr. Justice Sankey, on page 16 of his judgment (if I may just read one sentence) said he had come to the conclusion not only that the authorities at Ticehurst "were not negligent in acting as they did, but I want to say something just the other way; I think they would have been negligent if they had released the defendant under these circumstances." That was the judgment of Mr. Justice Sankey. If I turn to this document which you have sent, there is one other matter which I ought to tell the Commission. There are allegations, paragraphs 80 to 83, as to the treatment of Mr. H. when in Ticehurst with regard to his liver. Now those allegations were made in the action. They were set up in the defence, and they were on the pleadings; but before the action was heard they were withdrawn, so that if I may say so that disposes of that. I do not think the Commission will probably spend their time in going into an allegation with regard to the liver treatment which has already been put on the record before the Court, and abandoned when the case actually came on for hearing. So that in those circumstances this matter having been fully investigated, res judicata, though, of course, I am in the Commissioners' hands, I would ask the Commission, with respect, two questions: Is it fair to these gentlemen, who have already had the matter thoroughly and publicly investigated at considerable expense of time to themselves—they have had it investigated once, and they have been, if I may say so, acquitted with honour, because not only were they not negligent, but it was found that they would have been negligent if they had acted in the way suggested—is it fair to them that they should again have to appear here and go into this matter, and it must be gone into in detail if a satisfactory investigation is to be made; and also, if I may say so with respect, is it possibly a profitable case for the Commission to spend its own time in investigating, when it has already received such a microscopic treatment, the results of which are available to everybody in Mr. Justice Sankey's judgment?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I appear here for two doctors. Their cases are quite distinct, and, indeed, I am instructed by several independent and separate firms of solicitors with regard to them, but I desire to supplement what has been said by my learned colleagues, on behalf of each of them; and I think I may possibly be of some assistance in endeavouring to dispose of one of them, in a certain view, which my friend, Mr. Walter Stewart, who appears on what I may be allowed to call the other side, may take with regard to it. I appear, first of all, on behalf of Dr. Footner, who was the gentleman who operated when the patient was at Ticehurst, and who is the gentleman connected with what my learned friend, Mr. Somervell, has called the liver incident; the operation with regard to the gentleman's liver complaint was, as a matter of fact, in respect of his gall bladder. As I understand it, any kind of allegation that was made against Ticehurst with regard to any negligent treatment at that time was withdrawn in the action which was heard by Mr. Justice Sankey; and I do not quite gather that even now (I have read the précis very carefully) any accusation at all is made against Dr. Footner himself with regard to the treatment and, so far as I can see, the perfectly admirable treatment which he gave to this patient. I am here and Dr. Footner is here to give any assistance which the Commission may desire, but if no accusation is made against him personally with regard to what he personally did, then I was going to suggest to the Commission respectfully that Dr. Footner might be allowed to withdraw. I shall be here representing other people, and if at any time it should emerge that Dr. Footner can be of any assistance to the Commission, then he will be perfectly ready and willing to come forward and do anything that is right and proper that the Commission would desire him to do. I rather gather from a shake of the head which I perceived from my learned friend, Mr. Stewart, that no charge at all is made against Dr. Footner; and perhaps in those circumstances the Commission would be good enough to indicate to me that the course I propose to adopt on his behalf would be satisfactory to them.

Mr. Jowitt: I observed the same shake of the head, and I gather that Mr. Stewart makes no charge against Dr. Footner.

Mr. Walter Stewart: The moment I have an opportunity to be heard, I will explain the position with regard to this matter.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: If you please. Now with regard to my other client, I appear also for Dr. John Stilwell, who is the licensee of Moorcroft, the place at which the patient was first of all housed, and the position that I desire to take up with regard to Dr. Stilwell is this: he has no desire whatsoever, and I am sure my learned friend has not either, to burke any kind of investigation or discussion of any sort or kind; he is here to give every assistance, and I am here on his behalf to give every assistance which the Commission may desire; but what he does feel about it is this, that grave charges are being made with regard to his particular premises, with regard to their adequacy, and with regard to other matters, some of which, I gather, as the result of the ruling of yours which I have listened to, will not fail to be dealt with in the evidence of the particular witness who is now to appear in the witness chair; but, of course, this is a very grave matter for Dr. Stilwell. These matters could have been investigated in the Courts. There were some proceedings taken some years ago by the witness which were in fact dismissed. The witness took a particular line, and presumably he made complaints at that time against my clients which were intended to be exhaustive. They were discussed in a County Court not very far away from London; leading counsel was engaged; the matter was investigated in full, and according to my instructions at the conclusion of it the learned Judge, after a very patient hearing, said publicly that the action ought never to have been brought. Now in those circumstances after this lapse of time my client of course may be in some difficulty with regard to calling evidence. A great deal of it is, I am thankful to say, still available, but I should certainly like to have the Commission's ruling as to the particular course they propose to adopt with regard to these charges, whether they propose to go into them exhaustively; and I should ask you that they should do so, and whether some arrangement can be made under which the distinguished witnesses who would fall to be called on behalf of my client might be called of course upon some future occasion, and upon some date or dates which are satisfactory and convenient to them. The matter of expense is, of course, important, but I am not here on behalf of my clients to say that that will deter them in any way from giving the Commission all the assistance which the Commission desire; but in arriving at the decision at which the Commission have arrived, I imagine that they have considered the extraordinary difficulty that the persons against whom these charges are made would be placed in, and the grave expense to which those people will be put in what is after all now a public inquiry. I desire therefore respectfully, if I may do so on behalf of Dr. Stilwell, to associate myself with the observations which my two learned friends have made.

Chairman: Do counsel appear for any other parties concerned?

(No answer.)

Then, Mr. Stewart, I should like to hear what you have to say in answer to your learned brethren.

Mr. Walter Stewart: This is, of course, as the Commission will bear in mind, the first opportunity that I, representing as I do the National Society for Lunacy Reform, have had of addressing you at all.

Hitherto any speeches which have been made have proceeded from other quarters; and I assume from what has been said, that I am not at this stage to do anything in the nature of opening a case, though I should very much like to have such an opportunity. But my friends quite properly and very adroitly availed themselves of an opportunity of a preliminary defence of such persons as they represent. All I wish to say with regard to that is this that as far as my friend Mr. Croom-Johnson's client, Dr. Footner, is concerned, my friend is perfectly right in what he apprehends with regard to Mr. H.'s attitude towards that gentleman. Here and now so that it may be publicly known, and so that Dr. Footner may suffer no detriment in this matter, I will say this, that Mr. H.'s complaint is not a complaint against that gentleman at all of a personal character with regard to the way in which he performed the operation which he performed. His complaint is of a different character, and it is one which reflects not upon Dr. Footner but upon the gentleman who was the medical superintendent of the establishment in which that operation was performed. Mr. H.'s complaint is that, though it must have been or should have been apparent to anyone who was observant that his case was an extremely serious one, steps were not taken in time to deal with the extremely serious physical symptoms which were manifest; and that therefore when at last at the eleventh hour and the fifty-ninth minute the surgeon was procured to perform the operation, that gentleman, through no fault of his own, was placed in a position of very serious disadvantage and detriment both to himself and to his patient.

Mr. Somervell: Is it not enough at this stage for my friend to say that he makes no charge against Dr. Footner?

Chairman: I think that will be sufficient.

Mr. Stewart: As my friend Mr. Croom-Johnson is representing other interests I thought it desirable that I should indicate—

Chairman: However it is quite apparent to the Commission that no allegations are to be made against Dr. Footner; therefore he may withdraw from the proceedings unless he takes an interest in them for other reasons.

Mr. Stewart: I take it I have said enough.

Chairman: We, of course, have read the précis, and are fully apprised of the evidence you wish to bring before us, but I would like very much if you would address yourself to the question raised by the various Counsel here as to the scope of the inquiry, and as to the manner of conducting it. We have our own views and shall announce them shortly, but not until we have heard your views as to what will be the most expedient course.

Mr. Stewart: So far as any views have been already announced by you, of course you are masters of your own house, and we bow to the view that you take, that Mr. H. must by your ruling be strictly restricted to personal matters relating to his own case, though he has, in fact, made a study of this question for years, being a person who has the very best reasons for desiring to investigate the abuses which exist, as he believes, in the administration of the lunacy law. He is prepared with evidence such as would be admissible in a Court of Law to show that other people have suffered; but if you rule here and now without hearing any part of the evidence that we would be prepared to tender through Mr. H. with regard to certain matters—if you here and now rule that any such matter is excluded, to that decision we must bow, with this sole observation that it is not our fault if those matters, which are susceptible of demonstration before this Commission in the way that we hope to demonstrate them, fail to be demonstrated. Our case, of course, is that not only Mr. H., but many members of the public have been wrongfully certified, not owing to any wickedness on the part of the gentlemen concerned, but owing to the method which at present obtains, which is a method of secrecy and which prevents, as the Society will submit, the proper determination of the question of whether a person is of sound or unsound mind.

Chairman: One moment, Mr. Stewart. On that subject we have had the advantage through your courtesy of a précis of this gentleman's evidence, and it originally contained observations with regard to the treatment of other patients, both in the matter of alleged cruelty and alleged wrongful detention. We then received from you an amended form of the précis, which excludes all those matters, before we had made any ruling at all on the subject. The mention of the names of other patients contained in the latter portion of the original précis has accordingly of your own choice been withdrawn from our consideration. I should also add this that we have received protests from one gentleman saying that he really does not wish his relative's affairs examined publicly at your instance, because he says you do not represent him; and therefore you can understand the impropriety of discussing the cases of gentlemen who are not here, and who also may resent their personal history being investigated at the instance of a volunteer, without meaning any offence to you. I thought, therefore, the value of your contribution to our investigation would be that Mr. H. should tell us himself what his own experiences were; that is really the first hand and important evidence which I understand he has to contribute to us to-day. I do not think we need pursue the topic of other cases, in view of our ruling.

Mr. Stewart: I have bowed to your ruling, as I always do, therefore all I say with regard to that is this, that it must not be thought because we only put forward Mr. H., supposing he is one witness who deals with the question of certification and the evil restrictions surrounding it, that we are not in possession of a great deal of evidence with regard to other sufferers. That is all I desire to say.

Chairman: I think, Mr. Stewart, I have repeatedly assured you, and have also said in public, that we proposed to take evidence with regard to a few cases which you have selected, without in any way failing to recognise that you would like to place before us a much larger number of cases. I have also indicated that we shall personally be prepared to read the statements of such witnesses and consider them, but it would be manifestly against the public interest that we should resolve ourselves into a Court of Law and spend days and days in investigating cases, with the appearance of counsel and so on—we should never come to an end. The mere fact that we have asked you to give us one or two typical cases, illustrative of your general criticisms, is not intended to open the door to a whole series of cases being brought here and fought as if we were in a Court of Law, nor, of course, to shut out any general evidence which we are anticipating to receive later on, such as the general critical evidence which you are going to bring. This case is taken out of its order to suit the convenience of Mr. H. These cases were merely intended to be brought forward by you as illustrative. We are aware that you have a great many cases to bring, but within the limits of time it would be quite impossible to deal with them with the formality in which we have met this morning.

Mr. Stewart: We have all along recognised the practical difficulty of getting before you all the evidence we should like, and we must accept such measure of bread as you are in a position to offer us. I think with regard to the position of those who have been described as the critics, I am sure it is only right I should say this. You, and I have no doubt, every member of the Commission have read the précis of our case on wrongful certification, environment and cruelty; you will see that under those heads alone it might be desirable that we should call separate witnesses as to each, because it is not likely that the same witness will be in a position to speak to, or to complain, under all three heads; and therefore the limitation of our evidence to six witnesses in all, speaking to personal experiences, is a limitation so severe that we cannot hope with that number of witnesses to cover even the fringe of our case more than in the most perfunctory way; and I do trust that it will not be thought by any member of the public, who reads the evidence which is given here, that that is all the sort of attack that can properly be made by means of sworn witnesses against the administration of the present system and the law as it at present stands. That is all I wish to make clear. We must submit to the limitations that are placed upon us, we recognise it. But as this is a public enquiry intended for the purpose of informing the public eye or ear is the administration of the lunacy law at the present time conducive to abuse and evil and danger to the liberty of the subject, as that is the question upon which the public mind is sought to be set at rest, I hope that opportunity will be given to other people, quite outside those whom we put forward, and to a considerable number of them, who are prepared to come forward as they have personally informed me, to deal with these matters, and to deal with them fully and not with restriction to the mere personal experience; because these people have spent their lives subsequently to their escape or release in investigating these matters. It may be said that they are interested witnesses—I grant it; but you will also observe that the great majority of those witnesses who are called to depose to facts intended to support the administration of the lunacy laws as at present administered, are equally interested witnesses—that must of course be apparent to anyone who has heard the evidence; they are people who have important positions with large salaries, who are administering a system upon which their very bread and butter depends.

Chairman: I think you are trespassing a little on my intention when I asked you to assist me. What we want to have your assistance on at this stage is the question of procedure. If you have anything to tell us about that we shall be glad to have it; if not, I propose to deal with the points taken by counsel a few moments ago.

Mr. Stewart: If you stop me I stop at once.

Chairman: I wanted to know what views you have to submit on the question of procedure which has been raised by learned counsel.

Mr. Stewart: I have answered you already, I think, with regard to the ambit of the evidence which I shall seek to elicit from Mr. H. With regard to the procedure I take it it will be this: Mr. H. is to be subjected to cross-examination, and the documents which will be necessary either to support or to attack this case are documents of which we are not in a position to obtain discovery; though this is a judicial enquiry, this is not a litigation; but the Commission is in a position to obtain discovery of them, under the powers that they enjoy, and we should ask that you would secure the production here before this Commission of such documents as we desire, and which we can only obtain in that way; and I take it, it will be open to my friends, or any of them, to call for such documents as they themselves think will assist their attack upon Mr. H.'s evidence. When his cross-examination is completed, I suppose I shall be allowed the ordinary opportunity of re-examination.

Chairman: Certainly, and the opportunity of the cross-examination of any witnesses they call.

have an opportunity, which of course up to now we have had to forego, of cross-examining those who seek to support the system, to show that the evidence they give in chief can be discounted by facts, which they would, we believe, have to admit if they were subjected to cross-examination. Certainly, as you know, though I wrote a letter to you quite early in the proceedings to point out the difficulty we were in, you ruled that no cross-examination or anything in the nature of cross-examination would be permissible. In these circumstances we had to remain here and listen to witnesses one after another who were making statements of fact relating to specific facts, to use the words which you used on Tuesday, as to which we were in a position to discount or to contradict from matters which were known to us, but we were not able to put those questions because of course we knew they were ruled out by your former ruling. At some time we hope that there will be presented to us an opportunity to cross-examine those witnesses who have been called to support the administration of the system, and with regard to whom we are in a position to show that they are not altogether disinterested.

Chairman: One other matter I should like your view upon, Mr. Stewart, is that it appears from the précis that Mr. H. has been involved in a number of litigations, and counsel has referred to that circumstance as having a bearing upon our investigation this morning. We of course cannot possibly sit as a court of review upon questions which have been determined in a Court of Law. On the other hand the mere fact that a case has been before the Courts does not preclude us from hearing your witness, in my opinion; but it does of course make the matter a little more difficult when the case of the particular witness tendered has been subject to the very class of examination which you have always told me you desired, namely, the independent examination of a Court of Law.

Mr. Stewart: I desire it on both sides.

Chairman: One does feel a little difficulty about that. I do not know whether you feel yourself that Mr. H. may not suffer to some extent from the fact of its not being fresh evidence—I mean evidence which has not been already subjected to examination, and disposed of in a Court of Law. That is a matter for your discretion, of course.

Mr. Stewart: All that is fully present to our mind. We do not suggest that it is possible for us to call any single witness who has been certified against whose evidence some attack may not successfully be made, that we face boldly; that is bound to be so owing to the very nature of the witnesses whom we are bound to rely on.

Mr. Jowitt: Attack is one thing, but a judgment of a Court of Law is a quite different thing.

Mr. Stewart: Yes. With regard to any matter which could be called in a litigation res judicata, as far as I am concerned I should not desire to ask the Commission to devote much time to the consideration of anything which might appear again to be covering the old ground; but even there, there may be a few observations that are properly to be made to show that that litigation did not necessarily cover the whole field. For instance, supposing I could show this with regard to a complaint made against the doctor that the defendant in those proceedings—because Mr. H. was the defendant inasmuch as he did not want to pay the charges for the Ticehurst detention because he said they were excessive—supposing I could show that the defendant, desirous of obtaining medical evidence to show that he had not been skilfully treated, had gone round London and had been told by doctors that no medical man would dare to go into the witness box to make an attack on the management of such an institution—that he would be a marked man—that would be some explanation of the reason why that part of the case was dropped.

Chairman: May I put this to you, because it is really a practical difficulty. I am afraid this question is hedged about with a good many difficulties, but on this point of the previous investigation in the case, one of Mr. H.'s grounds of complaint is that he was improperly detained. Now that question was undoubtedly tried out before Mr. Justice Sankey in the case in which Mr. H.'s own counsel stated that the issue before the Court was that the plaintiffs, that is the managers of Ticehurst, kept Mr. H. in their asylum longer than they ought to have done. Following upon that, there was led on both sides distinguished medical evidence, and in particular I see Sir Thomas Horder, and Dr. Munro—who has been a protagonist in the same interest as yourself—were called. Upon all that evidence Mr. Justice Sankey reached the following conclusion: "I have come to the conclusion," he says, "not only that the plaintiffs in this case were not negligent in acting as they did, but I want to say something just the other way. I think they would have been negligent if they had released the defendant under these circumstances; I am sure that none of these gentlemen would have taken the responsibility, in the face of these certificates, and in the face of what they know, to allow Mr. H. to get out sooner than indeed he did in fact. It is not for me to pronounce here anything definitely with regard to his insanity during that period, but I am satisfied of this, that the plaintiffs had every reason for acting as they did, and in my view, had they done what the defendants now say they ought to have done" (the defendants being Mr. H. and his wife) "the plaintiffs would have been acting very wrongly, both in the interests of Mr. H. himself and the public generally. I quite accept what Mr. Hawke says with regard to the duty of persons who keep these private lunatic asylums. The patient's actions must not only be watched with care; they must be watched microscopically, in the interests, not only of the public, but of the patient. Looking at these actions, even through a magnifying glass microscopically, I cannot say that there was any negligence by the plaintiffs. They did what I am sure a proper, skilful, kind and considerate doctor would have done under the circumstances."

Now while I do not say that you are precluded from if you please, re-airing Mr. H.'s views upon this matter, you will appreciate that when a matter has been fought out in a Court of Law with testimony on both sides and a judgment, and the very neutral person whom you so frequently tell me you wish to invoke in these matters has come to that deliberate and considered opinion upon this particular, do you think it is very useful for us to hear Mr. H. upon the matter? The disappointed litigant is always anxious to tell the story over again.

Mr. Stewart: All that may be truly said, but you will observe that in the very words you have read occur these words: "in face of these certificates"; and that was what Mr. Justice Sankey had in mind, as I suggest, when he said that it would in those circumstances have been perhaps negligent on the part of the managers of Ticehurst to let him go because of the certificates, that was the mischief which had already been done, and it is that we want to lay before you, the circumstances under which those certificates were obtained; and even supposing he were seeking to obtain redress for wrong certification, it might well be that the law would be a cloak to the persons who had certified, and yet non constat that the enquiry ought properly to extend to this question: Is that law, as it at present exists, and as it is at present administered a danger to the liberty of the subject, although he was rightly certified under the law? Is it because the law as constituted and administered was a danger to the liberty of the subject? That is one of the things we want you to find affirmatively. (Hear, hear.)

Chairman: There must be no interruption in the way of expression of opinion on the part of the public; if anyone offends in that way it will result in their being excluded from the proceedings. I quite see your point, Mr. Stewart, on the certification, but would it not be superfluous to consider the propriety of Mr. H.'s detention in Ticehurst? It looks to me as if the gravamen of your case was that the certificates were no doubt, if they were correct certificates, ample warrant, as Mr. Justice Sankey found, for the continued detention of this gentleman, and thus relieved the managers of Ticehurst from any responsibility whatever if they acted improperly. Would not your real complaint be that in this case there was a wrong diagnosis of the case by two doctors. Is not that the whole point?

Mr. Stewart: If I may say so, that is the strict logical conclusion, which I am afraid I must admit might be drawn from that judgment, if we are precluded of course by that judgment from seeking to go into the matter afresh.

Chairman: We are anxious to get evidence that is of importance and that may have some impression on our minds. You have selected this case, and you told us in your communication with regard to this witness that you regarded him as a witness of particular importance to your case. The only comment I would venture to make is that in selecting that witness you appear to have selected a witness whose case is different from others you have, in the respect that it has been, in part at least, the subject of judicial investigation. I am putting this to you in your own interests. You are accepting in the case of his allegations this very serious onus, the onus, namely, of satisfying us that in the matter of his improper detention the learned Judge of the High Court went wrong. I think we all know that a litigant who has failed in his litigation is not always persuaded that the Judge is right and that he is wrong.

Mr. Stewart: Especially one who thinks he has been wrongfully certified.

Chairman: But that is a different question. Are we to understand then that in view of Mr. Justice Sankey's ruling on the matter of his detention in Ticehurst, you have no complaints of the action of the managers or proprietors of Ticehurst in what they did; but that your case is, as regards this gentleman, that the diagnosis upon which the certificates proceeded was a wrong diagnosis, and that therefore those certificates were incorrect and ought not to have been granted?

Mr. Stewart: The way I should like to put it, if you ask me, with regard to Ticehurst is this, that that is an exposition of the evil of the administration as at present practised; that the proprietors of Ticehurst found their judgment fettered and tied, and that in law that might exonerate them from an action for negligence, yet as an exposition of the working of the law, what happened to Mr. H. at Ticehurst is relevant. I do not propose, if Mr. H. is guided by me in the matter—I should not seek here and now, that he should try to suggest that there was negligence except in that sense, that they were misled by the documents that they had to take into consideration.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I should rather like to know whether that would apply to Moorcroft as well?

Mr. Stewart: No.

Chairman: But the certificates were exactly the same.

Mr. Stewart: Yes, but there was something more that could have been known to the proprietor of Moorcroft.

Chairman: Let us clear the ground and see how far we have got. As I understand from you, first of all, there is no allegation against Dr. Footner. Then, secondly, do you accept the position that as regards the detention by those in charge at Ticehurst, as Mr. Justice Sankey found, the Act, quite correctly upon the documents which were presented to them, is the warrant for what they did, and therefore they are not to be here and now challenged for their conduct in the management of their institution, and that so far as his detention there is concerned, you are critical rather of the warrant for his detention than for the conduct in detaining him?

Mr. Stewart: If it is left to my judgment and discretion, and I take it it must be, as to the line I desire to take with regard to Ticehurst, Mr. H. has already said in that very action that the one white spot that he found as far as the administration of the law was concerned was the management of Ticehurst as a general thing, and that they tried to be honest. That he has given public testimony to. Therefore, it is with all the greater pleasure, if I am allowed to act on my discretion, that I say with regard to Ticehurst I do not want to complain, except that they were misled.

Chairman: Now can we clear the ground any further so as to limit the ambit of our inquiry?

Mr. Jowitt: Does that involve the representatives of Ticehurst being able to go?

Chairman: May I take it then that the doctor from Ticehurst, that is to say, Dr. Newington, represented by Mr. Somervell here to-day, may regard himself free from the necessity of further attendance?

Mr. Stewart: I am glad to say that my client instructs me, because I am briefed on behalf of Mr. H. at this moment, to say that he is quite of the view you have expressed, that it would not be useful to occupy the time of this Commission in what would be a losing battle.

Chairman: It is not really from that point of view; I am looking at it from the point of view of propriety and fairness rather, and, if I may say so, I commend the course which you and your client in this matter propose to take. Therefore, the managers of Ticehurst may have the satisfaction of knowing that nothing will be said against them here as regards their detention of Mr. H., or as regards the treatment which Mr. H. received in their institution. Mr. H. really adheres to what he said himself in the proceedings, that there was nothing to complain of as regards the asylum so far as he himself was concerned. Then beyond that we must just proceed. I want to say a word in view of what has fallen from learned counsel on this matter. The Commissioners have been fully sensible of the difficulty which surrounds the present Inquiry. The National Society for Lunacy Reform indicated to us at an early stage of our proceedings that they desired to bring forward some general testimony critical of the existing administration which they thought might assist us in our deliberations. We have been hearing an exposition of the existing system, and we proposed in turn then to hear persons who were in a position to afford us useful criticisms of the system. We are to hear shortly a representative of that Society, who is to inform us of the general criticisms which his Society has to make upon the existing regime. That will be general evidence of a critical character no doubt—I have seen the précis of it—and will make constructive suggestions for the amendment of the law. Incidentally to that general critical statement, the Society informed the Commission that they desired to put before us some concrete instances which would satisfy the Commission that their criticisms were not based merely on theory, but had a foundation in fact. They informed us that they had quite a large number of cases, I think all cases of ex-patients—

Mr. Stewart: No, four attendants.

Chairman: I beg your pardon—four attendants and a number of ex-patients, who would recount, if we desired, their experiences of the existing system, and that those cases would be brought to our knowledge by way of concrete illustrations, so that we might have some assurance that the criticisms of the Society in theory were not without foundation in fact in particular instances. We felt that it was proper that we should accede, so far as the limits of time of our Commission permitted, to the suggestion made that we should hear some concrete cases. It is true that we cannot possibly hear anything like the number which Mr. Stewart has at his disposal, nor indeed can we hope to satisfy all the persons who would like to come before this Commission. Such would be entirely beyond our capacity, but the Society, being a representative and responsible body, have selected a certain number of cases which they thought it would be useful for us to hear about in more detail. There is inevitably some embarrassment from the point of view of a public Commission such as ours in dealing with concrete cases at all, because they inevitably involve the mention of individual persons, and a certain degree of hardship is necessarily involved in comments and criticisms being made upon the professional conduct of those persons. On the other hand, we felt that it would not be proper to deprive the critics of the existing system of an opportunity of putting before us at least some of the cases which they had investigated. We had accordingly to adopt the form of procedure which seemed to us fairest, and that was, just as other Commissions have done, to accept evidence tendered to us by responsible persons, although it related to individual cases and was not merely critical of the general system. But upon observing what was about to be said by some of those witnesses, we felt it was proper to apprise the persons, whose names were mentioned in the proofs of evidence which were submitted to us, that their names would be mentioned in the course of the evidence of the witness, and that they should have an opportunity of being present. I regard, and I am sure my fellow Commissioners regard, that as being an inevitable consequence of an investigation such as we find ourselves charged with, involving highly controversial matters—that some inconvenience, and I am afraid some expense, is thus imposed upon individuals. I am afraid that that is an inevitable concomitant of an enquiry such as we have embarked upon. We propose to keep that part of the enquiry relating to particular instances within comparatively narrow limits; but in the cases which we are investigating, I am afraid I cannot listen to the suggestion that because persons are mentioned by name in the course of the evidence that is to be given, such evidence should not be taken; I am afraid we should have to receive that evidence and give it its proper value and proper place. But the public will, of course, hear, not only Mr. H.'s evidence; they will also hear any evidence which may be brought by way of answer to it, and they will also have the advantage of hearing what may be put in cross-examination. We felt that we should discharge our duty of fairness to the parties concerned if we took that course. But we are not going to pronounce judgments upon those cases; we are merely receiving that evidence for the purpose of enabling us to evaluate the testimony we are receiving critical of the existing system. Accordingly, I think we should now proceed to hear Mr. H.'s evidence upon the lines which I proposed in my opening remarks. I certainly may say that I do appreciate that, incidentally to this enquiry, trouble and expense has been imposed upon persons who perhaps thought they had heard the last of those incidents which may be referred to here, but I shall do my best and I hope we shall have the co-operation on both sides in keeping this enquiry within limits; and one must always bear in mind that you are not conducting a case which is either prosecution or defence in this matter; we are merely eliciting information and we do not want therefore the atmosphere of a Law Court, or an atmosphere of prosecution or defence to be imported into the matter; and no doubt I can rely upon counsel to assist the Commissioners in maintaining that attitude throughout the proceedings. I should deprecate exceedingly any other course being taken.

I would invite now Mr. Stewart to put to Mr. H. the questions by which he desires to elicit from him his personal experience, so that we may have the advantage of hearing it.

Mr. Dickens: Before that is done, I would ask, in justice to my clients, that the charges against them should be formulated. I have just had handed to me a précis of Mr. H.'s evidence; I have only been handed it by the courtesy of some other party to this matter, and the only thing I can find in a hurried perusal with regard to my client's action is contained in paragraphs 48 and 49. I have gathered from what Mr. Stewart has said that the gravamen, the seriousness of the question of the certificates was the secrecy with which they were enabled to be given by the present state of the law. Of course, if that is the only charge, that is no personal charge against my clients at all, but if you look at these two paragraphs it is something very much more serious than that. "I discovered for the first time the untrue grounds of my certification, and that Dr. Stilwell had sent in a report to the Commissioners which was absolutely false and misleading. I produce a copy of case book, and deal seriatim with these allegations. I told Dr. Stilwell what I had discovered, that the whole thing was dishonest, and I should take the law into my own hands at the first opportunity." I gather in a roundabout way that the charge against these two eminent medical gentlemen is that they knowingly gave dishonest certificates. I want a charge of that kind, if you please, formulated in detail and in writing. I want to be able to call evidence about that. I have not got the evidence here. I have not got the proofs of my witnesses. It may be that I can cross-examine Mr. H. to a certain extent. It is quite impossible that I can cross-examine him exhaustively to-day, and I shall have to ask you to recall him on another day; but before I do anything else I ask that Mr. Stewart should put in writing and clearly what the charges against my clients are.

Chairman: There is a little difficulty, Mr. Dickens, with regard to Mr. H.'s position. He is being heard to-day really rather out of order, because we are informed that he is leaving the country, and we were asked, as a matter of convenience to Mr. H., to take his evidence to-day. We acceded to that request, and I do see a little difficulty from the point of view of what you are putting to me now. Of course, we would certainly adjourn in order to give the eminent doctors you have mentioned an opportunity of coming and telling us their versions of the matter, but I do not think we can ask Mr. H. to remain in this country indefinitely for that purpose. The version of those doctors will be received by us and examined with exactly the same eye as we shall bring to bear upon Mr. H.'s evidence.

Mr. Dickens: All I can say is that I cannot put the necessary questions to Mr. H.

Chairman: Would it not be better to wait and see whether Mr. H. is going to say that these doctors are dishonest? I have no doubt he has said so in the précis.

Mr. Dickens: May I have the charge made now? It is a very distressing position for my clients to be in.

Chairman: Mr. Stewart, that, of course, is a serious matter, if Mr. H. is going to say that two members of any profession are dishonest persons.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Mr. H. will do nothing but state facts. He will make no comments on them unless invited to by my learned friends.

Chairman: In that case, if he will not characterise conduct, he will not say a good many things that are in this précis.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I shall trust Mr. H. only to answer such questions as I put to him, and to answer them in the literal sense.

Chairman: I think the best plan is to wait and see, if I may use a well known formula.

Mr. Dickens: Are the words in this précis, the allegations, withdrawn against me, or is Mr. H. going to ask you to draw some inferences from the facts he is going to prove? Am I to wait and see?

17 January, 1925.]

how these nebulous charges formulate themselves in the course of the proceedings? I have to prepare my answers.

Chairman: This is in no sense a public document; it is merely a document made in advance of what the witness may say. I do not know what he is going to say now. I think at the moment you may take it that no charges are made against anybody, until they are made through the mouth of the witness who is going to speak, and we will really take every opportunity to protect your clients.

Mr. Dickens: If you please.

Chairman: There was one thing Mr. Stewart said with regard to documents. When we heard that Mr. H. was coming, we directed that all relevant documents should be made available, that is to say, that the case books of the two institutions should be brought here; that the file of the Board of Control should also be available; and further, in view of the fact that a number of litigations were referred to,

I took steps to see that the papers should be made available to myself and to my fellow Commissioners. Quite a series of actions have been raised, and I have here the file relating to a number of them. Therefore, so far as documents are concerned, they will be upon the table of this Commission and available to all the parties who desire to refer to them. More than that, in the interests of justice, I am afraid we cannot do. I think we might now proceed with Mr. H.'s evidence.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Do you desire that the witness should be sworn?

Chairman: Yes. All the witnesses at this stage we propose to take on oath.

Mr. Somervell: I should like to be quite clear that none of the Ticehurst doctors are any longer required by the Commission.

Chairman: That is my understanding of Mr. Stewart's statement.

Mr. Somervell: If you please, Sir.

Mr. H., sworn.

Examined by Mr. Walter Stewart.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Before I put the first question to the witness, I am told now for the first time that the file of the proceedings relating to Mr. H.'s case before the Master in Lunacy is not forthcoming. That file contains, amongst other things, the opinions of three eminent medical men, Dr. Crichton Browne, Dr. Hugh Munro, and Dr. Spitta, who examined Mr. H. immediately after his escape from Ticehurst, and who certified him sane. Those are the three documents with regard to Mr. H. to which I attach particular importance. I am told they are not available.

Chairman: They are not available, for this reason, that I directed enquiries to be made in the appropriate quarter, because I thought the documents should be before us, but on enquiry unfortunately it appears that the file is missing. It is not the responsibility of this Commission. You must settle that matter, I am afraid, with the responsible authorities.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Then I take it that I shall be permitted to tender secondary evidence of the lost documents, though I have given notice to produce them?

Chairman: We are not applying the ordinary canons of evidence in this Inquiry at all. If you have any copies of those certificates which could be spoken to, we should accept that, but I am not going to apply rigid rules of evidence in the matter.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I have the solicitor here who put the documents in.

Chairman: He may have copies of them. Shall we reserve the point until it arises?

8216. Mr. Walter Stewart: If you please, Sir. (To the Witness): Is your name H.?—Yes.

8217. Are you 57 years of age at the present time?—58.

8218. You are a consulting engineer and naval architect, and I think you were for many years engaged in the practice of your profession?—Yes.

8219. In the autumn of the year 1913 did you sustain an accident?—In the autumn of 1914, at Dover.

8220. And as a consequence of that accident were you laid up for some time?—Yes, for three or four months—the first time in my life.

8221. After that—in order to show what was your then mental condition—I think you became an honorary secretary to a Red Cross hospital, and you continued to work in that capacity for no less than two years, I think?—Yes, for two years.

8222. Do you remember the autumn of 1916?—Yes.

8223. Had you an attack of any illness at that time, when you were working in Lord Roberts' workshops at Brighton?—In October, 1916, I fell ill with pneumonia—what was alleged to be pneumonia.

8224. Were you attended at that time by any medical man?—I was attended by a medical man at Brighton. I have forgotten his name. My wife, with whom I was living, sent for a Dr. Dempster, who was her medical attendant.

8225. And I think he had a house, had he not, in Croydon?—Yes, in Brighton Road, Croydon.

8226. And convalescing as you were from your attack of pneumonia, were you taken to his house at Croydon?—Yes. The local doctor could not make out the case, and while I was pneumonic I was moved in an ambulance to Dr. Dempster's house at Croydon.

8227. Do you know of your own knowledge whether your temperature at that time was normal or abnormal?—My temperature was high.

8228. You had at the time you went to Dr. Dempster's house a high temperature?—Yes.

8229. Were you very ill while you were there?—Yes, I was very bad.

8230. I think it was necessary for you to have day and night nurses?—Yes.

8231. And you remained until the 8th December an inmate of his house?—Yes.

8232. I do not want to go at any length into what you did there, but were you in the enjoyment of a good deal of leisured time?—Yes.

8233. Whilst you were an occupant of Dr. Dempster's house?—Yes.

8234. And did you occupy at any rate a part of that time in correspondence?—Yes.

8235. I think you do write a good many letters in the ordinary course of affairs, do you not?—Yes, I should think so.

8236. There is one other matter only I want to ask you about. You are a gentleman of easy circumstances in life, and I think you have at different times been very much interested in different kinds of pets that you have had?—Yes.

8237. Can you recall at this time whether there were any pets at all at Dr. Dempster's house?—Yes, I had two small Capuchin monkeys.

8238. How long had you had them?—I have always kept apes of some sort.

8239. That was nothing new or referable to your state of mind since your attack of pneumonia?—No.

8240. Have you still got them?—Yes.

8241. It is not suggested by anybody that you are not now sane. You have still got those same pets?—One of them.

8242. That being so, while you were at Dr. Dempster's house did some people call upon you who were strangers to you?—Yes.

8243. Can you recall their names?—Firstly a man called Elrich Adler.

8244. What did he purport to be?—Elrich Adler purported to be a friend of a gentleman called Maurice Craig.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8245. And who was Maurice Craig?—He was a mental doctor whom I consulted two years before.

8246. Now this gentleman with a German name came to see you—(Mr. Dickens): I hope this sort of thing is not going to be allowed. Mr. Alder is dead.

Chairman: Does it advance the case at all to interject the suggestion that he was a German?

Mr. Dickens: He was a very eminent gentleman in his profession.

8247. Mr. Walter Stewart: Be it so. (To the Witness): Did this "eminent gentleman" tell you for what purpose he came to see you?—Craig had told me that he would send a friend of his down, and that some minor operation was required to see whether my blood was still pneumonic; that is what I was told.

8248. What did the "eminent gentleman" who came to see you do to you?—He put a needle in my arm and took several ounces of blood. He then asked me to curl up on the bed, and he put a needle into my spine; it was a very unpleasant operation. I did not know what he did it for.

8250. Now I must go out of order of date, because I want to follow this up to make it intelligible. Did you subsequently, long after you were certified, discover that that "eminent" professional man on that occasion had taken a specimen of your blood?—Yes; I knew it after I consulted Dr. Munro—after my escape.

8251. How long was it before you became aware of that? Was it after your escape from Ticehurst that you found it out?—Yes.

8252. That was in June of the following year?—I escaped in August, and I was free in September, 1917.

8253. Putting it in rough figures, for over nine months afterwards you never knew what had been done to you, or the purpose for which it was done on that occasion by the "eminent" medical man?—I never knew the purpose.

8254. Directly you found out what had been done, did you yourself voluntarily submit to a blood test being taken?—I had five blood tests taken, so as to be quite sure.

8255. And those blood tests which you had taken immediately after your escape from the private hospital at Ticehurst—were those blood tests submitted for the purpose of seeing whether there was any re-action under what is known as the Wasserman test?—Yes.

8256. Was any re-action disclosed by those tests?—The medical people called it negative—all of them.

8257. Mr. Walter Stewart: I desire to take your instruction here, Sir. I do not want, unless I am obliged to, to name here, in fact, what was the nature of the disease for which that test is considered proper. At any rate, those tests were made, and disclosed what is called a negative result. (To the Witness): I am afraid I must put it to you. Were you ever told when you were taken to Moorcroft that you were alleged to be suffering from general paralysis of the insane?—No.

8258. When first did that very serious statement concerning yourself come to your knowledge?—Well, I think I saw some documents in Dr. Stilwell's office.

8259. Now let us go back to the point at which I diverted—

Earl Russell: What date is that?

8260. Mr. Walter Stewart: I will get that elucidated. We are now dealing with things that happened in December, 1916. You have told us of the visit of the "eminent" medical man, as we have agreed to call him. Now come, please, to any other visits that were paid to you while you were at Dr. Dempster's house?—By friends or doctors? Do you want names?

8261. Visits by doctors?—I wrote to my friend, Hugh Munro, who was an official at Claybury at that time, and Dempster appears to have stopped that letter. Munro never received it.

8262. Did a doctor whose name you have already mentioned, Robert Percy Smith, come to see you?—Yes.

8263. Had you invited him?—No.

8264. Did he tell you what the purpose of his visit was?—No. He told me he had been sent by Craig. He was a heart specialist, and he had been sent by Craig to examine my heart.

8265. Did Dr. Percy Smith say he was a heart specialist himself?—Yes.

8266. That is what he told you?—Yes.

8267. And that being so, did you permit him to examine you in any way, believing him having come to examine your heart?—Yes.

8268. Did he talk to you at all, and, if so, for how long?—He talked to me for, I think, 10 minutes, but I was very sleepy.

8269. On what subjects did he talk?—I disliked the man; he was very insolent, I thought, and I did not want to have any conversation with him.

8270. Can you tell us what he talked to you about—this stranger who said he wanted to see about your heart?—From the certificates I know what was alleged.

8271. Tell us what you remember, and then we will see what is alleged?—I think it was more on general topics. Of course, he was the second doctor who had been sent. A man called Butter Stoddart was the first.

8272. When did Dr. Stoddart come to see you?—He came to see me when I was barely out of the pneumonia, he being the second doctor. Adler was sent down first of all, and found a positive reaction, and a perfectly dreadful reaction, which I think was quite untrue, in fact it must have been untrue.

8273. Now that being so, Dr. Stoddart comes down?—Yes. I had that day dismissed a nurse for insolence, and he asked me a lot of questions why I had dismissed her and so on. I told him that she had been saucy and that I could not put up with it. He then took from her a statement, which is perfectly absurd, and I do not think Craig could use it—

8274. We need not trouble with anything that was done behind your back, even though you may have heard of it. At the time that Dr. Stoddart did whatever it was he did, were you informed as to the object of his visit?—No, I was absolutely in the dark.

8275. Chairman: I wonder if you would just bring out who was sending these doctors to see this gentleman? Doctors do not appear out of the blue, so to speak?—As a matter of fact, I had considerable confidence in the eminent alienist.

8276. Sir Maurice Craig?—Yes. I could not get Dr. Hugh Munro, whom I trusted, so I invited Maurice Craig down, because Dr. Dempster was not—he is dead now, so I do not want to say anything about him.

8277. You asked Sir Maurice Craig to come and see you. He was unable to come himself, was he?—No; he came himself, and he then sent these satellites of his down.

8278. Earl Russell: Did you not know them at the time?—I knew they were friends of his; I trusted him.

8279. Chairman: Did they introduce themselves to you and say: "Craig has asked us to come and see you"?—Yes.

8280. Mr. Walter Stewart: Let us get this quite clear. Did any one of them at any time introduce himself to you by saying: "I have come to inquire into the state of your mind"?—No.

8281. Or give you any hint or suggestion that anything of that kind was on the tapis?—No.

8282. If that had been the case, and they had told you that, tell us, just aye or nay, would you have desired to be specially represented?—Certainly.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8283. Do you think that would have been necessary for the safeguarding of your interests at such a serious crisis in your life?—I think so now.

8285. I pause there to ask a question which is relevant and in respect of which we have called you as a witness. In your view, with the experience you have had with regard to certification, do you think it is either safe or fair that a person sought to be certified should be left without any sort of representation?—It is most unjust and improper.

8286. As a matter of fact, at this very time had you a solicitor, if not on the premises, at any rate in the vicinity?—Yes; I had Alec Muther, of Drummonds, Croydon, who was drafting a new will, and I had my friend the Chancery barrister, Paley Baildon, and a Home Office official called Angel Bradford.

8287. So in your own case, if you had not been kept in the dark, you could have obtained separate representation and protection?—Certainly.

8288. You did not enjoy that benefit?—No.

8289. Why not. Was it because you were kept in the dark?—Exactly.

8290. You were also examined, as we know, by another gentleman, whose name, I believe, was Phillips?—Yes, Dr. Porter Phillips.

8291. Just tell us how he introduced himself.—He came with the usual story, that he was a friend of Maurice Craig's, and he was to take me to his country house. He examined my eyes with a little flash lamp, and he tried the knee jerks—the clipping on the back of the knee-cap.

8292. Did he tell you why he did that?—No. He simply said he wanted to examine me. He said he was a friend of Craig's, and so on.

8293. Was he an agreeable man?—A delightful fellow.

8294. I think you took a great fancy to him, did you not?—Yes.

8296. That is one of the grounds he alleges in his certificate which we now know he made, that you were unduly effusive and communicative; that you told him about your private affairs and invited him to your country house?—Yes.

8297. Then he said that you exhibited signs of general paralysis. That is what is known as general paralysis of the insane?—Yes.

8298. You tell us that he flashed a light in your eyes?—Yes.

8299. Tell us with regard to your eyes: at any period of your life antecedent to the autumn of 1916, had you ever had any mishap to either of your eyes?—Yes.

8300. What was that?—My eyes had been under the care of Sir Arnold Lawson.

8301. When first?—Long before these incidents.

8302. What for?—Principally for new glasses. He has the records.

8303. Have you ever had any physical injury to your eyes?—I have three times had this eye injured with boxing, and once with hockey, so badly injured that the eye was all blood, and it was a question whether I should get the sight back.

8304. Did any of them, and especially Dr. Phillips, who examined your eyes, ask you whether you had had any injury to your eye at any antecedent date?—No.

8305. Now he also in his certificate, as you now know and as you did not know at the time, included certain facts which he said were communicated by others?—Yes.

8306. He said in that certificate that Dr. William Thomas Dempster, of 94, Brighton Road, Croydon, had informed him that latterly you had shown lack of judgment and had written foolish and abusive letters to comparative strangers. With regard to that, at that time, had your attention ever been called to any foolish or abusive letters that you had written to any comparative strangers?—Certainly I wrote very strong letters.

8307. To whom?—To kinsmen who were misappropriating my property.

8308. If you are cross-examined about it, you are prepared to go into that?—Yes.

8309. You did, in a subsequent litigation with those very people, obtain a finding which was favourable to your contention, did you not?—Yes.

8310. If my learned friends want it, you are prepared to go into it?—Certainly.

8311. I do not propose to do so. Let us pass on from that; that is Dr. Porter Phillips' certification, and those are the grounds upon which, as you now know, he then found you to be a person of unsound mind?—Yes.

8312. Let us now turn to Dr. Robert Percy Smith's certificate. You say that you did not feel quite as attracted by Dr. Smith as you had been by Dr. Phillips?—That is so.

8313. He says that he is a person registered under the Medical Act, and he says that on the 9th December, 1916, at this house of Dr. Dempster's as we know it to be, he separately from any other practitioner examined you personally?—Yes.

8314. And came to the conclusion that you were a person of unsound mind and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment. Now let us see upon what grounds he formed that conclusion.

Mr. Jowitt: What is the date of this?

Mr. Walter Stewart: This is the 9th December, 1916. It must be the day before he was taken.

Earl Russell: He said he was taken on the 8th December.

Mr. Walter Stewart: The 10th is the real date.

Chairman: Was there not an urgency order, first of all, and then the final order?

Mr. Walter Stewart: Yes. This was on the 9th, and I think it was acted on the next day.

Chairman: I have the certificates in front of me. There is one certificate on the 12th December, 1916, by Dr. Percy Smith. There is one on the 10th December by Dr. Porter Phillips.

Mr. Walter Stewart: This one is dated the 9th.

Mr. Dickens: There is one on the 9th.

Mr. Jowitt: By whom, Mr. Stewart?

Mr. Walter Stewart: By Dr. Percy Smith.

Chairman: That is the urgency order.

Mr. Walter Stewart: This is the one I am on.

Chairman: Yes, I have got that. There is one on the 9th.

8315. Mr. Walter Stewart: I call the attention of the Commission to what the facts were upon which Dr. Percy Smith issued that certificate: "I formed this conclusion on the following grounds, namely (1) Facts indicating insanity observed by myself at the time of examination. He tells me that while in a nursing home for a nervous breakdown two years ago he was vilely and improperly treated and that one of the attendants tried to give him a venereal disease from which he (the attendant) suffered." (To the Witness:) Tell me, was there in fact any attendant at the nursing home which you had been at two years previously who was in fact suffering from any venereal disease, to your knowledge?—Of course I deny that I told Dr. Percy Smith this. I had discussed it with Dr. Dempster—a man on a more friendly footing.

8316. What did you discuss with Dr. Dempster?—I told Dr. Dempster that I thought it was a vile thing that a man with a complaint such as is suggested should be in the position of an attendant.

8317. An attendant where?—At a place at Teignmouth—a nursing home.

8318. Had there been any such attendant at the place at Teignmouth when you were there?—Yes.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8319. And that you had communicated to Dr. Dempster?—Yes.

8320. Did you ever say that the attendant had tried to communicate the disease to you?—I thought there was danger of it—not tried; but it was an unpleasant condition.

8321. You did not like being attended by an attendant suffering from that particular form of ailment?—No.

8322. Chairman: Let us be clear about this. This was not an attendant in an asylum, but an attendant in a nursing home?—Yes.

8323. Mr. Walter Stewart: You thought there might be a danger of his communicating the disease to you?—Yes.

8324. And that is what you said to Dr. Dempster?—Yes.

8325. Did you ever say that, as far as you recollect, to Dr. Percy Smith separately from Dr. Dempster?—No, I think not.

8326. It may be a long while ago?—Yes.

8327. He says next that on four occasions you told him you had removed pieces of surgical dressings from meat pies?—There was a good deal of practical joking. I might have said it.

8328. I suppose sometimes in such places surgical dressing is left about?—I daresay.

8329. Can you remember as an actual incident whether at any time any piece of surgical dressing ever did get into contact with a meat pie?—Yes, I think so.

8330. But you did not intend that to be a serious aspersion upon the nursing home, I suppose?—No.

8331. You do not now suggest it?—No.

8332. Now that being so, he says further that "The property which became his and his wife's on his aunt's death had been stolen from him by his first cousin." Tell us what, if anything, you had to justify that about the property?—That is a fact.

8333. What property was it?—It was some land and houses in the parish of Topsham in Devonshire.

8334. Who was the cousin?—A fellow called P. H.

8335. He was a defendant in a litigation you instituted long after, was he not?—Yes; I had to go for him in Chancery.

8336. With what result?—They gave in at once.

8337. And this is put down as one of the delusions upon which you are found to be a person of unsound mind?—Yes.

8338. Those were all the facts that he says he observed himself?—Yes.

8339. Now facts communicated by others. One, "His brother Mr. E. S. H. tells me that it is a delusion that the patient had any property left him by an aunt"?—That is a different statement; that is a mixture.

8340. What was the question with regard to the aunt and the property? Do you recollect it at all?—Yes. This old lady had a gift of certain property which should come to me by agreement on her death. Not only was that property taken, but part of my own property under leases and under agreements, my own house there, had been alienated.

8341. Where?—At Topsham in Devon.

8342. Where you now live. What happened?—They annexed this property. They jumped it really.

8343. While you were otherwise occupied?—Yes, while I was sick.

8344. Tell me this: Did you ultimately recover that property?—Yes, it is all back again.

8345. Mr. Jowitt: By this Chancery suit?—Yes.

Mr. Jowitt: May we have the pleadings in that suit?

Mr. Walter Stewart: The case is H. against H. and H.

8346. Chairman: I have got that. The suit, as far as I can judge, arose over a dispute as to what were the subjects covered by a particular agreement, and whether the defendants were prepared to convey to Mr. H. the precise subjects to which he was entitled under the agreement. The dispute was simply a dispute as to the subject-matter of purchase and sale. (To the Witness): I understand that you succeeded in that suit?—It was more than that. There were letters definitely giving my wife and myself these properties, the whole of the property which I now own.

8347. But it is only fair to say, looking at their defence, that they say you were entitled to something, but they disputed that you were entitled to all that you claimed?—That is so.

8348. Mr. Walter Stewart: Upon that Dr. Percy Smith says that it was communicated to him. (To the Witness): Tell me, were you ever told by anybody that that communication had been made to Dr. Percy Smith behind your back by Mr. E. H., namely, that it was a delusion on your part that you had any property left to you by your aunt?—Of course not.

8349. He never told you at the time?—No.

8350. So that this is something that is going on behind your back, like all the rest of it?—Yes.

8351. A step further. He puts that in among facts communicated by others as a fact on which he found you to be a person of unsound mind?—Yes.

8352. Then he goes on to say: "Dr. William Thomas Dempster, of 94, Brighton Road, Croydon, tells me that his statements about his treatment are quite imaginary." Was Dr. Dempster present at that nursing home where you had been two years before?—He had been down there twice, I think.

8353. Was he in a position to say whether what you said about the home was true or imaginary?—No.

8354. However, that is enough for Dr. Percy Smith. Now he says that you were restless and garrulous, and that you wrote many letters. It is true, is it not, that at that time, having much leisure on your hands, you did write a good many letters?—My secretary was ill, and I certainly took on his functions: I wrote my own letters. I was in bed, of course. Either Craig or Dempster said: "Well, let me post these letters." Many of them having cheques in them, and I left them open so that they might look at them.

8355. All this time, right up to the 9th December, 1916, were you conducting your own personal affairs?—Yes.

8356. Had you actually been giving instructions to your solicitor to make your will at a date quite shortly antecedent?—Yes.

8357. And was that very will on those instructions subsequently witnessed and signed by you after you had been deprived of your liberty?—Yes.

8358. Now you tell us it is true that you wrote many letters. I will not ask you what your opinion is. The Commission will have to decide whether that is a proper ground. I think you were restless in bed?—I think anyone with jaundice and post pneumatic would be restless. Neither of my nurses complained about it.

8359. But whether it is a fact or not, there it is. And you were talkative. That may be said, I suppose, of sane people of both sexes, may it not?—I believe so.

8360. Now to pass on from that. "The said H. W. H. appeared to me to be in a fit condition of bodily health to be removed to an asylum, hospital, or licensed house. I give this certificate having first read the section of the Act of Parliament printed below," which provides that "any person who makes a wilful misstatement of any material fact in any medical or other certificate, or in any statement or report of bodily or mental condition under this Act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour"?—Yes.

8361. He signed that and on those grounds?—Yes.

Mr. Dickens: My learned friend left out the reasons which are specially given on the second certificate. I am looking at the one of the 9th December: "He has symptoms pointing to the early stage of general paralysis."

Mr. Walter Stewart: That is not in this copy.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

Chairman: There are two certificates, Mr. Stewart. First of all, there is the one of the 9th December, which I think you have before you, and there is also one of the 10th December.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Might I have that, Sir?

Chairman: Certainly. The urgency certificate, which is the first one, contains the statement to which you have just alluded. It is right that it should be read. In the urgency order it is "I certify that it is expedient for the welfare of the said H. W. H. (or for the public safety, as the case may be) that the said H. W. H. should be forthwith placed under care and treatment. My reasons for this conclusion are as follows. He has symptoms pointing to the early stage of general paralysis, is changeable, talkative and excitable and cannot be properly controlled in a private house. The said H. W. H. appeared to me to be in a fit condition of bodily health to be removed to an asylum, hospital or licensed house. I give this certificate having first read the section of the Act of Parliament printed below." That is dated the 8th December, and is the single medical certificate which is necessary for the urgency order. Then follows the one which Mr. Stewart has been reading, the one of the 12th December.

Mr. Walter Stewart: There is some confusion about the dates, I think.

Chairman: The one I have been reading from is dated the 9th; then follows one of the 12th. That clears it up, does it not?

Mr. Dickens: Yes, thank you.

Mr. Walter Stewart: These are copies supplied to us. The first one is the 9th, and then there is one on the 10th.

Chairman: Yes, and one of Dr. Percy Smith's on the 12th December.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: In my copy the words "for the public safety" are struck out.

Chairman: The document I have is the Board of Control file; the words have not been struck out on it.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am sure my learned friend will help me. In which documents does my learned friend say the word "for the public safety" have been struck out?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: In my copy of the urgency order.

Mr. Walter Stewart: That of the 9th?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Yes.

Mr. Walter Stewart: They have not been struck out in the original.

Chairman: Nor in my copy either.

Mr. Walter Stewart: "I certify that it is expedient for the welfare of the said H. W. H. (or for the public safety as the case may be) that the said H. W. H. should be forthwith placed under care and treatment." Of course, Sir, I must deal with the document as it is, and I take it that that is a certificate that for the public safety it was necessary, as the document stands.

Chairman: It puts it alternatively.

Mr. Walter Stewart: But it is still left in. However, as it may be either it may be both.

Chairman: No doubt.

8362. Mr. Walter Stewart (to the witness): I have dealt with Dr. Porter Phillips and with Dr. Percy Smith. Is there any other certificate which you subsequently found had been made?—Yes. Of course, I always said that the issue of the urgency order was a wrong thing.

8363. You say they ought not to have taken that step?—An urgency order. Here was I quite peaceable in bed. I was not a menace to myself and others. I was enjoying the use of my cheque book and correspondence, and these doctors came into this house, which was only a working man's house, and they in an autocratic way issued these documents without my knowledge; and I should always have expected to have had a judicial authority, a magistrate, to see me being carried away. Trapped.

8364. As the judgment of Mr. Justice Sankey has been craved in aid here, I desire to call attention to a passage in that judgment. The Commissioners will see that in that judgment Mr. Justice Sankey specially says: "It was never alleged that this gentleman was dangerous to the public, that he was always a quiet, well-behaved patient."

8365. Chairman: I do not quite understand your allusion to a working-class house. What is the working-class house you were in?—I was in the house of this small medical practitioner, William Thomas Dempster, being a friend of his wife, who was a nurse. It was a small double-fronted villa in the Brighton Road, a house of about £30 or £40 rental.

8367. I daresay nowadays people wish they could get it?—Yes.

8369. As you mention that, I am bound to turn to the Moorcroft case book, because we say that the proprietor of that establishment ought to have communicated himself with the Board of Control.

8370. Chairman: Perhaps you will tell us whether you were in bed at this time. Did you get up to go to Moorcroft?—Yes, I got up to get some of my things packed.

8371. Were you in bed right up to the time of your removal to Moorcroft?—Yes.

8372. You must have got up and dressed?—Yes.

8373. Were you taken in an ambulance?—No, I was taken in an ordinary motor.

8374. If you were merely going for a drive why did you take a bag of clothes with you?—Porter Phillips, of course, told me that he was taking me to his house to recuperate after this attack.

8375. And he asked you to take some things with you. Were you thinking you were going to pay him a personal visit at his own house?—I thought I was going to be a paying guest there.

8376. And you took your own clothes with you?—I took some things with me.

8377. You would naturally take the clothing suitable to the season if you were paying a country house visit?—I took a thin suit only.

8378. You had chosen yourself the clothes you had taken?—Yes. You have got to remember that the temperature dropped.

8379. We get surprises in this climate very often?—It was intensely cold.

8380. Earl Russell: The temperature dropped in the course of your journey, did it?—No, it became very snowy and cold, and I had no warm things.

8381. Mr. Walter Stewart: How long did you apprehend that you would be at the house, which you believed you were going to, Dr. Phillips' house?—I did not know. I thought perhaps a week or two.

8382. Did you anticipate that you were going to spend the time in bed, or what?—I thought I should be up more; I hoped so.

8383. And had you any idea that you were going to be deprived of your personal liberty?—No, not in the least.

8384. If you had had that idea, would you have taken steps or not to procure a more ample wardrobe to take with you to Moorcroft?—I should.

8385. As it was, I suppose you thought you would be able to get anything you wanted at once?—Yes.

8386. You were taken in a motor to this Moorcroft establishment, which I believe is in the neighbourhood of Uxbridge, is it not?—Yes.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8387. A longish drive?—Yes.

8388. Still, there it was. There was the urgency order?—Yes.

8389. Did you suffer at all any ill effect from the journey?—No, not at that time.

8390. You arrived in due course at Moorcroft?—Yes.

8391. How soon did it dawn upon you that you were detained against your will at Moorcroft?—As soon as I was put into my sitting room, an old attendant came in with a wig on.

8392. You are, I gather, of a philosophical temperament. You did not make any violent disturbance, did you?—No; I took it as a tremendous joke.

8394. Did you in your experience find that it was so, or did you contrive to get out?—I took that as rather a challenge.

8395. While you were there, I want you to tell us quite calmly what sort of treatment you were subjected to—ameliorative treatment. What was your routine?—On my first admission into the place they treated me with great courtesy, with considerable courtesy. I objected to having these old keepers, very common chaps, in my rooms, and Stilwell did take them away, and I was not always in their presence. He allowed me to wander about the place; but you see I was still a very sick man, and of course I collapsed a few days afterwards.

8396. Now I want to ask you this: Did you receive a notice intimating to you that you were entitled to see a justice?—No.

8397. But you did see a justice, did you not, after some time?—One evening.

8398. How came that to pass?—I think that is the formula of an urgency order.

8399. He, in the ordinary routine, visited you?—I think so.

8400. Tell us about that experience, how far that availed you to obtain any redress. Describe the interview with the gentleman?—He is called William Ashton.

8401. What was he?—He was by trade a grocer, so my keepers told me, and he had been co-opted on to the Uxbridge Bench, and he was a special Commissioner, I think, appointed by the Board of Control. This old man came into my room and said: "I am a justice of the peace." I said: "I have been wanting to see you." Young Stilwell was there. I sent this justice a note demanding my release or an inquiry.

8402. Is that document available on the file?—I think I have a copy of it.

8403. Let me have the copy you have?—I have not got it here; it is in one of my letter books.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Of course, Sir, we have to see whether this is an insane man, and that might be a relevant document.

Witness: Yes, I think I can find it, but my secretary has died lately and I am a little astray with my papers.

8404. Chairman: The justice who saw Mr. H. had nothing to do with the Board of Control, had he?—Excuse me, Sir; Dickinson, who is the most important person in the Board of Control, wrote me and said that this was a special Commissioner appointed by the Board of Control.

8405. That Mr. Ashton was a special Commissioner? I think you must be wrong about that?—I have got the letter in my book.

8406. Perhaps you will let us have the letter?—I think Dickinson is a man who is occasionally very inaccurate; that is my experience.

8407. Mr. Walter Stewart: You say that the letter is in your possession?—Yes.

8408. Could you give us any idea of how long it would take to procure it?—I could telegraph for it now.

8409. Will you do so during the adjournment?—If I go down to-night you shall have it on Monday. He is a special justice appointed by the Uxbridge Bench.

Chairman: Now you have got it right.

8410. Mr. Walter Stewart: Go on, please, and describe the interview. What benefit was it to you?—Ashton obviously knew nothing about lunacy, and he turned to young Stilwell and said: "Well, what am I to do about it?" and Reggie Stilwell said: "Oh, leave it to the Commissioners."

8411. This is the judicial authority?—Yes. I protested. I said: "Don't you do that, Ashton. You take notice of my complaint. I protest against being imprisoned."

8412. I want you to think carefully before you answer this question. Would you yourself, as a man who has gone through this experience, if you had been given an opportunity, have preferred a really judicial procedure, or the procedure which was observed on this occasion?—There must be a judicial procedure if you are dealing with liberty.

8413. That is the opinion which you deliberately express to this Commission?—Certainly.

8414. Would you like to give the reasons for that opinion which you are now expressing?—In the great Dependencies, in the United States, it is always a judicial function, the taking away of a person's liberty.

8415. And even in England?—And even in England.

8416 Mr. Dickens: As a rule?—But the judicial authority of it disappears entirely, as with Ashton.

8417. Mr. Walter Stewart: Had you been given an opportunity to meet the facts as alleged in these three certificates, and on your oath to have explained them, would you have welcomed the opportunity?—Yes.

8418. Do you think it would have caused any mental detriment to have had the opportunity to do that?—None whatever.

8419. If you had been able to, would you have welcomed the intervention of an authorised representative to do that for you?—Certainly.

8420. As in any other relationship where skilled assistance is required?—Yes.

8421. Do you think that that in common fairness is a thing that should be available to a man who is deprived, or who is sought to be deprived of his liberty, or not?—Certainly.

8422. I pass from it, and leave my learned friends to cross-examine about it. Now how long after that interview did they keep you in detention at Moorcroft?—I protested, immediately I fell ill again; I was ill with jaundice on the 18th January.

8423. What caused you to fall ill with jaundice, do you think?—Well, I think I got a bad chill.

8424. Did you ever ask for any different raiment to that which you had taken?—Yes; I was expecting it to come.

8425. Did it ever come?—It came about four months later. Stilwell bought some fresh stuff for me.

8426. We are talking of December and January, 1916-17 now?—Yes.

8427. How much was charged for your maintenance at this private establishment?—The total bills, which I strongly objected to, in six months while I was there amounted to £700.

8428. We will do the arithmetic. Now pass from that and tell us quite quietly what sort of menage for maintenance was it, in which your bills amounted to £700 for a period of about six months?—I think the schedule of the Master in Lunacy allows about five guineas a week for it; that is the sort of regulation allowance, I think.

Mr. H.

8429. In the Moorcroft case book to which I have access, I have this, that he complained—

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Date please, Mr. Stewart.

8430. Mr. Walter Stewart: This is the entry in the Moorcroft book, January 10th: "Full of complaints, which are quite unfounded, about his food. He tells me he is employing detectives to watch the doctors who certified him"?—What are the initials against that—was that that Irishman, De Courcy Potterton?

8431. The initials are R.W.C.?—That is Bob Cole.

8432. What is he?—The less said of him the better. We must not go into these other people's business.

8433. At any rate that is what he said, that you complained of your food. In this establishment was there ever cause, as there may be even in all establishments, to complain of the food?—I would rather you did not take anything that Bob Cole put down as correct. I have no recollection of complaining of the food. I wrote to the Commissioners; they have got the letters. I said I thought, considering it was war time, the food was extremely good.

8434. You do not accept the accuracy of the entry?—No; nothing that man has put down.

Mr. Jowitt: May I have what he did put down? He complained of his food and said he was employing detectives to watch the doctors.

8435. Mr. Walter Stewart: Was it the document over which you had no control, Mr. H.?—No, nothing to do with me.

Earl Russell: Just before you read that, ask the witness if he complains to-day of the food at Moorcroft.

8436. Mr. Walter Stewart: I am obliged. (To the Witness:) Do you to-day at all complain of the actual food, meat and drink, you got at Moorcroft?—At the time I was first in Moorcroft I have said everything was very good. When I was put in among the inferior patients I objected very strongly.

8437. Was it different?—Yes.

8438. This is a document constructed without our knowledge or responsibility, which is in these terms: "January 10th. Month's report. He is mentally excitable and talkative. He wanders in his conversation; he is careless about his dress and his habits. His room is most untidy and accurately exhibits his mental disorder. To-day he is full of complaints which are quite unfounded about his food. He tells me he is employing detectives to watch the doctors who certified him, and that he is claiming £5,000 from them. He has signs of general paralysis of the insane. He has inequality of pupils and some tremor of the tongue and occasional impediment in his speech. He has recently had an attack of jaundice. R.H.C." That is the 10th January, 1917. We are now speaking on the 17th January, 1925. How do you feel to-day?—With regard to these statements?

8439. With regard to your health?—At that time I was a sick man physically, but I was perfectly right mentally.

8440. And how are you now with regard to your physical health?—I am not in the most robust physical health, but I am, I believe, mentally sound, and always was.

8441. It is fair to put it to you, so that there may be no misapprehension. Are you to-day suffering or have you ever to your knowledge and belief, suffered from general paralysis of the insane?—I am perfectly certain it is untrue.

8442. I am not going to ask you with regard to the pathology of that, but there are doctors, for instance, who know the usual course of the disorder. Have you studied it?—I have read a good deal of it.

8443. What is the average duration of that distressing and generally fatal malady?—Of course it is a death certificate. For Dr. Porter Phillips to have put a thing like that on a certificate—first of all it is a criminal libel, and secondly no wise physician would ever say a man had got cancer after he had been examining him for ten minutes. There should have been at least three Wasserman blood tests; at least, Sir Thomas Horder tells me so; and Stilwell was engaged, his statutory duty was to find out if this was true. He should have taken a few drops of blood and sent them to a pathologist, and he would have found that these filthy certificates were untrue.

8444. If you had known of these filthy statements in those filthy certificates?—I would have had my blood tested again.

8445. There is one other matter which I think it is right to put to you: Do you know that G.P.I., as it is generally called, is supposed to be one of the sequelæ of syphilis?—I know it now.

8446. Have you ever in your life suffered from that distressing malady?—I have never had any sexual disorder of any type, at any time. On that case book there is the question why that statutory duty was not carried out. There is a statutory duty on the doctors of these asylums that on reception of a patient they should enter up a proper report, such as a physician would give. These people never bothered about it, and Stilwell explained it in the Newington action. He said: "Oh, it was forgotten." There were three doctors.

8447. You had no idea then as to what they should do and what they should not do?—No.

8448. The status of an alleged lunatic under detention under an urgency order does not enable him personally to investigate it very much?—I cannot help thinking the most desirable—

Chairman: I think there is some mistake. I have got the medical statement. On the file there is the usual medical statement which is given within a day or two of the admission. This is the report made at Moorcroft; it is in two parts, as you know. It is first of all on the mental state and then the bodily state. Certain observations are made with regard to your mental state and with respect to your bodily condition certain other observations are made, and that is signed by "R. H. Cole, Acting Medical Officer at Moorcroft." That such a report was made in conformity with the statute is obvious from the file. Whether its contents are accurate or not is another matter. The date of that is the 10th December, 1916.

Witness: I have no note in my diary of an examination, and he made no examination.

8449. Mr. Walter Stewart: Your evidence is borne out, I see, by the entry with regard to the jaundice, because on 23rd December I see it appears that "Mr. H. has been in his room suffering from abdominal pains this morning. He has developed jaundice and has been given H.G.G.G. and put on milk diet." Then it goes on to say what your condition was: "31st December. Has been very feverish, 104." That is the temperature?—Yes.

8450. "Pulse 120, marked jaundice, vomited once. Sleepless." That is signed "J.B. 31."

Chairman: The point we were on for the moment was whether there had been some negligent breach of a statutory duty which is imposed upon an institution.

Witness: It does not matter what is entered in the case book. What is the truth according to my knowledge is that there was no physical examination.

8451. Mr. Walter Stewart: And that you will swear?—That I will swear.

8452. We shall hope to have the benefit of hearing Mr. Cole's version presently. I do not want to labour this, but look at this entry: "23rd January, 1917. The patient spends most of the day in his own room playing with his monkeys and writing letters to various people. He has expressed a great dislike to me personally, and is best left to others for the time being." That is signed "C.P."—That is Potterton; he was an Irishman.

8453. What sort of an Irishman?—He told me his father was the Dean of Raphoe, but wherever that is I do not know. Still, he was quite a courteous, nice fellow.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8454. But he accurately expressed your feelings with regard to him in that entry?—I think so. I always read a great deal. There was very little to do. I had four newspapers every day, I think. I used to cut from the newspapers statistics and things of that sort, and glue them on to a German oleograph.

8455. Why did you do that?—Because I did not want to damage the walls of the place. I glued them on glass and stuck them on with gum, and these people seemed to think that that was proof positive of G.P. I wanted to have these statistics relating to ships. I am a naval architect, I am a naval man, and I wanted to have these things in a visible position.

8456. Chairman: Where did you put them?—I stuck them on a German oleograph that was in the room. I stuck them on the glass. Reggie Stilwell told my friend, the Rector of a place down there, he said, "That is proof positive that that man has G.P. He is so untidy."

8457. Mr. Walter Stewart: Did you know that they were making these entries against you?—Yes.

8458. You got a peep at the case books, I think?—Yes. I saw something about paralysis.

8459. What did you do when you saw them?—I asked Stilwell about it, and he said it must be untrue; he passed it off. It beat me altogether that I should be paralysed, I knew it was quite untrue that I was in any way paralysed. What "general paralytic" meant I did not know then.

8460. You know it now?—I know it now all right.

8461. Did you seek at any time to obtain access to any statutory body outside, in order to obtain redress for the treatment that you were subjected to?—Yes; I wrote to all my friends who were in a judicial position. I believe those letters were sent.

8462. I am talking about the statutory people, the Board of Control?—I used to write to the Board of Control every week.

8463. With what result?—Nothing doing. They sent down the Commissioner.

8464. Who was he?—Rather a nice fellow, called Branthwaite. He had lived in India a good deal. I got a lot of visitors

8465. Tell us about him and his visit, and how far it availed you to recover your liberty, or to obtain any form of redress?—He came into my room. I had just come in from the dentist with a keeper. He was rather interested in these little tiny monkeys I had. We talked about India.

8466. Earl Russell: Had you the monkeys at Moorcroft?—I had them in a parrot cage. Branthwaite was dogged by Reggie Stilwell, and we talked for a little time. I mentioned that I was anxious to get my release, and that I had written a good many letters to the Board of Control to which I had not received replies, and Branthwaite seemed rather bored with the correspondence. He turned on his heel and said to Reggie Stilwell: "I suppose the diagnosis is not complete?" and Stilwell gaily said, "Of course not."

8467. Were you able to obtain any redress at all from that Commissioner?—I wrote him a personal letter, which went, and said I hoped I had not treated him in any way discourteously, and he replied quite nicely. No notice was taken of it. I was expecting him to take some action with the authorities.

8468. Did he ever take any, as far as you know?—As far as I know, none.

8469. Or did the Board of Control?—No

8470. Chairman: But why were you asking that he should not take the interview in a discourteous sense? Had there been any passage or discussion between you?—The impression left upon my mind was that he was annoyed at something I had said. Of course, I complained about imprisonment. I was a prisoner.

8471. Mr. Walter Stewart: You were only then an inmate?—I was a prisoner.

8472. Chairman: I merely want to know why you thought it was necessary to write him a letter saying that you hoped he had not taken anything you said discourteously?—The idea was very much to remind him of my case, to look into my case and to do something.

8473. Was the interview a private one?—No; Reggie Stilwell was there. He would never allow anyone to see me without his guidance.

8474. Mr. Walter Stewart: Now you have been asked about your complaint as to medical treatment. In that illness that you suffered at Moorcroft with regard to the first period of your detention, had you any medical treatment from anybody other than the treatment of this attendant whom you have told us about—the head attendant, I think he was?—The first treatment I received there was by Potterton and Gray. I think the head keeper came into my room rather late at night, after I had been to sleep, and said that Dr. Porter Phillips had ordered me a draught. I asked him what the draught was for, and he said, "Oh, it is a sedative." "Well," I said, "I will not take it," and he rather pressed me to. I said, "I have been asleep already and you have wakened me up."

8475. Did he wake you up to take a sedative?—Yes.

8476. This was not a lunatic asylum, was it?—I do not know. He pressed me to take it, and he went on arguing, and I said, "You had better get out of it," and I threw it in the fire. I was afraid of being in an asylum. It is the sort of thing you have read about in "Hard Cash" and other books.

8477. You were afraid to take it. Never mind whether you had reasons, you were afraid?—Yes.

8478. Supposing you were again subjected, in your present state of mind, as to which the Commission must judge, to such a treatment, would you now be willing to take a drug, the nature of which you were unacquainted with, if it were forced upon you?—No.

8479. Same or insane?—No.

8480. So much for the treatment. Did you have the benefit at that time of any other treatment than that of the head attendant, as far as you know?—I do not look on a doctor walking about in a place as treatment. There were plenty of doctors there.

8481. Treatment, I am talking of?—There was no treatment except what is mentioned in the case book, and of course as soon as I was in extremis they did then bring several eminent people.

8482. I think Fagg was brought down?—Yes.

8483. Can you give us the date of his visit?—Yes.

8484. You were very ill then; I see your temperature was 104?—Yes. Fagg was brought down because I insisted upon an operation.

8485. That is someone from outside the establishment?—Yes. You see, I knew pretty well what my symptoms were, because my father died of the same thing, and I nursed him.

8486. What did he die of?—He died of gall stones. I am not sure it was not carcinoma of the gall bladder.

8487. And you were suffering from an affection of the gall bladder?—Yes. We never really knew what it was, because they do not take much notice of these things. They are not scientific places, you know.

8488. You have told us about the visit of the member of the Board of Control, or the Commissioner. I think during your stay at Moorcroft you also did see one other Commissioner, did you not?—I saw two Commissioners.

8489. Was that a lady—a Miss Dendy?—Yes, Miss Dendy.

8490. Just describe your interview with her.—She was a dear old thing. She came into my sitting room. My coat was off; I immediately got up and put on my coat as a matter of courtesy, and she started away, thinking I was going to attack her. She said, "Is your name Mr. H.?" I said "Yes," and she bolted out then. She ticked me off.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8491. You did not obtain any satisfaction in that way from Miss Dendy?—No, it was no good with regard to Miss Dendy.

8492. Now finding this state of affairs, did it occur to you that it was for you to take the initiative? You are a gentleman who has a good deal of manual dexterity. You are able to improvise tools and use them?—I think so.

8493. I think you used the knowledge you have got as a craftsman, in order to remove the fastenings of the windows at Moorcroft and descend from your bedroom window to the ground?—Yes; it was rather difficult getting out of that place. It was very much of a gaol, so I induced Reggie to buy me a large-scale 25 in. Ordnance map. I made him a drainage plan, and at the same time I was able to see the minutiae of the walling. Then I invited Reggie to buy me a new box for my clothes, and he gaily sent up a box with two very good, strong straps on it. I was able to fit these together, and take down a fitting from the roof of the place, screw it on to the floor, hang the straps out of the window, and so perhaps get 18 ft. or 20 ft. down into the garden at night.

8494. Although recently recovered from an illness, you took that risk?—Yes.

8495. Why did you take such a risk as that?—I told Stilwell, "I am satisfied that the whole place is dishonest, and I am going to take the law into my own hands." He had never given me parole, but he had given me a good deal of liberty. I think he tightened up observation after that, but the police attendants in the place were very favourable to me, and would do much that I wanted them to.

8496. Chairman: If you had had a good deal of liberty, could you not have escaped less elaborately—less like the "cat burglar"?—No.

8497. Why should you go through this elaborate machinery?—It is very much a lock-up place, with walls all round; it is quite different from Ticehurst. Ticehurst is a country estate where one could really walk away.

8498. Mr. Snell: Was the liberty that you had restricted to the institution?—My liberty was restricted to the institution, except under guard.

8499. Chairman: I think, Mr. H., you went to Uxbridge. Were you not alone in Uxbridge?—No, I always had somebody at my elbow.

8500. Earl Russell: Wait a moment. Take paragraph 41: "I was allowed to go into Uxbridge occasionally with an attendant, who often left me by myself."—Left me at the dentist's.

8501. Chairman: Could you not have given him the slip then, if you wanted to?—I thought it would be perilous to get away in the daytime.

8502. Mr. Jowitt: Just read on: "It was owing to this I attended the Court there, with a view of making a protest to the justices."—I slipped the attendant at the corner, but he was within sight, because he followed me into the place.

Chairman: Why was it necessary to go through so elaborate a procedure to escape when you had been able to move about in Uxbridge?

Mr. Walter Stewart: No, Sir; he said that even then the attendant was at his elbow, and followed him into the Court.

8503. Chairman: "An attendant, who often left me by myself"?—I was left alone in the dentist's, but in the street there was always somebody with me.

8504. Earl Russell: May I just follow the rest of this paragraph 41? You now tell us, I understand, that you could not get into the Court because the attendant caught you up and stopped you?—I got into the Court, and Jack Stilwell, the father of this man here, was sitting on the Bench, and I intended to make a protest then, but he had spotted me.

8505. Mr. Walter Stewart: And having spotted you, who was it that accompanied you back to the institution?—I think it was a man called Jacobs.

8506. So he was there?—Yes, he was in the place; he sat with me.

8507. You had not sufficient start in the broad daylight to get away clear?—That is so.

8508. But at night, was it different?—Yes.

8509. At night did you think it a better plan to get the start which you did get by escaping through the window?—Yes.

8510. That is your explanation of why you did it in the way you did it?—Yes.

8511. Is there any other ground at all for the suggestion that you acted in that matter as an insane man?—No. The attendants were delighted about the whole thing. They said it was ably planned, and they had not got into any trouble over it.

8512. If you had been with an attendant who had been lax and you had escaped in the day, he would have got into trouble?—Undoubtedly. I liked most of the attendants.

8513. Did you know at that time that if you managed to keep out for 14 days they could not, without re-certifying you, get you back?—I think I wrote to the Commissioners and asked for a copy of the Act.

8514. After you escaped?—No; I wrote in the first place because I knew nothing about the Lunacy Acts. The Commissioners ignored my request. Then I asked the different doctors for it, and they said "No," but eventually I got one from Eyre and Spottiswoode, when I was at Ticehurst. I knew nothing about the Acts at that time.

8515. So you were recaptured in three or four days?—I was too short of money to carry on, and my relatives would not supply me with money.

8517. Mr. Jowitt: Where did you stay during these three days?—I got into a quiet little hotel at the back of Euston Station. I obtained a doctor's certificate then. A man called McNaughton visited me on the 29th December at the request of a pal of mine, a solicitor. McNaughton came and saw me with Reggie Stilwell, when I was very ill with jaundice, and he accepted Stilwell's view that I was dangerous, and made a perfectly poisonous report.

Mr. Dickens: Dr. McNaughton is dead. I propose to read the report.

Chairman: Would you like it read now, Mr. Stewart?

8518. Mr. Stewart (to the Witness): When was this report obtained—during the period of your escape?—No. McNaughton saw me on the 29th December in Moorcroft.

8519. Dr. McNaughton was known to you personally, was he?—No, I knew nothing of him.

8520. How did he come to see you?—He was sent by a friend of mine called Ritchie.

8521. What was Ritchie's motive in sending McNaughton to see you?—Ritchie had been to see me on the 23rd December.

8522. Did you complain to Ritchie that you were improperly detained there?—Of course I did.

8523. Then was it in consequence of that, that Ritchie got McNaughton to go down to see if he took a different view of the case?—No, what Ritchie did was this. He said: "It is perfectly absurd that this man is alleged to be insane." He went to my brother and said: "There must be some mistake, the man is ill, but is perfectly sane." He went to my brother and he said he would pay Dr. McNaughton to go down.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8524. So he was only sent down in your interest?—Yes.

8525. You mentioned a friend, Mr. Ritchie, coming to see you. Was there any obstacle put in the way of your friends coming to see you while at Moorcroft?—Not in the first part of my detention.

8526. You were allowed to see anybody?—And before then I think I saw pretty well anyone who came down to see me.

Mr. Dickens: This is dated the 29th December, and it is written to E. H. who is the petitioner: "I visited Moorcroft to-day and examined Mr. W. H. He is certainly deranged and requires to be under care and treatment. This is really ascertained from his conversations, some of his actions and his markedly facile manner. It is not easy to perceive at present signs of organic brain disease, although two early ones are present, namely slight irregularity of the right pupil and a tremulous tongue. These symptoms, along with the normal state, would denote almost invariably the early stages of general paralysis of the insane. It will, however, be two or three months before one can be positive as to the course Mr. W. H.'s trouble will take, but meantime one cannot consider the outlook good."

Witness: That is his report.

8527. Mr. Walter Stewart: And that was addressed, as I gather, to your brother, the petitioner?—Yes.

8528. You told us that your friend had gone to your brother?—Yes.

8529. What had happened behind your back between your brother and him you do not know?—I do not know.

8530. Your brother procured someone to go, and your brother was the petitioner?—Yes.

8531. Did you, during that brief period of time, have an opportunity of getting privately vetted?—Yes.

8532. By whom?—I went to McNaughton under another name.

8533. And under another name what did he give you?—When he saw me in bed, I was in bed extremely bad with a violent pain from gastric or liver colic. He saw me on the 29th December, in Moorcroft with Reggie Stilwell. Then I escaped and I saw him on a Saturday, I think it was.

8534. Mr. Jowitt: How long after?—I escaped on the Thursday.

Mr. Dickens: The date of the escape is the 23rd February.

Chairman: The date I have is that he escaped on the 8th February, and was captured four days later.

(After a short adjournment.)

8546. Chairman: Will you please continue your examination of Mr. H., Mr. Stewart? I think we had reached the point where Mr. H. lost the certificate which Dr. McNaughton had given, which I think you said, Mr. H., was lost in Chancery Lane or taken from your pocket when you were undressed?—Yes.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am going to call for that second certificate. I do not know whether it is in the possession of anybody present.

Chairman: We have not got it; and, of course, it would naturally not be in any official file. If it was lost in Chancery Lane, of course, it is lost for good.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Mr. H. is not sure whether it was taken from him when he was stripped, or whether it was lost in Chancery Lane.

Mr. Dickens: The case book says 23rd February. "Mr. H. managed to open his bedroom window early this morning."

Mr. Walter Stewart: That may be true, I do not know.

Witness: I went to McNaughton because I had been told about him.

Chairman: It is a mistake in the précis. I have got the file in front of me: "Escaped on the 23rd February, 1917, and re-taken on the 26th February." That would correspond with the date of the 23rd.

8535. Mr. Walter Stewart: Now we know how long after the first vetting it was that you were vetted by the same man again?—Yes.

8536. What sort of a bill of health did he give you at that time?—I went to him and said: "I am a man out of the Navy temporarily, and I want to get back again." I said, "I am supposed to be suffering from paralysis of some sort. Will you very kindly examine me and give me a report, so that I may get back into the service?"

8537. And what report did he give you?—He gave me a report qualifying me for light work.

8538. Chairman: Did he not recognise you, when you came into his consulting room again, because he had seen you quite shortly before?—When he saw me in bed at Moorcroft I was jaundiced up to the eyes; it was a dark room. I took the risk, anyhow.

8539. He did not in fact recognise you?—No.

8540. Mr. Walter Stewart: I must take it out of order of date, I am afraid, because my friend objects to secondary evidence. (To the Witness): Tell me, how came you to be deprived of that bill of health as I call it?—Exactly what happened was this: On the Monday morning I was going down trying to collect some money, and in Chancery Lane I was collared. There was a bit of a scuffle there, and either that certificate was lost there or it was taken from me when I was stripped on my return to Reggie Stilwell's place by De Courcy Potterton.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I formally call for it if I may, in case it should be in the possession of Dr. Stilwell.

8541. Sir David Drummond: You mentioned paralysis, that is to say, you asked him to examine you for paralysis. Did you mention anything about mental symptoms?—I suggested the nervous side—paralysis, you see.

8542. But that might have nothing to do with mental symptoms?—I insisted upon him examining my eyes, as I did with all these doctors.

8543. You did not mention anything about mental symptoms?—No; I did not tell him I had escaped from an asylum.

8544. Mr. Walter Stewart: You left it to his acumen to detect any signs of mental disturbance, if any were in fact present?—Yes. He gave me a certificate in a few lines.

8545. What did it say?—In effect it said: "This patient has been invalidated out of the Navy temporarily, and I consider he is fit for light duty."

Mr. Croom-Johnson: So far as my clients are concerned, it may be taken that they have never seen it or heard of it, that it is not in their possession and never has been in their possession.

Chairman: We will take it as simply being what Mr. H. has said: that it certified that he was fit for light duty.

Witness: Then I want to supplement that. I wrote to Mrs. McNaughton. Poor McNaughton was in bad health; he died shortly afterwards; in fact, everybody I was associated with died afterwards. Mrs. McNaughton wrote me to say that she had gone carefully through her husband's notes and she found no certificate about me at all, not even the first one they had, so I imagine he was careless.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

I think it is a very reasonable suggestion that he was careless.

8547. However, be that as it may, we have not got the certificate. You have told us, to the best of your recollection, what its contents were?—I had five medical certificates before my final escape.

8548. We have not quite reached that stage yet.—As long as you are in a madhouse you never can get any independent evidence. It is no good sending two doctors, as under the statute. You cannot get it.

8549. Why do you say that?—Because they are coloured with the information which other doctors in the madhouse give them, and the case books. Look at this case book of Moorcroft.

8550. Chairman: The point is an important one, and I should like to have your view upon it. In private practice, for instance, when one calls in a consultant, the first thing he does is to see 'your ordinary medical attendant, and say: "Tell me about this case;" and then the consultant forms his opinion upon the information given him, and also upon his own observation of the case. I am a little puzzled by your theory that where the case is a mental illness the medical attendant should not have an opportunity of giving an opinion to the consultant?—Mental illness is a thing entirely outside of any ordinary medicine. There are no rules about it; there is nothing definite at all. It is the most mythical thing you can have. The books these gentlemen write are perfect nonsense.

8551. Do you mean the treatises on insanity?—Yes; and in the medical profession, as I see it—and I have many relatives who are doctors—the consultant who comes in and does not support or hide up the general practitioner is not looked on as a white man. He will not be called in again, if he does not support the general practitioner. That is one of the defects of medical practice; and I am sure this gentleman will support me in that. They are taught in their schools that they must support each other.

8552. Earl Russell: Right or wrong?—Right or wrong. My friend, Dr. Munro, who is a difficult man, as you know, is a man who puts his patients' interests far and away in advance of any class interest of his own medical profession, and he is an honest doctor. It is the greatest profession we have.

8553. Mr. Walter Stewart: The witness was saying that Dr. Munro was an honest doctor. Let me ask you about Dr. Munro. He was a gentleman who at one time was the proprietor of a private mental institution, was he not?—Yes, an institution for 11 ladies.

8554. An institution for gain?—Yes.

8555. And he voluntarily surrendered his licence in respect of that institution, did he not?—He did not surrender it; he cancelled it.

8556. Voluntarily?—Yes.

8557. Why did he do that—has he ever told you?—Yes. He told me he would not accept instructions from a man of the type of Dickinson, of the Board of Control; he objected to being dictated to by a clerk.

8558. Was there any other reason?—There was another serious reason. He was instructed that he was not to release cured patients.

8559. Is he available as a witness to give evidence before this Commission?—Yes.

Chairman: He recently wrote me a letter saying that he desired to withdraw his offer to give evidence, and referring to this Commission in terms which, I regret to say, were anything but polite.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am sure Dr. Munro would be the first to express his regret.

Chairman: Mr. H. has himself expressed his regret, and I do not associate him with this in any way.

Mr. Walter Stewart: It is the result of an article which should never have appeared in the Press.

Chairman: However, so far as we are concerned, it does not affect us. I do not think we need go into Dr. Munro's position.

Witness: No; but I do wish to maintain that he is an honourable man.

Earl Russell: We do not want second-hand evidence of what he thinks.

8560. Mr. Walter Stewart: That is the position as it at present stands, and you know about Dr. Munro. (To the Witness): He, I think, at one time actually went a voyage with you?—Yes, I know all about him.

8561. Now come, please, to your enforced return to Moorcroft after your three days' escape. I want you to describe, quite quietly, what were your experiences when you were brought back there. Were you brought back against your will?—Yes.

8562. They were legally entitled to take you back. Just tell us what happened?—I demanded of the police when I was arrested that I should be taken before a magistrate, and the attendants who arrested me produced a letter from John Stilwell, who is the licensee of Moorcroft and also a justice of the peace (which I think is very improper), authorising these men to arrest me.

8563. He was within his legal rights?—Yes.

8564. Earl Russell: You are referring to the police on duty in Chancery Lane?—Yes.

8565. Mr. Walter Stewart: You make no complaint with regard to the executive officers. Please tell the Commission what happened to you when you were taken back to Moorcroft?—All my clothes were removed, and all my toilet accessories; everything in my room had been cleared out; and I was put into a ward which was not the lowest ward in the place, but the intermediate ward.

8566. What ward was that?—It was not called a detention ward, but it was next to the rough house.

8567. Was there a rough house at Moorcroft?—Yes.

8568. And it was next to that in order of classification?—Yes.

8569. Will you please describe the conditions in which you found yourself?—I had a number of very objectionable people with me.

8569A. In what way were they objectionable?—They were incontinent; they were noisy; they were bad cases—all of them.

8570. In what way were they bad cases?—They had to be under the strictest supervision; there were two warders always in the room with them; and they were the most objectionable neighbours to anyone with any sense of decency.

8571. Had you to live together with those people all day long?—I had to live with them all day long; but I returned to my bedroom at night with an policeman.

8572. Now it is not suggested that at any time you were a violent case, as far as I understand?—Never.

8573. Were any of those people in that department of Moorcroft violent?—One or two were at times violent.

8574. In what way?—Well, they struck the attendants; and they would ramp around. Reginald Stilwell was away at the time; I think he was sick; but Cole did in a way try to take out from that room the very offensive patients who were noisy and beastly and put them in the lower grade room.

8575. Let me ask you this: As far as you are acquainted with the topography of Moorcroft, was there no other place in that institution which would have been safe as a place for your detention?—I was put there as a punishment, because I had a sitting room in the place, but I was not allowed to use it.

8576. Was that the room you had escaped from?—No.

8577. Was that a safe room?—Perfectly.

8578. You say you were put in this place as a punishment?—Yes.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8579. Was the condition of the room different from the condition of the room you had first enjoyed during your stay at Moorcroft?—Entirely.

8580. In what respect?—It was punishment.

8581. Describe in what way it was punitive?—In this way: that I object to associating with the sort of people that were there. It was not a room as big as this one probably, and there were all these people crowded together.

8582. How many of them were there?—14 of them; and the whole thing was an indignity; it was an insult; I resented it.

8583. Your clothes were taken from you, you say?—My toilet things were taken from me. Every night my clothes were removed, so that I should not escape again.

8584. What about your toilet requisites?—The things that I wanted, such as tooth-brushes and things like that, were not there for four or five days, but they gradually drifted back.

8585. It was a temporary derangement?—Yes, purely temporary.

8586. Now tell us with regard to your food at that period. Was it the same as it had previously been, or was it different?—The food was on a different scale. In the morning and at lunch time I had my meals with the keepers and many of these people in a ward. My dinner at night was served on a tray in this big place, with a lot of these people ramping around.

8587. Was it different food or the same food as you had previously had?—It was sufficient, because I am satisfied with very little.

8588. Was it different to that which you had had before?—Yes, it was on a different scale.

8589. In what way was it different?—Was it better or worse?—It was certainly worse.

8590. In what respect?—It seemed to me to be of a poorer quality, and there was not the choice of things.

8591. This was in war time, and you desire to make no meticulous criticisms with regard to the diet, but you say that the food was different when you were under punishment?—Yes.

8592. Earl Russell: What did they do with your monkeys? Were you allowed to have them?—When I got there, I told the Curator at the Zoo to send a van and collect them.

8593. Were they collected?—They collected them and took charge of them.

8594. Mr. Jowitt: You did not have them back again?—I got them back again when I escaped, of course. I did not have them back at Moorcroft; I thought it was not suitable.

8595. Mr. Walter Stewart: As to Moorcroft, is there anything else you desire to say with regard to your second detention there?—With regard to Moorcroft, I do not want to be unfair, but I do resent the bringing of my wife into this. All my letters to her were stopped, and my solicitor, Mr. Steele, collected them after months from the keepers at the place; many of them were opened.

8596. Were you told that your correspondence was being tampered with?—I know I realised it after a time.

8597. You have talked about your toilet requisites. Is there anything you desire to say with regard to towels in this new place where you were detained?—I was not allowed to go into my bedroom, as I did formerly. I had to go into the common wash-place.

8598. Had you your own individual towel?—No; it was simply a dirty place such as you would get in a factory.

8599. You said that some of these patients were incontinent?—Yes.

8600. Did that affect the place at all in which you washed?—I would not like to go into that.

8601. You had to use such towels as were available?—There was one towel for the lot.

8602. Did you ever protest about that?—Of course I did.

8603. With what result?—Nobody took any notice. There is no law in these places.

8604. Did you protest at any time against your detention in that particular ward?—Yes.

8605. To whom?—To my petitioner.

8606. That was your brother, was it not?—Yes, my brother; and he, after some six weeks, wrote to Stilwell, and said, "It is most unsuitable." Stilwell at that time, you see, was beginning to move. I was being served with writs in this asylum; and he then put me back in my sitting-room. I am very grateful to him for that.

8607. There is one other matter I have not put to you. You told us about a will that had been prepared with the assistance of your solicitor before you were certified?—Yes.

8608. Was anything done with regard to that will while you were still at Moorcroft?—Yes.

8609. Could you recollect the date at which it happened and what it was?—Yes. The will was prepared by Mr. Muther in November, and it was in draft when I was imprisoned. This is an admitted document, prepared by Messrs. Speechley, Mumford and Craig. The will was signed in the presence of R. H., my elder brother, and witnessed by Stilwell, on the 30th January.

8610. During the period of your first detention?—Yes. I requested that my solicitor should attend then, because I wanted to make certain minor alterations, and I was refused, of course. If I had died there, which I might very well have done, I do not know what sort of trouble there would have been over the will.

8612. Are those what you refer to as the writs that were coming in?—Yes. Mr. Steele—this gentleman sitting behind here—was instructed by my brother-in-law, who is a Newcastle solicitor, to serve me with a writ, and I had instructed my wife to writ me. I had managed to get a letter out to her; it was posted by a keeper.

8613. Earl Russell: In your own interest, you wanted these writs?—In my own interest I wanted them. I knew that huge sums were being given to anybody who asked for them, and I rather objected.

8614. Mr. Walter Stewart: How did the knowledge that all your affairs were under the control of other people affect your mind, and that you had no means of personally controlling your estate—how did that affect your mental quietude?—Well, I am a business man, I suppose, and I naturally resented the position; but I looked on the whole thing from a humorous point of view, because I saw how difficult things were.

8615. You tried to behave as a philosopher?—I think so.

8616. Chairman: A laughing philosopher?—Yes.

8617. Mr. Walter Stewart: I want to know this: it is alleged that detention is for two purposes: the safety of the patient and other lieges; and also for the purposes of curative treatment. What was the specialised form of treatment which you enjoyed at Moorcroft?—The curative treatment was largely my own, because the head butler, the head attendant, Gray, was favourably inclined towards me, and would give me out of the medicine cupboard or the big medicine room anything that I asked him for.

8618. And you prescribed for yourself?—I prescribed for myself.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8619. Except on the occasion when you were presented with a sedative?—Yes; and when I was desperately ill, after Hale White came.

8620. Now your brother, the petitioner, interested himself with regard to the question of removal to a more congenial atmosphere—was that so?—Yes.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I call for a letter which was written by Mr. E. S. H. to Mr. Steele, requesting that this gentleman should be given an opportunity to be moved to more congenial surroundings. I do not happen to have a copy.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: We will search for this particular letter, if you could give us the date of it.

Mr. Walter Stewart: It would be some time in May, I think, because Mr. H. was moved in June. We can go on while the letter is being found.

8621. Mr. Jowitt: Might we just get from Mr. H. what he prescribed for himself?—I had an attendant at that time who was a masseur, and I used a preparation called Elliman's Embrocation, because I had so much pain back and front here. (Describing.) This was before the operation. He used to rub me with powder and that embrocation. It is not true that he ever treated me with mercury; because the only mercury that ever came near me was sent by Maurice Craig, and I used it for lighting my fire. I ceased to have any confidence in people. I prescribed for myself in that respect. I had a black draught. Gray used to give me that. I do not think I would have had confidence enough to take anything else.

8622. Mr. Walter Stewart: There is a special appropriateness in what you were telling us with regard to mercury. At any time in your life have you ever been subjected to treatment by mercury?—Never.

8623. I ask you that for special reasons?—Yes.

8624. The correspondence not being produced, I pass on. An order, I think, was obtained. Under some authorised procedure you were removed to Ticehurst—is that so?—Yes. I was served with a writ.

8625. And that was on the 8th June, 1917?—No, it was earlier than that.

Earl Russell: I want to know how serving him with a writ led to his going to Ticehurst.

Witness: It was in May some time that the writ was served. Mr. Lovibond telephoned me; Mr. Steele telephoned; it was just before the 18th May. The writer was a fellow with one arm, an old soldier. I told him the facts and said: "I must immediately see the solicitor who has been instructed to act." No one had heard of the suggestion before. Then Mr. Steele telephoned on the 17th May, and came on the 18th himself. He is present here. He was then told by Dr. Stilwell that I was a dangerous case.

8626. Mr. Walter Stewart: Who told him that?—Reginald Stilwell. I have it in his proof here. I was a dangerous case. If he was frightened at all, he only had to raise his voice, and the keepers would spring in and protect him.

8627. So it was suggested to your solicitor that you were a dangerous person?—Yes.

8628. So that your independent adviser, as far as you were allowed to have any contact with him, might not also have an independent point of view?—No. The Lunacy Master, Sir David Brynmor Jones, ordered my removal to Ticehurst. I requested Sir David, of whom I knew something and who knew something of me, either to release me or let me attend his court, or, if he could not do either, to send me to a better place.

8629. Chairman: May I just interpose for one moment? It is said that your solicitors were informed by Dr. Stilwell that you were a dangerous case?—Mr. Charles Steele was informed in that sense.

8630. I am in a little difficulty about that, because I find a letter of your solicitors, dated 14th May, which says this: "We are concerned for the above named patient" (that is yourself) "and are desirous of making inquiries by direction of the Master in Lunacy as to whether there is a vacancy in your asylum" (that is Ticehurst). "We may add that the patient is a highly respectable gentleman and occupied a good position in the shipping world. He is not of a dangerous disposition, but it is desired to secure an asylum with better surroundings than where he is at present." I have some little difficulty in seeing how that squares with your statement that your solicitor, Mr. Steele, had been told that you were a dangerous case, because he writes immediately afterwards and says, "He is not dangerous"?—That is because he had several hours' interview with me, and, seeing that the instructions given by the keeper were untrue, he realised that they were untrue.

8631. When you saw Mr. Steele, your own solicitor at this time, and had several hours' talk with him, did you tell him you were perfectly sane and that you ought not to be in a place of this sort?—Certainly.

8632. And did he take no steps?—I told him a good deal more than that. I told him the thing was a conspiracy.

8633. Were you alone with your solicitor then?—Yes.

8634. You were in touch with the outside world and with the means of putting the law in motion then?—I did not know what the law was then.

8635. You believed you were being detained improperly?—I told Mr. Steele and he went to my petitioner brother.

8636. And yet your own solicitor writes and says about you that what is desired is not your release but "better surroundings than he has at present." That does not impress one with the fact that there was a gross wrong being done to his client?—With all respect to Mr. Steele, he had his own interests to consider, of course, and it is a very remunerative thing to have the administration of a lunatic's estate, is it not?

8637. I have never had the pleasure?—Well, Sir, his clerk told me so, anyhow.

8639. Mr. Jowitt: What you say now is that Steele joined the conspiracy?—No.

8641. I thought you would mean that?—Of course I do.

8642. Earl Russell: I rather agree with Mr. Jowitt. Either when Steele left you he thought you were insane or he thought you were not insane. If he thought you were still not sane, of course, his action was accountable?—I think the powers against him were too great; it was impossible for him to do anything. His proof that I have here suggests that he had been misinformed about many things.

8643. But you do understand the difficulty Mr. Jowitt raises? Here is your own solicitor, instructed by you?—Forgive me; he was not instructed by me; he was instructed by my wife.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8644. Having a long private interview with you, and then going away and not taking action for your release?—He did take action. He went to the petitioner, my brother. That is the easy way. Steele knew nothing about the Lunacy Act, probably.

8645. Chairman: One of the things we are much interested in in this Commission is the provision of means of access between patients who are in an institution such as you were in and the outer world, to preserve contact; and a good deal of your evidence is directed to that object. I am rather impressed with some of the things you have told us. For instance, you saw as many of your friends as you liked?—Yes.

8646. Those were people from the outside world. You had a doctor sent down by Mr. Ritchie, and, again, your solicitor sees you, and sees you in private at your wife's request?—But it took about four months.

8647. Be it so. I am impressed with the number of occasions on which there were contacts during the period of this detention between you and the outside world. You were not isolated, were you?—I could give you actually the number of friends who visited me.

8648. How many were there all together?—I am referring to friends outside of the people who were instrumental in putting me in.

8649. Just run down the number you have there.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I do not know whether the Commission has this list. I have a copy, and I see the witness has a copy of the same thing. It is a detailed list which was got out in one of the litigations for the purpose of showing what the contact with the outside world was.

Chairman: Perhaps you might hand it in; it will save time.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: If you please. (Handing in a document.)

Witness: Up to the time of escape, that is between 15th January and 23rd February, I had three outside visitors.

8650. Mr. Walter Stewart: Just tell us who they were—whether they were brought into contact with you at your invitation, or how?—There were two boys for whom I am trustee—that was on the 27th December. There was Ritchie on the 23rd. I do not recognise any other.

8651. Mr. Croom-Johnson: Dr. McNaughton?—He was a doubtful one.

8652. Chairman: Your brother had been the petitioner, had he not?—Yes.

8653. Is that Mr. E. S. H.?—Yes.

8654. I see he came to see you several times?—Yes, it is a statutory duty.

8655. You were on quite good terms with him, evidently?—I had to be. I wanted to keep friends with him, because my keeper told me he would have the power of removing me if he liked.

8656. Mr. Walter Stewart: Under Section 72?—Yes.

8657. Chairman: So far as that particular brother was concerned, you and he had not fallen out up to that time?—He was induced to take the petition because he had been the most friendly to me and is the one next to me in age.

8658. I merely want to get from you this: Was this brother one with whom you were on friendly terms?—At the time of certification, as far as I know, we were friendly.

8659. He was the brother next to you in age, and he came to see you several times during this period?—Yes, he saw me.

8660. Did you say anything to him about your grievance?—I appealed to him in every possible way, but he got this theory of syphilis and had been assured that I must die within six months, and he did not want to have an unpleasant relative loose in the world. My wife was informed in just the same way. My wife never saw me from October until my operation.

8661. Mr. Walter Stewart: Do you know who, if anyone, informed your wife that you were syphilitic?—Yes.

8662. Who?—Dempster.

8663. Mr. Croom-Johnson: He is dead?—Yes, I know; but the whole of this trouble arises, if I may put it without traducing the memory of the dead, through having a drunken doctor. I am looking at it after a number of years. I was living in a drunken man's house, and he had an idea that I had information which might be prejudicial. That is as I see it now. Any slander was good enough—any matter to destroy my testimony.

8664. Chairman: I could imagine, of course, that it would be a most distressing thing for anybody to be said to be suffering from G.P.I. with the unpleasant implications that that disease has?—Yes; it has broken up my home—it has done that all right.

8665. I am most anxious to appreciate your outlook. On the other hand, one must recognise that doctors may make a wrong diagnosis of a case quite honestly. I am sure doctors are often puzzled by cases?—Therefore they should exercise the greatest care.

8667. Let us follow that up, because it is a most interesting matter. A doctor called in to a case may be either careless or careful, as the case may be. Of course, his duty to his patient is to make a careful examination before he diagnoses the case?—Exactly.

8669. It comes to this. You say that a diagnosis of your case was arrived at on inadequate investigation, that there was not sufficient care taken in the preliminary investigation before jumping to the conclusion that you had G.P.I. That is really the whole point of your evidence on this part of the case?—Yes, and, of course, I go a little further. I am satisfied that there was a desire on the part of certain people to destroy testimony.

8670. Let us assume it to be the case, as it has now been established, that you had not G.P.I. It does not follow from that that you were necessarily at that time entirely of sound mind?—I was going to ask you for a definition of "insanity."

8671. If I could give one, I should be a much more gifted person than I could ever aspire to be?—May I put it in a sailor's way?

8671A. If you please?—A man is insane who is a menace to himself or to others, or who is anti-social, and it is only those people who ought to be locked up. Sprigg of "The Lancet" agrees with me. Everybody who has a temperature of a few degrees is certifiable. Our hospitals and our asylums during the influenza epidemics were simply crowded with patients, who were promptly released, or released after three, four, or six months, if they behaved themselves. I think that came out in the Everett case, a long case which went through three different Courts.

8672. Yes; but I may take it, after we have heard your account of matters, that your real complaint was this, that there was a diagnosis in your case of an exceedingly unpleasant and ill-omened disease, arrived at on an insufficient examination and imperfect data, and that is really the groundwork of your complaint; that there was attributed to you a disease which you did not have, and that was the result of an imperfect or careless diagnosis?—I accept Sir Thomas Horder's view, and particularly Dr. Hugh Munro's view.

8674. I should never think of cross-examining you, of course, but I am very anxious to elicit from you the real thing that is in your mind, what you have been suffering from, your grievance?—I have no grievance. I have come here and I have spent of my substance to try to prevent other people from being treated in the same way. The whole thing to me is forgotten in a way. I am an independent witness.

8675. You have come here to tell us that the present system has broken down or is inadequate?—Yes, I am quite satisfied of that.

8676. Earl Russell: Still, a wrong diagnosis is a grievance?—Yes. Well, of course, the medical profession really has not advanced at all in the last 500 years, has it?

Chairman: Of course you know also that it is very annoying when your counsel gives you a wrong opinion. A counsel may be mistaken in his view of the law, but you do not say he is a bad man on that account; you merely say he is a badly informed man.

8677. Mr. Walter Stewart: It has been put to you by the learned Chairman as to what your grievance is?—I have no grievance.

8678. You say there was a wrong diagnosis. If you had had access to independent opinion and had been told at the time what was the alleged result of the blood test that had been taken, do you think that the diagnosis would have been left undisturbed for twenty-four hours?—No, of course not.

8679. But you had no such opportunity?—I had no opportunity.

8680. Is that your grievance?—I think this secrecy is a dreadful thing.

8681. Do you think that is the overriding and underlying grievance with regard to the whole administration of the lunacy law at the present time?—I am satisfied that is so.

8682. Rightly or wrongly, that is your opinion?—Certainly.

8683. Earl Russell: Still, to finish the point the Chairman was putting to you, do you say, apart from that, that you were sane during the whole time you were confined, and were wrongly confined?—I was as sane as I could be with a high temperature and liver disease complicated with pneumonia. When I told the doctor that my father died of a certain disease, that I nursed him and knew the symptoms, and I had exactly the same symptoms as he had, I say that that doctor ought to have taken that as gospel and worked on those lines, and then he would have found out.

8684. That is not really my question. My question is, apart from this question of diagnosis, do you say you were a sane person wrongfully detained during the whole of your time in the asylum?—I do, most definitely.

8685. Chairman: And that the start of the whole thing that resulted in this experience was that there was a diagnosis of your case which was erroneous and founded upon an imperfect and negligent investigation of your case?—Yes.

8686. Sir Humphry Rolleston: The question of diagnosis does not enter into it, does it? It might have been left out of the case entirely. The certificate was not based upon that question?—I think that certificate of Dr. Porter Phillips is quite definite which says, "He has the physical signs of G.P.I."

8687. Chairman: You might have that and yet not have general paralysis, because you know the symptoms of one thing very often simulate the symptoms of something else?—I think it was a dreadfully wrong thing for him to spend his Sunday afternoon coming down and trapping a poor engineer in a workman's cottage. It was a most deplorable thing. I beg that he should not be allowed to practice outside and do these undesirable things. Here is a man with a big salary in a big place, and he comes out and takes the bread out of other practitioners' mouths, and he does a thing like this.

Chairman: He is a medical superintendent at an institution, and it is suggested that he should not practice outside.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I have not elicited that grievance. It was not in answer to any question put by me. I am so anxious not to occupy Mr. H. too long.

Chairman: I have taken a long time, I am afraid. I was very anxious to get his own view as to what he was feeling himself.

8688. Mr. Walter Stewart: I am obliged, Sir. (To the Witness): Now let us leave Moorcroft. You were taken, in the circumstances you have told us of, to Ticehurst. You have already once to-day, in this room, expressed your opinion as to the management of Ticehurst. You say that is a place where they tried to be honest?—That is right.

8690. Chairman: What sort of additional powers—more visitation, or what sort of thing do you mean? I want a practical suggestion from you?—If he occasionally were there, and in the case of defective case-books, if he had powers to fine, or where there were false certificates, if he had powers to punish. I think he will tell you that there are not many false certificates, but I seem to have come across a number of them.

labouring men. You know the form of death certificate. The man present at death who signed was the most dreadful type of person. I nearly died in Moorcroft myself, and I should deplore at any rate not having the ordinary decency a hospital gives you. These places are merely gaols. I say that Moorcroft was merely a gaol, and I see that many of my letters are dated from "Moorcroft Gaol." That was my way of putting what I found was a fact.

8692. To all intents and purposes that was how you felt yourself situated—as a prisoner?—If there was a distinction it may be indicated by someone else.

Mr. Jowitt: £700 for six months may be one distinction.

8693. Chairman: You get board and lodgings free in a gaol, you know?—Yes. I visited Broadmoor. If I had done anything wrong, I would have been very much obliged to one of the Judges to have been sent to Broadmoor rather than to Moorcroft.

8694. Mr. Walter Stewart: If you have committed a crime, there is a judicial inquiry of a true character as to whether you are fit to plead or whether you are of such a state of mentality as to be conscious of the quality and nature of your acts?—Exactly.

8695. You had no benefit of that kind?—I was worse off than a criminal—very much.

8696. What state of health were you in by the time you got to Ticehurst?—On arrival at Ticehurst I was fairly well.

8697. It was in the spring time, was it not?—Yes. I arrived at Ticehurst on the 8th June. It is rather a humorous thing. I tried to get away and I gave my attendants rather too much beer, and the Ticehurst people were very much annoyed to find me turning up with two fellows half tight. There were, in fact, the driver of the motor and two of Stilwell's men.

8698. Chairman: All "tight"?—No, the driver was not tight. I did not give the driver any.

8699. You showed your sanity by not giving the driver any?—Hayes Newington was very much bothered about it. He did not like it at all.

8700. Mr. Walter Stewart: Have you a copy of the Ticehurst case book?—It is mostly dealt with in Mr. Justice Sankey's judgment.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I do not know, Sir, whether I might have the original of the Ticehurst case book.

Chairman: It is here somewhere but I really thought we were not going into the Ticehurst matter.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am not making any complaint. I want the Commission to see what sort of state it was supposed by them he was in.

Witness: This is Dr. Richardson's diagnosis which was entirely favourable to me.

8701. Chairman: Was he a doctor in Ticehurst?—He was second to the chief who died.

Chairman: Let us have what Dr. Richardson found out about you.

Mr. Dickens: It is in Mr. Justice Sankey's judgment.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am asking for the Ticehurst case book.

Chairman: The case book is here somewhere, I believe. We asked for it to be brought here. The Ticehurst people have all gone away now because we understood that nothing was wanted from them.

Mr. Jowitt: The case book is quoted verbatim in Mr. Justice Sankey's judgment.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Would you be good enough to refer to the judgment of Mr. Justice Sankey, if that is a verbatim quotation from the case book?

Chairman: Yes. There is an entry by Dr. Richardson which is quoted.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I think it commences "There was no evidence of general paralysis of the insane." That is what I am seeking to put before the Commission.

Chairman: The passage begins with this, does it not? "This gentleman is of somewhat full habit of body; he has the appearance of a person who has 'lived well.' The eyes are blue, the left pupil is more dilated than the right and is oval in shape, neither is quite circular; both react to light and accommodation. No tripping or slurring is noticeable in his speech; he can pronounce test words and sentences quite well. On closing his eyes and his lips tightly no tremulous or uncertain action of the muscles is seen. Neither of the knee jerks is active and the left is the least so. The pulse is 72 per minute and regular; on auscultation a systolic murmur has been heard in the aortic area. The liver dulness is not increased. The lungs are resonant on percussion and on auscultation the sounds are normal. He walks slightly lame on the right leg." It does not say anything about paralysis in that passage.

Mr. Micklem: Mr. Johnson, in what action was this list made out?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: In the County Court action brought by the witness against my clients.

Earl Russell: That was for the loss of the use of the sitting room, was it not?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Yes.

Witness: I know it quite well.

8702. Chairman: It merely is a description of your physical appearance?—I think there is more than that.

8703. And also certain physical tests that were applied to you?—Yes.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Now, with regard to that I desire to put in evidence any admitted specimen of the handwriting of this gentleman at any date between his admission to Moorcroft and the time he escaped from Ticehurst in August 1917, because that is supposed to present the indication of the existence of general paralysis of the insane. That is one of the things that is looked at in a diagnosis.

Witness: You want some letters?

Mr. Walter Stewart: Your own handwriting at this period.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: We have got any amount of them.

Mr. Dickens: We have got them in the summer or the spring.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Very well, then they will be produced.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Before we leave this, I think there is present in the room a copy of the Ticehurst case book entries, if the Commission would like to look at them or if my friend would like to look at them. There is an entry on the 13th June, 1917, which contains the entry with regard to his physical condition.

Chairman: Is it by Dr. Richardson?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: This is by Dr. Newington who was the licensee of the Ticehurst establishment.

Chairman: The representatives of Ticehurst have left this morning on the basis that nothing was to be said about it. I understand that the witness, Mr. H., is proposing to say nothing about it but merely to say what was the state of his mind. If the case book entry is an example of their impression of his state of mind, I think we should have it for that purpose.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: This is a complete copy and it was used in the action in which Mr. Justice Sankey gave judgment.

Chairman: If it is a complete copy of the Ticehurst case book, then it can be made available to Mr. Stewart and to us.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Yes. It is complete.

Chairman: Of course if there is any passage which you think would be useful to us, will you defer it for cross-examination.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am quite content if I understand that my friend will use it in cross-examination.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Of course it is no part of my case. I happened to know that it was in the room and I asked for it.

Chairman: It is merely to assist us all, Mr. Croom-Johnson—I quite appreciate that.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Yes. You were speaking about what was his physical condition and this is simply an entry as to his mental condition. In order to see from the two what the mental condition was, may I read it? It will probably save time.

Mr. Walter Stewart: If my friend is going to make it part of his cross-examination—

Mr. Croom-Johnson: No, it is not part of my case.

Chairman: Mr. Stewart has asked Mr. H. to produce what Dr. Richardson said about him and what Dr. Richardson entered about him in the case book.

Mr. Walter Stewart: We are assuming that this is a correct copy.

Chairman: I have accordingly called for a copy of the case book, in order that I may look at the whole as recording the impressions that were formed of you while you were in Ticehurst by Dr. Richardson and Dr. Newington who were observing you. I shall therefore look at the whole document and not at a part of it only. Do you wish me to put to Mr. H. some of the other passages in it?

Mr. Walter Stewart: If the whole of it is before us, I am satisfied.

Chairman: If it is all here we can look at it and it will save time.

Mr. Walter Stewart: May I have it in a moment?

Chairman: Yes, certainly.

8704. Mr. Walter Stewart (to the Witness): I think it discloses that shortly after your admission you again had a relapse and fell ill with jaundice and pneumonia. Is not that so?—Yes, so it is diagnosed.

8705. I think you suggested that a surgeon should be sent for who was to be chosen, I think, by your friend, Sir Watson Cheyne?—Yes.

8706. I think you are making no complaint that that was not done?—No notice was taken of my desire.

8707. But some days later did they bring a surgeon from Tonbridge by the name of Footner?—Yes, Mr. Bulkley Footner.

8708. By the time he arrived were you in a very critical condition with a high temperature?—I think so.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Can you tell us the date?

Chairman: Really I must abbreviate matters. This chapter of the case is not to be opened. This gentleman has no grievance about what happened there, and it does not seem to me to bear upon the real critical matter he is bringing to our cognisance. It is quite a separate matter altogether and it does not really help us.

Mr. Walter Stewart: What I did want to get was this. Our case is divided into four heads. We have dealt with certification. I did want to get in connection with this the element of detention.

Chairman: But we cannot have that with regard to Ticehurst. I understood you acquiesced in the position that so far as Ticehurst was concerned the detention was lawful, but that it all proceeded from an initial mistake as to what was found to be wrong with the patient.

Mr. Walter Stewart: But it was more than that—protracted, because there was no access in a convenient form to an authorised representative who could have gone to Ticehurst and convinced the authorities that a mistake had been made.

Chairman: I think you will agree with me that we have been taking the case very fully. I think you should pass from that.

8709. Mr. Walter Stewart: If you please, Sir. (To the Witness): At any rate, you had no independent representative at Ticehurst prior to your operation or subsequent thereto?—No—no medical representative.

8710. You were operated upon when in extremis and you survived the operation?—Yes.

8711. And as soon as possible after that time, was your wife permitted to see you for the first time since certification?—Yes, my wife had been kept away by some letters.

8712. Now that being so—there being no complaint against Ticehurst—with regard to the Board of Control, did you at Ticehurst seek to obtain any redress from the Board of Control?—At Ticehurst I saw a Commissioner named Trevor.

8713. Did you write letters to them?—I wrote very few, because I had given up the Board of Control as a forlorn hope.

8714. Was notice taken of the letters you wrote?—Occasionally you would get a sort of printed thing saying: "We have received your communication which shall have attention."

8715. You never wrote to the Lord Chancellor, did you?—Oh yes, rather.

8716. With what result?—I wrote to them all. I wrote to the Judges I knew. I wrote to my friends in Scotland Yard, and particularly to the Home Secretary, who at that time was Cave, I think, whom one knew something about. I understand they were received at the Home Office, but they were simply put away.

8717. Have you heard at all of the Health Committees under the Ministry of Health?—No, it is rather since my time.

8718. Now you say you obtained no satisfaction from your correspondence with the recognised constituted authorities; and then, I think, shortly afterwards Dr. Newington died and Dr. Richardson was left in charge of Ticehurst. Do you know whether any communication was made by Dr. Richardson to Captain Bell, a friend of yours?—Yes.

8719. Is Dr. Richardson here?—Yes. I suppose we are allowed to speak about Ticehurst?

8720. Not by way of complaint, but as to what he said about you?—Captain Douglas Bell swore that he had talked to Dr. Richardson, and that Dr. Richardson said: "Oh, there is nothing wrong mentally with H., but, of course, he is recovering from an operation." I think Dr. Richardson rather doubted that, but it was certainly confirmed by Dr. Richardson's wife, with whom I was fairly friendly.

8721. He was, of course, in a position in which he had to act with great caution?—Yes, he was only the second. Newington was the autocrat, and I do not think Dr. Richardson had much power there, really.

8722. You are not in any way blaming Dr. Richardson, as I understand it?—No.

8723. As far as you know at that time there was no independent judicial authority functioning in that way to whom you could appeal?—I was seen by a magistrate called Dixon and a doctor, who were official visitors in connection with the justices.

8724. Tell us about that, in order to see how far the machinery assists a patient in that way?—That was very interesting. These two men came into my sitting-room, and they said they were visitors under some Act of Parliament, so I said: "Well, I wonder if you have got the Act with you, because I have been looking for it a long time," and they said: "No, you are not allowed to have the Act." Then I said to Dixon, who was the magistrate, and who really was the person who counted—I do not think the doctor was official, but he came there to advise Dixon—"I escaped from that place in Moorcroft, was out for four days, was able to look after myself; cannot you give me a release? I am able to look after myself. I have been very badly injured; I am ruptured; I require proper surgical treatment and better medical attention. Cannot you manage to clear me up?" and these two fellows smiled and walked out.

8725. They took no notice?—They took no notice; in fact, one of them was here giving evidence the other day.

8726. Which one?—He was the man who acts for East or North Sussex—Fawcett. He said he never had had a complaint. It was untrue, because I certainly complained very bitterly.

8727. We were not in a position to cross-examine, you see, although we knew that fact?—At present there is no means. If your family want to keep you in, I do not think they dare release you, and I think Sir Frederick Willis will bear me out in this: that his instructions from his Department are that the medical officer of one of these places is not to release without the petitioner's consent; it is contrary to the Statute, but I am told that instructions have been given—true, it is on the authority of the discredited Dr. Munro, but he said he received such instructions.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8728. Earl Russell: Instructions given by whom and to whom?—By a man called Dickinson to Dr. Munro.

8729. Mr. Walter Stewart: When Dr. Munro was controlling a private establishment?—He said so.

8730. Earl Russell: Instructions to superintendents of private establishments?—Yes. It is confirmed by another man who is running a private establishment that he is not recommended to put a patient out on the doorstep, unless he has got somebody to take him away, but he has done it.

8731. But I understood you to say just now that the Board of Control had issued instructions that a private patient was not to be released unless the petitioner consented?—No, I do not think you got me right. There are two people at the Board of Control; Sir Frederick Willis is the official controller, but the secretary is what the Americans call "the big noise" there; and it is he who whispers instructions in the ears of people. I am satisfied that the Board of Control are rather too anxious to support the licensee against the patient, whereas their duty is to look after the patient and to protect his interests. I speak with some experience of it, and that is what I found, with all due deference to Sir Frederick Willis.

8732. You say these are unofficial instructions then?—Quite unofficial.

8733. But the instructions are that a patient is not to be released even if he is sane?—That is what Dr. Munro said. That is one of the reasons why he gave up his licence.

8734. Mr. Jovitt: That comes direct to you from Dr. Munro?—That comes direct to me from Dr. Munro.

8735. Mr. Walter Stewart: Of course you know the provisions of Section 83 with regard to the giving of notice of recovery of a patient?—Yes.

8736. As far as you know was any notice ever given by anybody anywhere of your recovery?—Oh no, that would have been contrary to the spirit of the thing.

8737. Let us come straight to the point. When did you escape from Ticehurst?—I escaped on the 28th August.

8739. Chairman: You had provided a clue yourself?—Yes.

8740. Mr. Walter Stewart: By that time you knew about Section 85?—Yes, I knew the whole thing then.

8741. Is that the easiest and most expeditious way for a patient who has any money,—to escape, if he is wrongfully detained?—I have specialised in escapes.

8742. That is your deliberate opinion on personal experience?—Yes. If my friend, Maurice Craig, had not died, we should have had half-a-dozen out by this time.

8743. Earl Russell: Had you more money this second time than you had on the first occasion?—I got £10 from my club; I had got £12 in hand.

8744. Mr. Walter Stewart: You had the good fortune to be known as a member of a London club, where they would cash a cheque?—Yes. I bought two cheques there for 2d. each.

8745. Sir Humphry Rolleston: When did Maurice Craig die?—Did I say "Craig"?

8746. Yes.—I meant Drake—Maurice Drake; he died about a year ago.

8747. Mr. Walter Stewart: To show your personal anxiety, as soon as you had the opportunity to face the music, did you voluntarily submit yourself to a spinal puncture in order that a series of Wasserman tests of your blood might be taken?—You see getting into these places is easy, but getting out you have got to have all sorts of sworn documents; and Sir David Brynmor Jones, who is Master in Lunacy, insisted on blood tests and insisted on sworn statements from the doctors—quite different things from what you go in on—casual sort of documents. He realised my state almost at once. He said to me, "There has been gross contempt of Court here."

8748. With regard to what?—With regard to this escape. I said "Do you call it contempt of Court escaping?" I said "It is the legal way of getting out. It is the one legal way in which you can get out without perjury."

8749. Who took the tests with regard to the Wasserman reaction that was sought to be obtained?—A Scotsman. Sir Frederick Mott told me he was the best man in London—at the London Hospital.

8750. Was it Dr. Spitta?—Harold Spitta did the first one.

8751. Are those certificates in existence?—Yes.

8752. Were they filed with the Master in Lunacy in order that you might be enabled to recover control of your estate?—Yes.

8753. And with the dossier of the Master in Lunacy they will be found, if that is found?—That dossier is very interesting. I think you ought to have it, and I think you will be amused at the difference in the affidavits before escape and after, my family being anxious to keep me in when Sir David took over the estate.

Chairman: I am afraid I cannot call spirits from the vasty deep. If the thing does not exist I cannot get it.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Surely it must exist; it could not have been destroyed. I ask that a search should be made, because it contains, among other things, the opinion of Dr. Crichton Browne and Dr. Munro. These gentlemen went into it directly after his escape, and I want you to find that he was of mental normality while he was at Ticehurst, and that Section 83 ought to have been put into operation.

8755. Do you suggest that no one recovers and is discharged from an asylum who has been quite properly detained, and that his only way out is to escape?—No; the statistics show that a great many wealthy people are not discharged.

Mr. H.

8756. You do not want to overstate the case?—Not at all, but I do say that there is a tendency, if there are big fees attached to it, for a man to be hung up in these places.

8757. Mr. Walter Stewart: On that point, are you prepared, if the Commission think it useful, to express your personal view with regard to what is the difficulty, for instance, with the medical superintendent in the matter?—The difficulty the medical superintendent has in discharging?

8758. Yes—in availing himself of the power that is ultimately with him more than with anyone else. What is the difficulty as far as you know?—I think if the medical superintendent is pressed by the relatives to keep a person in, of course the tendency is for him to obey the demands of the relatives. He has got the legal formula for detaining the person and the relatives do not want that person out.

8759. Chairman: This observation would have no application to pauper cases, which form the great majority of cases in public asylums?—I have only visited pauper cases in Devon, at some of the local places.

Mr. Walter Stewart: May I say it is a different difficulty there.

Chairman: I merely wanted to make it clear that this gentleman's testimony to-day relates only to private institutions, where there may be pecuniary or patrimonial interests involved.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am not suggesting it is wickedness, but people do not like insane relatives brought home, if they are alleged to have been syphilitic.

Witness: They are very anxious to avoid the stigma of insanity. I do not know why there is a stigma, but there is a dreadful one.

8760. Chairman: We are hoping that something may be done to mitigate that?—I hope so.

8761. Mr. Walter Stewart: You say there is a stigma?—Yes.

8762. You are a man of fair means and good social position. Since you came out have you ever been conscious of a different attitude on the part of your various acquaintances and friends towards you from that which they assumed before you were certified?—

I think the difficulties of living in a small village are rather great. One always has to have a solicitor employed because the voice of slander goes about. One is always being troubled with objectionable people. Of course you get slander in any small village, but it is more marked where a man has been subjected to the indignity I have been subjected to.

8763. It is difficult to conceal, if you have been certified?—I have never concealed it. There is nothing to be ashamed of.

8764. It was not your fault?—No. I think it is a very grave thing and I think it should be removed.

8765. Since you escaped and were certified to be of sound mind have you devoted a great part of your life and a great deal of your private fortune to an attempt to bring about a reformation in the law as it exists?—I have done everything I know. I have myself been a petitioner.

8766. You have no motives whatever of an interested character except to try to prevent other people suffering as you have suffered?—I should be very glad if I could do that.

8767. We know that lunatics have neither a vote nor control of their property?—That is so.

8769. Chairman: I do not think we can go into a question of that kind. Your point is really as to the formula, that in this case you had escaped and you resent the official file saying that you were discharged "not improved"?—Yes.

8770. Mr. Walter Stewart: Of course you were well enough off to get an independent opinion?—Yes.

Chairman: We cannot go into the Ticehurst point, without some explanation from them.

Cross-examined by Mr. H. C. Dickens.

8771. I gather from you, Mr. H., that in your firm belief you have never departed from sanity during the whole of this time?—I have said that I have never been in any way a menace to myself or others, or insane.

8772. I gather you were always anxious to get out of these institutions and to regain your liberty?—Yes.

8773. It would naturally be to your interest to keep a careful guard on your words and actions, so as not to give anybody the impression that you were mentally deranged, would it not?—Yes. I had to adopt a humorous style in dealing with things because they were such frightfully dull places.

8774. A humorous style, but no style that would suggest any sort of derangement?—I think not.

8776. He was an elderly gentleman. How often had you seen him?—I think I saw him in the kitchen once.

8777. "Bill Ashton, J.P." He was the Justice of the Peace from Uxbridge?—Yes.

8778. That is Mr. William Ashton, whom you had only seen on one occasion?—Yes; he was the ex-grocer.

8779. "Bob Cole, M.D."; that is Dr. Cole, is it not?—Yes.

8780. The gentleman about whom the less said the better?—He was the gentleman against whom I had the slander action.

8781. And "Tom Petterson, M.R.C.S., Dublin"?—Yes.

8782. This is the letter written in these terms to Robert Cole: "I have warned you to be most careful as to your statements re my mental health. I find that you have been to my brothers and misled them, and it will be up against you later on to eat your words. Two of the highest Harley Street specialists gave me in writing an absolutely clean bill of mental health on the 24th February, and yet you are fool enough to stultify yourself." Now what does that mean?—That was referring to my visit to Dr. McNaughton.

8783. Who was the other one?—I did not go to anyone else, or to any other doctor.

8784. I think that Dr. McNaughton lives in Lower Belgrave Street, as a matter of fact?—I do not know where he lives.

8785. So Dr. McNaughton alone is what you describe as the two Harley Street specialists?—I know how that came about—there was somebody else with him in the room.

8786. What, in Lower Belgrave Street, Eaton Square?—No; that is where Bob Cole lives, is it not?

8787. I do not know?—I cannot remember the addresses.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8788. That is the address at which Dr. McNaughton lived. It was somewhere in the neighbourhood of Eaton Square or Pimlico, was it not?—Yes.

8789. And those are the two highest Harley Street specialists—they gave you an absolutely clean bill of mental health. I understand from you that what Dr. McNaughton gave you was a certificate that you were fit for light work?—I should say that was the best certificate. That is a clean bill of health, is it not?

8790. Would you describe that as a clean bill of mental health?—You must not take it too literally.

8791. "And yet you are fool enough to stultify yourself. It must have been the fault of the She Hun that bore you." Do you think that amusing? Do you think that a reason for mirth?—In the light of my researches about this man, I think he was a deplorably bad man.

8792. "Your behaviour re my wife's letters proves you to be nothing better than a corpse boiler. Don't come near me or there will be trouble. (Signed) W. H. Certified a lunatic by an ex-grocer."—Do not you think there is an element of humour about that?

8793. Perhaps you will point it out to me?—You will remember this man had been slandering me. He had told my visitor Ritchie—

Mr. Dickens: We will come to that in a minute.

8794. Mr. Walter Stewart: He had told your visitor Ritchie what?—That I was syphilitic. "But do not tell him or he will have a fit."

8795. Mr. Dickens: Did Mr. Ritchie allege that Dr. Cole had made some sort of statement about you on the occasion when Mr. Ritchie went down to visit you at Moorcroft?—Yes, on two occasions.

8796. On two occasions on the same day?—Yes, in the train going home. You have seen the pleadings, have you not?

8797. Yes. Did you commence an action for slander against Dr. Cole?—Yes.

8798. Was that action tried?—No.

8799. Was the action dismissed for want of prosecution?—I had to abandon it because Ritchie became ill and I could not prove my case. I had to abandon it under counsel's advice.

8800. At all events the action was dropped?—Yes, it was dropped. It cost me £600, but I got some valuable information.

8801. Then did you write another letter to Dr. Cole on the 9th May, 1917?—Yes; I objected to that man very much.

8802. Is it addressed to "Bob Cole, M.D."—"Dear Cole, I have just had a wire from the Kaiser to submit to you his new design of shako for the new corps Kadener Tollerin Legiment 67 st Antim 4 that he is raising for you to commence, known in English as the Body Boilers' Corps." What are they?—I think this is just an imaginary thing. This is a jest that was got up by the keepers.

8803. "That he is raising for you to commence, known in English as the Body Boilers' Corps. Kindly suggest any alterations after fitting the cap, and it does fit. Perchance Jack Stilwell or Bill Ashton can help you. Yours, (Signed) W. H." What is this jest about body boilers?—You will remember that certain people started the idea that the Germans were making glycerine from boiling down human bodies.

Mr. Dickens: Tell us about Dr. Cole and the body boilers.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Let him explain.

Mr. Dickens: I understand that I have got exactly half an hour to finish my cross-examination of Mr. H.

Witness: These letters were written at a time when one was under considerable irritation with this man. He was a very offensive chap. He married a Hun wife, and all the keepers in that place hated him. They used to come round and say, "Let us give him a new helmet" or something. It was a very dull place. I am not sorry I wrote those letters. I should write them to-day.

8804. Mr. Dickens: I do not understand why you call him "Bob."—Everybody called him "Bob."

8805. Do you call most people by their Christian names?—No, I do not.

8806. "Bill Ashton," "Jack Stilwell."—Yes.

8807. These letters were addressed to them, you know?—Yes; they were carrying on a dishonest business. I was not going to call them "Esquire."

8808. That is your way of qualifying the dishonesty?—Yes.

8809. Was this a good joke in your opinion to send these letters by post a few years ago? (Producing the same).—Yes. It was a very suggestive thing. Do you understand the symbolism?

8810. To whom did you send them?—I do not know; I sent them to several people.

8811. To a lot of them? You sent one to Dr. Porter Phillips, did you not?—I hope he liked it.

8812. And Dr. Percy Smith and several others?—I sent them to several others.

8813. You sent many others—unsigned—I think they have "the best wishes of a village in Devonshire"?—I do not know. They knew who they came from. You know it is a symbolic way that sailors have of describing what they think is rather a bad business, and it is a bad business.

8814. I want to know with regard to the other medical gentlemen in this case?—Whom do you represent?

8815. I will answer that. I represent Dr. Percy Smith and Dr. Porter Phillips.—Did they get these letters?

8816. They did.—Did they like them?

Chairman: I do not think that is a proper question.

8817. Mr. Dickens: Tell me about these two gentlemen. I do not understand whether you make any allegation against them. Do you allege against them that they made these certificates in your case fraudulently, knowing that they had no business to make them?—I am glad you have mentioned that. The three people who certified me have admitted that they were sent down to certify. They admitted that to Dr. Munro, when he went round to see them.

8818. Perhaps you would answer my question without any reference to Dr. Munro, who, I understand, is not willing to give evidence here?—He may be.

8819. Perhaps you will tell me what you think yourself. Did those gentlemen, in your opinion, give those certificates fraudulently, knowing that they had no business to give them?—If you read the certificates in the way a critical man does—

Mr. Dickens: Cannot you answer?

8820. Chairman: I think you must answer that. It is a question put to you quite straightly. Do you think these are dishonest certificates?—I certainly think so now.

8821. Mr. Dickens: You have said so before, have you not?—I think so now, in view of what has transpired since in a number of cases.

8822. You have accused Dr. Percy Smith of giving a fraudulent certificate in some other cases, have you not, in conjunction with your friend, Dr. Munro?—I took this thing to "Truth."

8823. Did not both you and Dr. Munro accuse Dr. Percy Smith of giving a fraudulent certificate in the case of a man called B.?—In the case of H. B.

8824. Was not that matter tried out in a suit for nullity of marriage?—It was the most disgraceful thing that ever happened.

8825. What was the result of the trial?—I have a docket here—

8826. The fact is that the result of the judgment in that case justified the certificate that Dr. Percy Smith had given?—I think that certificate should never have been accepted. I think it is an absolutely dishonest certificate.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8827. And the judgment?—And the judgment. I think from what B. has told me and what his poor wife has told me that it was disgraceful.

8828. And the judgment was a dishonest judgment, possibly?—Are you suggesting things?

8829. I want to know what you suggest. Who was the Judge?—Mr. Justice Shearman.

8830. At all events, Mr. Justice Shearman decided that the certificate was a proper one?—No; he did not decide it was a proper one.

8831. We know the name of the case?—It was a disgraceful case.

Mr. Dickens: It was B. v. B.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Is it reported?

Witness: I have all the details.

8832. Mr. Dickens: Dr. Cole gave evidence in the case, and was cross-examined?—Of course he did. He is one of the gang.

8833. Let us know who the gang are?—That I would rather not say.

8834. Perhaps you would be good enough to tell me, because you must. Is Sir Maurice Craig one of the gang you alluded to?—Yes. I do not think the people connected with Bethlem do work in a gang.

8835. And Dr. Percy Smith?—Yes.

8836. And Dr. Porter Phillips?—Yes.

8837. And Dr. Cole?—No, he is not; but he is so objectionable.

8838. Is he one of the gang?—No.

8839. Is Dr. Stoddart one of the gang?—Yes, he is one of them.

8840. Dr. McNaughton, in the light of what you have heard this morning and the report he made in your case, do you suggest he is one of the gang?—No.

8841. He is an honest man?—He acted according to his lights; he acted under instructions.

8842. And honestly?—Stilwell is one of the gang; but I do not like his methods.

8843. Are there any doctors with whom you have been brought into contact in this case, except Dr. Munro, who are not members of this gang?—I told you I have many relatives who are doctors.

8844. Are any of the doctors with whom you have been brought into contact in this case, apart from your relatives and Dr. Munro, members of the gang?—I think you have already heard me speak of Dr. Richardson.

8845. He is not a member of the gang?—No, he is an honest man.

8846. But not a member of the gang?—No.

8847. I understand this gang exists for the purpose of getting people into asylums by fair or foul means?—No, that is not so.

8848. What is it?—They work in a series. One instructs the other to go down and certify, and they work round in a circle of that sort. They all have their special houses which they feed. Dr. Percy Smith has got a very good house; he put his own wife and sister-in-law there. I have met the sister-in-law. They work in a series supporting these places. Medical men should not do that kind of thing.

8849. Do you mean that these gentlemen are sending people to asylums for the purpose of putting money into one another's pockets? Is that the suggestion?—I say that a medical man has no business to do this sort of thing. It is a priesthood, and they should have nothing to do with the corrupt practices of business.

8850. Will you kindly tell the Commission whether you suggest that these gentlemen are sending people to asylums with a view to putting money into the pockets of their relatives?—I say they are supporters of vested interests, and they live by putting people in and taking them out. Now you have mentioned one eminent gentleman, I would like to show you a cheque of his. You may like to see it.

8851. I do not want to see it. I have quite enough questions to ask you; but if you have anything you would like to put forward, I will not stop you.—You will get them one day, perhaps.

8852. Mr. Walter Stewart: What was the name connected with the cheque?—There were two people. I think perhaps we had better leave it, then.

8853. Mr. Dickens: You understand, do you not, that Sir Maurice Craig, as he now is, Dr. Stoddart, Dr. Percy Smith and Dr. Porter Phillips all expressed a view—whether it was honest or not—during this month of December, 1916, that you were suffering from the symptoms of the early stage of general paralysis of the insane?—Yes.

8854. You know that, do you not?—Yes; they all follow one another. It is the etiquette of the medical profession. You do not understand the etiquette of medicine.

8855. I do not understand anything like as much about it as you do; but I do not want to go through all those certificates; it is waste of time. I want to get the facts. You agree that all these gentlemen were agreed with one another in their diagnosis whether it was an honest diagnosis or a dishonest diagnosis?—There is some sort of evidence that they were sent down to do a certain thing, and they faithfully did it; they did it very well.

8856. And they all purport to agree in their diagnosis, you will agree with me there, whether it was honest or not?—I say it was dishonest.

8857. But you will admit the fact that they all agreed?—That is quite likely.

8858. And that subsequently Dr. Cole, Dr. McNaughton and other doctors in this establishment came to the same conclusion, whether honestly or dishonestly I do not know.—Dr. Richardson did not.

8860. May I first of all put to you what she did say, otherwise the Commission will not understand. This was written on 12th June, 1917. "Dear Dr. Newington,—Very many thanks for your kindness in writing to me re my husband; he writes me twice since being with you and seems very pleased with everything. Any details you can give of his condition I shall be grateful for. Is there any chance of his ultimate recovery of brain power? I just want to tell you that I have for some years past had a very trying experience with him, and since the war twice or thrice my life has been in danger, so that I have quite lost my nerve. He writes me he wants to come down and see me here. I take it this would not be allowed." Your wife did write that?—Yes, she wrote it, and since, when it was put to her, she wrote to Mr. Steele, my solicitor, and said that it was untrue. I was ill at the time.

8861. This is the result of a plot between her and Dr. Newington?—No, I do not say that. Newington was very anxious to collect information to entitle him to retain me as a prisoner.

8862. Chairman: I noticed this letter, and it strikes me as rather a serious matter?—Mr. Justice Sankey dealt with that.

8863. You and your wife, no doubt, were on excellent terms, and as you say you had had some serious illness; but when a lady writes about her husband that her life has been twice or thrice in danger, and that she has quite lost her nerve—if that were true, it would be very serious. Are you suggesting that your wife was not telling the truth when she wrote that letter?—She admitted it. She wrote to my solicitor to say that it was not true.

8864. Why do you think she would write what was not true about her own husband?—My wife's mind had been very much poisoned by the stories that I had been unfaithful to her and had acquired syphilis, although we were always devoted friends up to this time. She was prevented by letters of Reginald Stilwell from visiting me.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8865. All that I can understand as possibly altering her attitude, but it does not seem to me to refer to a matter of fact?—Might I put something in writing to you which will explain it?

8866. If you please. But I am on a very simple issue; it is merely whether she spoke the truth or not?—She admitted she spoke a lie.

8867. Why should a wife want to tell a lie about her husband?—Shall I put it in writing?

8868. Yes. Take a sheet of paper, if there is anything you do not want published. We do not want anything brought out in public that is distressing to you. (The Witness wrote an answer and handed it to the Chairman.)

8869. You do not want this handed round, of course?—Quite so.

8870. Mr. Dickens: Now I just want to get one or two admissions which I think I can get from Mr. H. (To the Witness): Dr. Maurice Craig, as he was then, you had seen on a number of occasions?—Yes; I looked on Craig as a faithful friend.

8871. He had been attending you, in fact, from January, 1915, on and off?—No; I used to go up to his consulting room when I was in town, have a talk with him, and come away.

8872. At all events, it was he who suggested the blood and spinal fluid test which was subsequently taken?—He it was who suggested to me that it was a remedial test, and I permitted it.

8873. Do you suggest he said it was a remedial test?—Yes, absolutely. I should certainly never have permitted a searching of my body in that way, otherwise, knowing that I had never had an infection of that kind.

8874. Do you suggest that he told you it was going to cure you?—It was remedial.

8875. Of what?—He told me afterwards that there was a good deal of pressure in the spinal column, and they had found the pneumo-cocci in the spinal column.

8876. What were you suffering from?—The gall sac just here had been injured on a ship down at Dover, and this thing used to swell up and bind the starboard lung.

8877. We do not want to go into details about this. All I want to get is that Sir Maurice Craig told you that what Adler was going to do was to cure you of this trouble, whatever it was?—Yes.

8878. Then you also saw Dr. Stoddart, and you had an interview with him on the 20th November?—Yes. Dr. Stoddart is a man in a very much higher social position than the rest of these men. He was extremely pleasant. He told my medical adviser that he never had such difficulty in certifying in his life, so my medical adviser said: "Why certify?" He said: "Because I was told to."

8879. Are you again alluding to Dr. Munro?—Yes, I am; he is an honest man, mind you.

8880. Mr. Jowitt: Munro or Stoddart was honest?—Munro.

8881. Mr. Dickens: Stoddart was honest, was he not?—I have had trouble with Stoddart.

8882. I gather that all these gentlemen went out of their way to tell Dr. Munro of this dishonesty?—No, not dishonesty. They said they were sent down to do it. I was Craig's patient, and they had to help him. There is a considerable revenue from these things.

8883. A considerable revenue?—There is a considerable revenue to be derived from the incarceration of people in these places.

Mr. Dickens: I do not know whether you heard that, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman: No, I did not.

8884. Mr. Dickens: He says there is a considerable revenue to be derived from the incarceration of these people, I gather, and therefore they do not look upon it as dishonest?—It is business.

8885. When they certify patients they are sent to certify?—That is the position.

8886. I am bound to ask you this about your interview with Dr. Percy Smith on, I think it was, the 9th December, when he certified you and gave one of the certificates to which you take such exception. You have not, I think, given us the whole of that interview?—Well, he came into my room—

8887. Just answer the question. Have you given us an account of the whole of that interview?—I am not sure. There may be something else.

8888. I am afraid the details are extremely offensive?—It is always so in the gang's certificate. They always put in something offensive so that no decent person can face it—no decent woman, anyhow.

8889. Chairman: The question we are considering now is whether there was sufficient investigation by this doctor before he gave the certificate, the certificate to which you take exception. The question put to you is, have you told us all that passed between you and Dr. Percy Smith, or was there more?—I think there was more.

8890. That is all Mr. Dickens is asking up to date. If there was more, can you tell us what more did pass, or is that the matter which Mr. Dickens says is unpleasant?—I should be delighted to hear it. I expect it would be something very unpleasant, from what he says.

Chairman: I am in your hands, Mr. Dickens. You know the audience we have here. Are these matters which should be brought out?

Witness: They are not true.

8891. Mr. Dickens: The details are extremely unpleasant and offensive. May I put it in this way: Did you notice that Dr. Percy Smith was taking down your remarks in shorthand at the time?—He is a very clever man.

8892. Chairman: Did you notice he was taking them down in shorthand?—No, he was not doing so. If he says so I do not believe it.

8893. Mr. Dickens: This is the transcript of the shorthand notes?—He is a legal expert. He is always knocking about the Courts. I see him always there every day when I am up there.

8894. Chairman: Who is Dr. Percy Smith?—A little chap with a beard.

8895. He is not here?—We know him.

Mr. Dickens: I am going to put to the witness something which Dr. Percy Smith says he said to him.

Chairman: I understand you are going to call Dr. Percy Smith who is going to produce his contemporary shorthand notes of what passed at this interview. (Witness): Do not you accept them, Sir.

Mr. Walter Stewart: At present the evidence of the witness is that they were not made in his presence, and therefore could not be produced in any ordinary judicial proceedings, either as evidence which was brought to the notice of the witness or as a note made at the time from which the witness could refresh his recollection, if at the time they were made. At present my friend has laid no foundation for the production of these notes in evidence.

Chairman: He could not very well have laid any foundation, except this, that he is going to bring a witness who is going to prove the notes and who says he took the notes at the time.

Witness: But do not you believe them, Sir. The room was too dark, for one thing, at the time. I had been asleep. He came in and told me that he was a heart specialist, and he is an intolerably untruthful man.

Chairman: You are apparently going to prove it yourself?

8896. Mr. Dickens: I must put it to him, Sir. There is a suggestion against Dr. Percy Smith that he took no trouble in this matter. (To the Witness):

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

Did you tell him that you had a nervous breakdown in October, 1914, after the beginning of the war?—We have had all this. This is the certificate.

8897. Do please listen: "Says he had a nervous breakdown in October, 1914, after the beginning of the war, had had a very strenuous year. Says his assistant had joined the Army." You will stop me when it is untrue?—Yes.

8900. "Says 'the dirty —' "—I think I will pass this—May I see it? (Document handed to Witness.) I will see whether it is true or not.

8901. You see where those pencil marks are? Will you just read that and say if it is true. The members of the Commission, I am afraid, will have to read it.—(After reading) This at any rate is true.

8902. You said that?—It was true that these things were done, but I did not say it to him. It is a mixture of a statement of Dempster and his.

Mr. Dickens: Will you hand that to the Chairman, please—(same handed to Chairman).

Mr. Walter Stewart: May I see it also?

Chairman: Certainly. (Document handed to Counsel.)

8903. Mr. Stewart (to Witness): You will notice it says, "Says—" so and so. Whether that is a contemporaneous shorthand note you will judge.

Chairman: Yes.

Witness: This is very largely untrue. This is in the nature of the unpleasant certificates that are given.

8904. Mr. Dickens: "Thinks the treatment in that place was vile. Says that on four occasions he removed pieces of surgical dressing from the meat-pies. Says it has all been taken down in the last two years because he feels it is a matter of personal honour that these matters shall be put right even if he dies; does not want to take any action himself at the moment. Says he was seven-eight months in the home."—That is untrue.

8905. "Thinks the treatment improved from the moment Dr. Craig saw him at Teignmouth. Now has been here since 11th October. Dr. Craig has kindly seen him from time to time, also has seen Dr. Newton Pitt about pneumonia. Says he is bothered about his heart, but is really rather indifferent. Laughs a great deal. Says his wife was married twice, and her first husband did not consummate; he had phthisis, and told her that she would be very well off."—That is a lie.

Mr. Dickens: "But it was not clean money and she should use it for charities."

Mr. Jowitt: That is quite untrue?

8906. Mr. Dickens: Have you ever said anything of that sort?—No, I am not in the habit of discussing things of that sort. I disliked the man so much. He could not have written the shorthand.

8907. Did you or did you not say this to Dr. Percy Smith?—Certainly not.

8908. "Says his house in Devonshire is an ideal home for soldiers and sailors. Says it is her idea to turn the house into a hospital. Thinks his wife was vilely treated. Has a strong desire to get back to Brighton to his flat and his wife. Says she drinks at times." Did you tell him that?—No, certainly not.

8909. Mr. Jowitt: May we be told if the part about the hospital is true?—The part about the hospital is true to a point, namely, that during the time I was at Ticehurst I certainly did make designs for something of that sort for amusement; but I discussed nothing with Dr. Percy Smith.

8910. Mr. Dickens: There was some truth about the hospital, but it is mixed up with somebody else?—Yes—this is all Dempster.

8911. "Says his property, which became his and his wife's in 1913 on his aunt's death, has been stolen from them by his first cousin, Bill H. Says he 'jumped' their claims with his brother's consent."—That is true.

8912. Is Mr. H.'s name "William"?—Yes.

8913. Did you mention Bill H.?—I do not know. I called Dempster "Bill," always.

8914. Did Dr. Smith know him as "Bill H."?—I did not discuss it with him. This is all Dempster.

8915. "Says he 'jumped' their claims with his brother's consent. Thinks this is all frightfully amusing, so that their claims are much curtailed and made more expensive. Says Bill H. has spent on his and his wife's property about £2,000, and has 'crabbed their claim.' Says he feels weak and crooked, but does not know when he has been so well mentally; now finds he can write very freely." That is all, I think.—I am glad you have read that, because that is so typical of the man. I think it is very fine and good evidence.

8916. You did not like Dr. Percy Smith at all?—No. I was only with him quite a few minutes.

8917. You got a very bad impression of him from the start?—Yes, I disliked him.

8918. That is not exactly what you told us this morning?—I have a shorthand note being taken, and that will show.

8919. With regard to Dr. Phillips, he was a charming man?—Yes.

8920. And he was also one of the gang?—He has left them now.

8921. He gave an untrue certificate in your case because he was sent down to do it?—It was grossly untrue.

8922. It must be a dishonest certificate?—Yes.

8923. He says he took you in his car to Moorcroft at your request. There is no suggestion that you were taken off by stealth. You asked Dr. Porter Phillips to take you in his car?—No.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I formally object here to what my friend has put in the form of a question. "You were taken by Dr. Phillips to Moorcroft at your request." The evidence of the witness is that he never knew he was being taken to Moorcroft, but that he was told by Dr. Phillips that he was being taken to Dr. Phillips' house, and yet my friend, having heard that, puts that question in that form. I ask you not to allow it, Sir.

8924. Mr. Dickens: I will put it to you again, Mr. H.?—I did not.

8925. Did you ask Dr. Porter Phillips to take you in his car?—No, certainly not.

8926. You did go in his car?—It was not his car.

8927. Was the only stipulation that you made before you went to Moorcroft in the car that you should take your monkeys with you?—No, it is quite untrue.

8928. Did you take your monkeys with you?—I took a small cage with two monkeys.

8929. You took no winter clothes, but you took your monkeys?—I packed up everything I had, but somebody forgot to put them in the car.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8930. Mr. Jowitt: The monkeys were in the car?—These little things were in the bottom of the car.

Chairman: Have you any questions, Mr. Croom-Johnson?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I have a great deal to ask this witness about several matters, if I am to go into everything, but I am wondering about the time, and whether I could be of any assistance to the Commission.

Chairman: Just remind us for which particular party you appear.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I appear for Dr. Stilwell. The accusations, as I understand it, against Dr. Stilwell are first of all that he is one of the gang, and secondly that the result of the escape was that this witness was improperly confined and in improper quarters. These are two of the points.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I do not know whether you will rule now, Sir, at this stage, whether that document which is being circulated amongst the members of the Commission is admitted by you in evidence. It is alleged to be a note, denied by the witness, taken in his presence or communicated to him, and I submit it is not admissible at this stage at any rate as evidence in this case.

Cross-examined by Mr. Croom-Johnson.

8931. Mr. H., I want just to see where we are about some of these matters. The action which was tried by Mr. Justice Sankey was in respect of the Ticehurst place?—That was an action brought by me against Ticehurst.

8932. In that action, as I understand it, your complaint was that you ought to have been released earlier by the Ticehurst people?—That is on the pleadings. That is one of the things.

8933. That is really what the fight was about when it came to trial, was it not?—No. The reason why that thing went to trial was this. We wanted evidence, and we wanted as much untrue evidence as we could get. We wanted to know exactly the condition of lunacy as it stood in the Courts. It really was only £200 that it cost.

8934. I have read, and I suppose we have all read, the judgment of Mr. Justice Sankey, and it proceeded apparently on the basis that your claim against the doctors was a claim in negligence, because they had not taken the proper steps and ought to have released you before?—That is the substance of it; that is the pleadings.

8935. Somewhere about the same time you were in litigation with my client, Dr. Stilwell, were you not?—I had put him in the County Court, yes.

8936. And in Dr. Stilwell's case your complaint against him was that he had improperly deprived you of the benefit of your sitting room at Moorcroft, and as a result ought to repay to you money which had been paid to him upon the basis that you were entitled to the sitting room?—Yes; grave overcharges was I think the general charge.

8937. You made no complaint against Dr. Stilwell in the action against him that he had been guilty of any negligence, or ought to have let you out?—I think my counsel suggested that. As a matter of fact the action was brought to obtain documents in the slander action against Cole.

8938. The action was brought in the Uxbridge County Court, and you sued Dr. Reginald Stilwell; and Mr. Steele, the gentleman of whom we have heard, was the solicitor who acted for you in those proceedings?—Yes.

8939. And was the accusation there that you had been deprived of the use of your sitting room for a certain length of time and certain necessities, which you said were provided by you in order to supplement what you said were insufficient supplies?—Yes, that is in the pleadings.

8940. You made no complaint in that action that Dr. Stilwell had done anything that was wrong, other than with regard to the sitting room and the food?—I do not think you are right there.

Chairman: No, it is not proved yet.

Mr. Walter Stewart: That is what I mean. Unfortunately it has already been circulated. I am sure that if it is not ultimately proved, the members who have seen it will dismiss it from their minds.

Chairman: Mr. Dickens' duty was to put it to this gentleman, because if he was going to prove ultimately what was a contemporaneous note it would have been most important. Therefore it would be very unfair to have let Mr. H. go away without putting it to him.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am not complaining at all. It may remain in your custody with pleasure as far as I am concerned.

Chairman: Mr. Croom-Johnson, you were telling us about your position.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: That is my position. Charges, and very definite and deliberate charges are made against my client, and I must cross-examine about them, but it is now half-past four, and the intention was expressed this morning of rising at that time.

Chairman: At all events we would all sacrifice a further half hour to finish the case.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: If you please, Sir.

Chairman: We have the pleadings here.

8941. Mr. Croom-Johnson: In that action did your two brothers give evidence on your behalf?—My two brothers were called by me.

8942. Were you represented by a leading counsel of considerable experience, Arthur Powell, K.C., and a junior counsel? Was the action heard by His Honour Judge Scully at some length? Did your two witnesses go into the box and acknowledge in the proceedings that they were entirely satisfied both with the terms and with your treatment?—Yes, untruly.

8943. And did the learned Judge say in giving judgment that he would say as little about it as he could, but that in his opinion the action was one which ought never to have been brought?—He did, on the testimony before him.

8944. And was your complaint in that case about the non-use of the sitting room substantially the complaint which you have put before the Commission here to-day, that you were put into this other room with a number of other patients?—That is what I strongly objected to; it was an infamous thing to do.

8945. That is that part of the proceedings. Was that the room which you have characterised at my client's premises as, I think, the last room but one?—Yes, the last from the roughest.

8946. Is that a large apartment, comfortably furnished, with carpets, smoking-room chairs, periodicals, pictures, large unbarred windows—five large unbarred windows—overlooking the garden?—No, that is not true; they are barred windows. You cannot open them more than about that much—(describing).

8947. That is a photograph of one end of the room, is it not. (Handing photograph to Witness)?—Yes, that is right. This is the place we used to hold divine service in, which I stopped. It is a beautiful place—lovely! I should like you to be there.

8948. Now dealing with the place generally, it is a large house, is it not?—It is a big rattle-trap building of about five different periods.

8949. A real old-fashioned house with large grounds?—Yes, well walled.

8950. Of 13 acres?—Yes.

8951. A park?—No, a cricket ground.

8952. I do not propose to proceed any further with that, unless the Commission think that I can give them any further assistance about it. Now just tell me this. During the time you were at Moorcroft you were visited repeatedly by different persons?—Yes, we have a list of them, and I agree with the list.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8953. We both, I think, have the same list. Is it right that you were visited during the time you were at Moorcroft no less than nine times by Sir Maurice Craig?—If you say so, yes. I do not think it is nine, is it? Have you counted them?

8954. I have counted them.—Very well

8955. Were you visited by both your brothers?—Yes.

8956. Were you visited by Dr. Hale White?—Yes.

8957. We have not heard about him?—Of course, he was the one who saved the operation in the first place.

8958. Were you visited by your partner in business, Mr. Burls?—Yes, he took out letters for me.

8959. And altogether during the five and a half months that you were there, were no less than 43 visits paid to you by people from the outside world?—I have dealt with this.

8960. Would you mind giving me the number? You may object to my expression "the outside world." In this list of outside persons who paid you visits there are in fact 43 visits in about five and a half months, other than the persons who were connected with actually running the home?—Outside of officials, of friends there were about 12, I think, not 43.

Earl Russell: We have got the list.

8961. Mr. Croom-Johnson: If you please. (To the Witness): As I understand it, you make no complaint at all against the attendants at this place so far as regards the way in which they waited upon you personally?—The attendants behaved quite nicely.

8962. So far as Dr. Stilwell is concerned, you have been good enough to say this afternoon that Dr. Stilwell is one of the gang?—Yes.

8963. Were you on terms of considerable friendship with Dr. Stilwell?—I was on terms of considerable friendship with Dr. Stilwell?—I was on terms of considerable friendship up to the time of the escape, when he started doing the dirty.

8964. Not after?—No

8965. Did you persistently write him letters addressed "My dear Reggie"?—Yes.

8966. Even after the escape?—Oh, certainly.

8967. And you were accustomed not only to write to him very lengthy letters, but also to other persons?—My letter book is really a diary; that is the way I look at it.

8968. Just let us see what state you were in after the escape and had come back again. Is that one of your letters, addressed to Dr. Stilwell, "My dear Reggie" (handing letter to Witness)?—Yes.

8969. I am only going to read this one out of many dozens as a specimen of the letters which you wrote. It says: "My dear Reggie,—As I am not writing to Control or other of my distinguished pals, I am going to give you a treat. As usual, there are several things I wish to draw your kindly attention to." Then you made statements with regard to other persons, attendants, which I do not propose to read. Then you discuss the waste arrangements to the bath, and, suggest the application of buckets of boiling caustic soda. Then you say this: "The whole system must be rearranged after the war, and lots of other things, old chap. Why not float this place as a limited company (you will not then have all your eggs in one basket)? I will write 66, Victoria Street"—did you know what was to be found at 66, Victoria Street?—Yes, that is the Board of Control.

8970. "I will write 66, Victoria Street, and get permission, and perchance plant some shares on the unsuspecting Commissioners"?—You are spoiling the market.

8971. Did you know—before I read the rest of the letter—that an application was being made for your transfer to another home?—At this time?

8972. Yes?—What is the date of that?

8973. 7th May, 1917?—Yes.

8974. Let us see what you say about that application in your letter. "I am quite sure the Lunacy

Master won't be able to dispense justice at 11 a.m., Tues. 8th, without my assistance. Remember £50 a week is a large sum for even a certified insane marine engineer. So we will all go with a luncheon basket on the top of the car. Perhaps Brynmor Jones will let us picnic in his court. I know all the attendants and can arrange to have a few palms put round the corridor end in west wing. I used to go and worry the Treasury Solicitor in the happy days beyond recall about damages by merchant ships to warships; their office is near Jones P.C., so I will take you in and introduce you. I wonder if you could find a nice snug corner here for my brothers Herbert and Richard, one large bedroom and that s.w. sitting-room affected by Major ——. They will want most favourable summer terms, three months certain. Both troubled with delusions. (Coliana) (Maurice Craig's patients). Were they patients of Sir Maurice Craig?—Oh, yes; they paid him 100 guineas. They were patients all right.

8975. "If you keep me much longer here I shall want to get married again." Then there are some expressions which I do not propose to soil my lips by reading. "Apparently reading between the lines C. recommends the mixing of the sexes in these sanatoriums and the sterilization of one of the parties, etc., etc., then a long quotation in Latin which he cut out of Malthus. Bob's native language is 'Lithuanian Hunn.' Kind regards to Mrs. Reg and the family. You and I are a pair. Cheer up, Reggie—Yours ever, W. H., R.N.R."?—Yes.

8976. I want to ask you just one question about this. I do not want to put it offensively at all, but in face of letters of this description, would you say it is impossible for anybody to take the view that yours was, to say the least of it, a doubtful case?—Do not you think that is a humorous letter? It is not a madman's letter. There is nothing mad about it. It is simply amusing.

8977. Mr. Walter Stewart: What is the date of that letter?—7th May, 1917.

8978. Mr. Croom-Johnson: I want just to clear up one little point. Mr. Steele, you have told us, was your own solicitor?—No.

8979. He had acted as your solicitor?—No, he was not my solicitor until after my escape.

8980. Had you confidence in Mr. Steele?—I knew nothing of him. He was a very useful man to know.

8981. You have told the Commission that you were served with writs in this place. Did Mr. Steele first of all come down and serve you with a notice of application under Section 116 for the appointment of a receiver of your property?—A writter came down—a man who serves writs.

8982. Was this document an application under Section 116, the document which you refer to when you talk about writs being served upon you?—I daresay; I cannot say definitely.

8983. Was that on the 30th April, 1917?—Yes.

8984. A few days after that did Mr. Steele himself come down to see you?—Yes, on the 3rd May.

8985. Did you understand from Mr. Steele or from the document which was served upon you what the application was that was being made?—I had instructed my wife to make the application.

Mr. Jowitt: What was the application?

8986. Mr. Croom-Johnson: It was an application under Section 116 for the appointment of a receiver, on the ground, of course, that this gentleman was incapable of managing his own affairs?—No, no; do not put wrong constructions upon it; that is not true.

8987. How many times do you think you saw Mr. Steele?—Three times at Moorcroft. I do not know, Sir, what sort of suggestions are made against Steele. He is a perfectly honourable man.

8988. Chairman: There is no suggestion made, as I understand. Mr. Croom-Johnson is asking you whether Mr. Steele is a solicitor of repute in whom you have confidence?—He is my brother-in-law's agent.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

8989. Earl Russell: The only suggestion I have heard against Mr. Steele is your own?—I say nothing about Mr. Steele.

8990. Mr. Croom-Johnson: You discussed this matter with Mr. Steele and perfectly well knew the grounds of the application?—Yes.

8991. I suggest to you that at that time, and indeed at all times as far as Dr. Stilwell is concerned, you were not taking the point as against Dr. Stilwell that he ought to have seen that you were released from this place?—This action was an effort to get release, and a very costly one. I think that application cost me £1,100, but it was worth it to get out of this place.

8992. I just want to test your recollection about this by one other fact. You have told the Commissioners that after your escape when you were put into this general apartment at Moorcroft the food was different?—Yes.

8993. I must call evidence about this?—Why trouble about it?

8994. Do you know in fact that the food was identically the same, except that it was served at a different time from the food you had when you were in your own room?—That is quite untrue. Of course, with regard to that beautiful photograph of yours, you ought to have the patients in there as well. It is not really complete.

8995. You put that upon me. I suggest to you that the patients in that room were about six or eight, and that some of them were not as ill as you were yourself?—That is untrue.

8996. That they were all of them gentlefolk?—It is untrue.

8997. That when you were brought back from your escape you were not stripped, but that you were searched?—I was stripped to my under-things.

8998. Not entirely stripped. By whom?—By Potterton and some man in the oak room.

8999. That you were visited in this very room by your brother, the petitioner?—No.

9000. And also by Sir Maurice Craig?—No. I insisted upon my petitioner brother going to the place to see what sort of a place it was, and he unfaithfully reported as to the condition.

9001. He reported on oath in the County Court action that it was a perfectly proper place for you to be in?—It was so much perjury. The perjury in my own family is perfectly vile.

9002. Your brother was called by you or by your own counsel as a witness?—I had to call somebody. It was an action to get information so as to prosecute Cole. I would like to put in Reginald Stilwell's letters to my wife, but they are perfectly abominable.

9003. Chairman: Before you re-examine, Mr. Stewart, I want to add one fact. (To the Witness): As you know, we have called for the file of the papers relating to various litigations you have had?—Yes.

9004. There is one we have got the papers of, an action by you against Dr. Dempster, to whom you referred, do you remember?—Yes; Dr. Dempster's action has only just been settled.

9005. It was an action brought in 1923, I see, and I understand you have a decree for a sum of money against him?—No.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Dr. Dempster's action was discontinued.

Witness: I got an offer of a settlement, and it necessitated my withdrawing any charges I made against Dr. Dempster.

9006. Chairman: The action I have before me is one in the King's Bench Division, and it appears to be between W. H. and William Thomas Dempster?—Yes. He owed me a large sum of money, and he pleaded the Statute of Limitations. I had not the means to carry on earlier, and the Statute barred me.

9007. But it is not for that purpose I am referring to it; it is because of what is stated in the pleadings.

I understand that your claim was in respect of moneys which he had obtained from you while you were staying with him?—Yes.

9008. Now here is the paragraph that I must say caught my eye when I read the pleadings: "When the plaintiff made the several payments referred to in paragraph 5 hereof he was not in a fit state, physically or mentally, to appreciate the nature of his acts." Is that true? Were you "not in a fit state, physically or mentally, to appreciate the nature of your acts"?—My counsel drafted those things.

9009. On your instructions?—Dempster had been all the time saying that I was not mentally right, so that was put in to make him say the other thing, really. Mr. Batt, who drew the pleadings, is here. It was put in to find out what this man really meant.

9010. This was a statement made to the Court in the claim submitted to the Judge, and I understand it was made on your instructions. Do you say it was not a sincere statement?—I would not go as far as that, but it was a statement to draw a denial, as I remember it, but I would rather ask counsel. He is here. I should certainly have objected to it if I had known of it.

9011. It has been my duty to look through those pleadings, and that caught my eye?—I think counsel was very much influenced by the fact that he wanted to avoid the Statute-barred thing. I understand that if a person is insane the Statute does not run. I think it was a little piece of chicanery; I do not know.

9012. It struck me when I read it as being a remarkable statement in the case?—It is tactics, rather.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Might I look at those pleadings, Sir, in case I desire to put a supplementary question? Of course, it is clearly understood by the Commission what this is. This is not evidence, and in pleadings alternative and mutually destructive averments are put in very often.

Earl Russell: One generally assumes they are to be supported by evidence in the box.

9013. Mr. Jowitt: May I ask: Whilst you were at Moorcroft a considerable number of people, you have told us, came to see you?—Yes.

9014. Some of them were your own personal friends?—Yes.

9015. One of them is a gentleman I know very well—Mr. Burls?—He did everything he could to get me out.

9016. Did these people take any, and if so what, steps to secure your release from Moorcroft?—The Rev. F. W. Sandwich visited me once or twice and consulted a solicitor, and did everything he could to get me out, because he was quite satisfied that I was sane. None of the people I met on escape noticed that anything was wrong. Mr. Burls went so far as to go to my brother and say, "I have known H. all my life," and he said, "It is a perfectly wicked thing to say that he is insane." Mr. Burls would confirm that. It is a criminal libel to suggest that a man has got that disease. But you see my family desired my incarceration, and on the Master's docket I think you will find why it is so.

9017. None of them seem to have written to 66, Victoria Street?—I think they left it all to the expert. Maurice Craig is the "gaoling" expert, and he worked the whole thing.

9018. These are the counter-espionage people; these are the anti-Maurice Craigs, and except for the fact that one of them wanted to consult a solicitor, they do not seem to have taken any effective steps to get you out?—I was in touch with Paley Baildon, and Baildon could not make head or tail of it. He took the view that the whole thing was fraudulent, and he has dealt with the matter very, very strongly in opinions and so on since. He was satisfied, as all my friends who saw me were, that there was nothing abnormal about me. With regard to the documents that our friend here has read, anything of course in a mad-house is under suspicion.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

9019. Did you notify anybody after you had escaped finally from Moorcroft as to where you were?—Yes; I had my friend Wylie.

9020. Did you communicate with any of the official bodies, the Board of Control, or anybody?—One of my friends sent them a humorous telegram, or something of that sort.

9021. Is this the telegram—did you help to compose it?—I think it was a general composition.

9022. I will just read it: "H. found dead in bed this morning. Deny report. My cooking brandy cause relatives (sic). No inquest. Bury in garden with your permission. Pushen."—I remember something about it. I think it was sent by Charlie Wylie, who was a painter, but he thought it was a good idea to hide up everything and bury me in the garden.

9023. You see we may have our own views about whether it is funny or not; but as you were alleged to be insane, does not it occur to you that it was not a time at which you ought to indulge in sending this sort of telegram to the Board of Control?—I did not send the thing. This thing was a joke around a table in a restaurant. They said, "I am sure the Board of Control will be interested to hear about it."

9024. It is handed in at 8.30 a.m. on the 23rd February, which is the date of escape?—Yes, I remember it.

9025. Chairman: There cannot have been a restaurant meeting before 8.30?—I was in a restaurant; I was in St. James' Restaurant. It is opened about 7 o'clock, and I had got on the telephone to some friends.

9026. Mr. Jowitt: Where were the friends coming from?—They came from St. John's Wood.

9027. And they met you at breakfast?—They came down, because they did not know where I was.

9028. It is a time of day when most people's humour is not at its brightest?—I think it was a mistake, but we looked upon the whole thing as so dishonest that nothing could make it worse.

9029. I candidly cannot see why it makes you send humorous telegrams?—I have said I did not send it.

Re-examined by Mr. Walter Stewart.

9030. I do not want to occupy time over small matters, so I pass from the humorous telegram, so long as it is understood that it was not your production. The humour was that of somebody else?—Yes. I did not want it to be sent, but it was sent.

9031. Now with regard to this pleading, I think I ought to go into that, as the learned Chairman has been impressed with it. Paragraph 5 alleges that from time to time during your stay in the house of Dr. Dempster, he asked you to supply him with money, and that you did supply him with no less a sum than £1,203. That is not stressed as evidence of insanity, although of course it was a sign of great confidence at the time in Dr. Dempster. Just recall to mind the period at which he plied you for these loans. What was your state of physical health and your temperature at those times?—Those loans were doles that were handed over, as I had money. I was physically not too well; mentally I was all right.

9032. Can you recall at any of the periods when you were pressed to advance these sums, whether your temperature was other than normal?—I cannot say that; it is so long ago.

9033. You were a sick man at the time?—Yes.

9034. What was the nature of the sickness?—Trouble with the gall.

9035. And suffering as you were from some disturbance in connection with the gall bladder, was your temperature from time to time affected by it or not?—Yes, one gets a bit toxic.

9036. Being toxic, as you put it, would you be at that time in your normal mental condition with regard to clarity of mind, or what was your mental condition, quite apart from lunacy?—I think I was sick and not too well.

9037. Does the body, when the temperature is not normal, sometimes re-act temporarily upon the mind?—Yes, I should think so.

9038. And was it with that in view that you authorised paragraph 7 of this pleading to be drafted by Mr. Batt, who sits here, and who is in a position to accede to or contradict it, if any question is raised?—Yes.

9039. I have sought to put that explanation. If it is pressed any further there is the explanation. I am only going to take you through one or two passages. With regard to the alleged shorthand notes, which are alleged to have been made at the time, I would like to draw your attention first of all, in order that the Commission may be in a position to see if it is what it purports to be, to the form of it. As for the intrinsic character of this, which pretends to be a shorthand note made at the time—that is how it is put forward—look at it. "Says he was cut on the arm." "Says he was put in charge of four men." "Says he left 50 guineas in his will." What say you? Supposing this had been a genuine contemporaneous shorthand note, alleging something that you had yourself said, do you, as far as your experience of such matters goes, think it would have been in that form, or that it would have been in oratio recta, especially as I am reminded it was taken in shorthand?—It is an untrue thing.

9040. I think I can show on the face of it that it is. This purports to be the family history: "Said to be nil." That obviously was communicated by someone other than yourself?—Yes.

9041. "Previous history." Was Dr. Dempster acquainted with your previous history?—He never was my medical attendant until I went to stay with him in June, 1915.

9042. And at that time had he your confidence?—No. He attended my wife. I did not care about him.

9043. But he had been in contact with your wife?—Yes.

9044. He was present in the house on the occasion of this gentleman, Dr. Percy Smith's visit?—Yes.

9045. And Dr. Percy Smith had access to him?—Yes.

9046. As far as matters that are in this strange document are concerned, I call your attention and that of the Commission to the fact that very few of them appear in the certificate of Dr. Percy Smith as being matters which he had personally observed concerning you?—Yes.

9047. As regards facts communicated by others, I call the attention of the Commission to this passage, that somebody, and that must have been Dr. Dempster, says that you were restless and garrulous. So that Dr. Dempster was telling Dr. Percy Smith that you were a great talker?—Yes.

9048. You had talked a great deal to Dr. Dempster, had you not?—I had very few occasions to talk, because I was alone mostly, with the exception of a nurse; and when anyone came in one was fairly chatty.

9049. It is always difficult to see ourselves as others see us, but tell me, as far as you are aware, was your mental condition on that occasion when Dr. Percy Smith came the same as it is to-day, or was it different?—I think that as regards my mental condition, I was perfectly alive to everything. I was certainly a sick man.

9050. Of course you had just recently been suffering from a somewhat serious physical sickness?—No doubt.

Mr. Jowitt: Would you get this from him: I appreciate that he did not say any of this to Dr. Percy

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

Smith, but he said he did say a good deal to Dr. Dempster. I have not got this in my mind, and I want to know it. Did he say to Dr. Dempster at some time or other the substance of what is in that statement, particularly that part of it which was handed to the Chairman to be read?

9051. Mr. Walter Stewart: Is it present to your mind?—Yes.

9052. The learned Commissioner desires to know this: Did you ever say what is actually there, either to Dr. Dempster or to Dr. Percy Smith?—No, certainly not.

9053. Mr. Jowitt: I do not mean the actual words, but the substance of it?—The substance of it, in some respects, I believe I have said to Dr. Dempster.

9054. Mr. Walter Stewart: With regard to what you said to Dr. Dempster, you may tell us what it was you said to Dr. Dempster on that point with regard to the attendant whose name I think was Jenkins. Repeat again, if you will, what it was you said to Dr. Dempster about Jenkins. Was there anything you then said that was not fit for publication?—No.

9055. Then say it?—This man had to use a thing called a catheter, and I thought it was an extremely risky business. I think no attendant is allowed to use that instrument except the doctor is present, or something of that sort.

9056. Use it on whom?—On me. They had been giving me a drug called paraldehyde; it is a thing to make you sleep, and that produces a difficulty—I think doctors will correct me if I am wrong—in natural function.

9057. And that being so, a catheter had to be utilised?—Yes, and the catheter was not sterilised.

9058. Was lint used in connection with the use of that instrument?—The catheter was not sterilised, and that was the danger. It should never be used except by a medical man.

9059. Was lint at any stage of that attempted operation a necessary adjunct?—I think so.

9060. Was some reference made by you to Dr. Dempster with regard to that service which Jenkins was required to render you, as to the use of the catheter?—Which he should not have rendered but which he did.

9061. Was that what you mentioned to Dr. Dempster?—I think so.

9062. Is that the true nature of the communication relating to that matter which you made to Dr. Dempster?—I think so.

9063. By the time it has filtered through to Dr. Percy Smith it has assumed this disgusting form, and you are saying what you tell us on oath, with the knowledge of what it was Jenkins wanted to do?—Yes.

9064. Now just follow that up. You had an objection to Jenkins using that instrument upon you?—Yes.

9065. Why had you that objection with regard to Jenkins?—I thought he was an infected man.

9066. And that is the foundation of all this filth?—Yes.

9067. Is that a fair sample of the way in which, according to you, these statements were—

Mr. Jowitt: The other detail about walking up hill you might want, Mr. Stewart.

9068. Mr. Walter Stewart: I am greatly obliged, Sir. (To the Witness): Will you refer to that matter and explain it, if you desire to do so, to the Commission?—Yes. I think on our looking into the drug accounts and things at Teignmouth, my adviser was very much concerned about the drugs that were used, and he thought very improper drugs had been used; and they certainly had on me, a man who had never had to use any drug, an extraordinary effect, and I think any hard physical exercise did bring about some condition of that sort, due to the extreme use of those drugs. I think that is true. I might have discussed it with Dr. Dempster, never with Dr. Percy Smith. I say here deliberately it is gross perjury if he says he took those notes in shorthand. He is a liar.

9069. He will be able to prove that if he can?—Yes.

9070. Just one other matter about the razor: Does that call up anything to your mind. (Document handed to Witness).—That is not mine.

9071. Have you ever said anything to justify that?—No.

9072. You said in cross-examination that some of these people when they make reports do insert matters which patients would be very anxious to keep from public scrutiny?—Yes.

9073. Have you had experience of that?—Yes. I would refer Dr. Stilwell particularly to the certificates of a very distinguished gunner officer, another inmate at Moorcroft while I was there.

Chairman: This is just the very question we must not have, because we do not know what attitude these people may have about it at all.

9074. Mr. Walter Stewart: The witness is ready to show that this is not an isolated instance of the introduction of something into a certificate, the object of which he says, rightly or wrongly, is to prevent a person from using it. (To the Witness): If desired you could have brought them, so that they could have been produced?—Yes; they are most grossly offensive.

9075. Now Mr. Croom-Johnson produced a photograph of the room, and does that photograph convey at all the actual impression which that room would present to the senses of a person who was an occupant of it?—It is a dressed up photograph, to show what a pretty place it is.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Is my friend suggesting that it is a dishonest photograph.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I do suggest that.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I would rather like to have this matter made perfectly plain.

Mr. Walter Stewart: My suggestion to the Commission is that that is a photograph taken for the purpose of making the room look very different from what it looked when Mr. H. occupied it together with 14 people, some of whom were violent.

Witness: It is a dishonest photograph.

9076. That is what you say, and are prepared to stand by?—Certainly.

9077. You have at some period of giving your evidence expressed yourself in terms, that were somewhat strong and without qualification, with regard to certain doctors?—Yes.

9078. I am only going to ask you about one of them. The name of a Dr. Stoddart has been mentioned as one of the gang?—Yes.

9079. Do you say that all the doctors whose names are mentioned in connection with Dr. Stoddart are in frequent communication with him?—My information (and I have fairly well watched these people and their lives and careers) is that they seem to be very much associated. I have had to take very great exception to Dr. Stoddart's certificates.

9080. Are you aware that Dr. Stoddart was the defendant in the recent action of Campbell against Knight and Stoddart?—I have heard about it.

9081. An action in which it was alleged that he had defamed, in the form of a certificate, a Mr. Campbell, a member of my profession?—I have heard about it.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Judgment for the defendant.

9082. Mr. Walter Stewart: Do you know that in that action Dr. Stoddart did not hesitate to certify that gentleman as insane, and that the relieving officer who was there for the purpose of removing him absolutely refused to remove him on the ground that he was a sane man?—Yes, that is right.

9083. And, although the doctor escaped on the ground that there was only one claim, namely, a claim for defamation, and the jury found there was no express malice on his part, was it a finding—indeed, was it admitted by everybody in the course of the case that the gentleman was perfectly sane at all times?—Yes.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Some people might characterise that as a leading question.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

Mr. Walter Stewart: It was a leading question, but it is a matter of record.

Chairman: I do not know that that is very impressive. It means that Dr. Stoddart has in this case been found to be wrong.

Mr. Walter Stewart: And we shall ask you, Sir, to find that that is not the only case in which he was wrong.

Chairman: I wonder how often we professional men are wrong. I wonder how many professional opinions I have given have been wrong. I should not like to have them all brought up against me.

Mr. Walter Stewart: They are in writing as a rule, and we can be faced with them; but these methods of dealing behind the backs of the people concerned with their lives and their condition, the making of these allegations, which they have no champion on their behalf to check, I suggest is a very different state of affairs to the open function of counsel.

Chairman: That is quite a good point on the question of whether these things should be communicated to a person, but I am not sure that one is entitled to attack the medical profession or any other profession because they have been wrong in certain instances. It is not Stoddard's want of publicity you are attacking him for, but because he was wrong in this case.

Mr. Walter Stewart: No; he was so wrong that he misled all the others; they all followed him like a flock of sheep, and if there had been the protection which we are hoping for some day that people may get, it would have been checked at the outset, and these mistakes would not grow.

Chairman: That is quite a proper point to make. I think there should be more publicity about these things and more communication, but the fact that a doctor may be occasionally wrong in his diagnosis must of course happen.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I shall not ask you to say that that is a mala fides, but I shall seek to show that he was wrong.

Chairman: I accept the position that he was wrong.

9084. Mr. Walter Stewart: If you please, Sir. (To the Witness): Now, certain cheques have been referred to—have you got those cheques?—Yes, I have them here. I think the suggestion about the cheque was that it proved my contention that the arrangements for certification had been started some days before.

9085. How do the cheques support that view of yours?—The cheque for 90 guineas I was asked for several days before my incarceration, and it evidently showed a guilty knowledge on the part of the person who asked for it.

9086. Who asked you for it?—I will not mention names; I would rather leave it to the Commissioners. I can show them the cheque. It was supposed to be for medical attention while at Dr. Dempster's house.

9087. Was that before you had received medical attention other than Dr. Dempster's?—No; this was four days before certification. It proved to my mind that certification was then definitely arranged, long before these other documents were written. Shall I show the cheque to you, Sir?

9088. Chairman: If you think it is important we should see it.—I think it is.

9089. Mr. Walter Stewart: Did you draw the cheque?—Yes.

9090. Were you told for what purpose the money was required?—He said he had been going about there a good deal and thought he would like some money.

Chairman: Is the point that he was sane enough to sign cheques, but not sane enough to retain his freedom?

Mr. Walter Stewart: Yes.

Witness: I think the condition of the writing and that sort of thing is important.

Mr. Jowitt: Is the point this, that after he was certified he would not be able to sign cheques, so before he was certified they hustled up and got a lot of money out of him?

9091. Mr. Walter Stewart: Yes; they made up their minds beforehand. (To the Witness): It is a matter of inference, but I think you are entitled to draw attention to it?—Yes.

(Cheques were handed in.)

9093. I am only going to read two of them to show what he was doing behind your back.

Mr. Jowitt: Will you not put the letters to the gentleman when he comes?

Mr. Walter Stewart: May the witness identify them?

Witness: These are copies from my wife's solicitor; she is very bitter about the whole thing, of course.

9094. Mr. Walter Stewart: Will it be possible to secure the originals of those letters from your wife?—Yes, they are in my possession.

9095. At any rate, they were letters which you say were shameful, keeping her misinformed?—Keeping her misinformed, but particularly keeping her away from me.

9096. If I am given the opportunity I will put them to that gentleman at the proper time. Now you have made a very strong statement that I want to give you an opportunity of enlarging upon. You say with regard to these gentlemen, who are frequently engaged in this particular practice of certifying, that they are supporters of vested interests?—Yes.

9097. What vested interests do you there allude to?—I allude to the large capital that is invested in these madhouses. At Ticehurst, for example, I have the details.

9098. Have you had an opportunity personally to search the register with regard to a particular madhouse called Camberwell House?—No. I have often visited it, but I have not searched the register there.

9099. It has been done to enable us to see whether the witness who appears as a medical superintendent is a witness altogether independent of the pecuniary side of it?—Yes.

9100. I can not pursue that with you further. You say they are supporters of vested interests?—No doubt.

9101. You say that these are very valuable properties. Do you know that from your own personal investigation?—Ticehurst is certainly.

9102. What is the highest rate of interest you have heard of being paid by one of these private companies?—I have heard it is about 30 per cent. as an average.

9103. Of course, you cannot ascertain the rate of interest by searching at Somerset House?—No, it is all hidden.

9104. But you can find out how many shares anybody has got?—Yes.

9105. Now about your wife's statement that Dr. Hayes Newington invited her to write that rather dreadful letter that has been put to you. Up to the time that you were certified had your wife ever expressed to you the slightest fear of you or nervousness with regard to being associated with you?—Never.

17 January, 1925.]

Mr. H.

9106. What was the attitude of your wife after it was alleged that you were suffering from G.P.I., and the other thing?—I think she was vindictive; I think she took it as true although she knew in a way it was not true.

9107. She knew perfectly well that if you were suffering from that, it must be owing to some infidelity on your part?—I think so.

9108. It had that effect at any rate?—At any rate the women in my family were going about telling her, "Do not you associate with him."

9109. Did you know at all, so as to have a chance of removing the effects of the poison, when it was first injected into her mind?—I never knew about this until I met Dr. Munro after my final escape.

9110. The damage was done then as far as your wife was concerned?—Yes.

9111. You had nobody who at the time could deal with it for you, because nobody knew outside—nobody on your side knew?—No.

9112. Did your brother petitioner ever apply for your release under Section 72?—No. He was thinking about doing it but a fresh lot of evidence was being collected.

9113. At any rate the Ticehurst people were not assisting your discharge?—No. They were doing everything to prevent it, but I think if it had gone on another month or two he would have done something, at least he said so. I have letters from him which said, "I have never noticed my brother Bill any different in these places from what he has always been."

9114. You say you can produce those letters?—I have certainly got them somewhere.

9115. Will you make a note to look for those letters so that they may be put to your brother if he is called?—There is a letter to Hayes Newington from E. H. which rather supports that; at any rate, I have the correspondence.

9116. You can let me have them at the proper time?—Yes.

9117. Now is the time as far as you are concerned?—Yes.

9118. Of course if communications are made to laymen by doctors, unless their confidence has been shaken in doctors as yours has been, you would expect them to act upon them?—I have never taken a doctor's opinion because I do not think they are scientific; I think they are prejudiced.

9119. I am not going into the detailed matters put to you, but with regard to this I think it is right that you should be given an opportunity to express a view about it. You say that with your experience of doctors who deal with mental disorder, you think they are not always very reliable, in your opinion.

Chairman: I am not going to allow this to be pursued further. Really we have had Mr. H.'s experience at great length. Is it really very important whether he thinks doctors are reliable or not?

Mr. Walter Stewart: On this point I do not think it is.

Chairman: Some people say lawyers are not reliable.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Some are, Sir.

Chairman: And so are some doctors.

9120. Mr. Walter Stewart (to the Witness): Is there anything further you wish to say, Mr. H., on what has been put to you in cross-examination? I do not want to put any further specific questions to you?—I would urge the Commission to do everything they can to destroy this condition of secrecy. I do not think these vested interests at places should be allowed. I do not think doctors have any business to be mixed up with finance; it is not desirable; it is contrary to the ethics of their profession.

9121. Particularly for the medical superintendents?—Yes, I think it is most wrong. I think they are often led into error by their desire to make money.

9122. Many people are?—We all are. I should like to thank you, Sir, for the courtesy of your Commission in listening to me at so great a length. I do hope that my experiences will improve the conditions of certification, and I hope make honest men of some of the gentlemen who are engaged in it.

Chairman: We thank you for your attendance here to-day, and for all you have told us. I trust you will be none the worse for the ordeal you have had.

Witness: Thank you, Sir.

(The Witness withdrew.)

SIXTEENTH DAY.

Monday, 26th January, 1925.

MEMBERS PRESENT :

THE RT. HON. H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (Chairman).

THE EARL RUSSELL.

SIR HUMPHRY ROLLESTON, BART., K.C.B., M.D.

SIR THOMAS HUTCHISON, BART.

SIR ERNEST HILEY, K.B.E.

SIR DAVID DRUMMOND, C.B.E., M.D.

MR. N. MICKLEM, K.C.

MR. H. SNELL, M.P.

MRS. C. J. MATHEW.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

MR. WALTER STEWART and MR. CREMLYN (instructed by the National Society for Lunacy Reform) appeared on behalf of Mr. H.

MR. H. C. DICKENS (instructed by Messrs. Hempsons) appeared on behalf of Sir Maurice Craig, Dr. Robert Percy Smith, Dr. J. G. Porter Phillips,

Dr. William Henry Butter Stoddart and Dr. Robert Cole.

MR. R. P. CROOM-JOHNSON appeared on behalf of Dr. Reginald John Stilwell and Dr. Bulkeley Footner.

Chairman: Mr. Stewart, you may recall that when Mr. H. was before us on Saturday, a week ago, you made an application that we should endeavour to recover the papers relating to the discharge of the receiver of Mr. H.'s estate. I have a letter from the Chief Clerk in the Master's office informing me that he has obtained copies of certain of the documents. I am sorry to say they are not yet complete; but, such as they are, I think they should be in your hands. I have a copy of the order appointing the receiver, a copy of the order restoring Mr. H. to the management of his affairs, a special report by Lord Sandhurst (who was then the Honourable John Mansfield), of the 24th May, 1917, and a special report also by him of the 9th October, 1917. I am sorry we have not the three documents to which you naturally attach much importance, namely, the certificates produced in the High Court proceedings, not by Dr. Crichton Browne, I want to correct you about that, but by Dr. Crichton Miller, Dr. Spitta, and a third doctor. But as far as we are concerned, I think you may take it that we shall hold it established that these three certificates were to the effect that at the time of their examination they found Mr. H. of sound mind.

Mr. Walter Stewart: The only certificate to which I attach great weight and importance was the bacteriologist's certificate of Dr. Spitta, to show that the Wassermann test was negative.

Chairman: We have been doing our best as you can see, to recover these documents, and that is what we have so far; possibly some more may come to light, and the Chief Clerk has instructions to send us everything he can recover; but I ought to say this, in fairness to them, that I am told that there has been in the office a complete reorganisation of their papers and some have been difficult to recover, but the instruction still stands that if the papers are found to be recoverable they are to be produced.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I know there is a difficulty; we have found it in other cases.

Chairman: Quite so; I thought it right to let you know about it. Then I regret to say that Mr. H. has addressed a letter to us which I venture to think should not have been sent, in which he refers in advance to Dr. Percy Smith's evidence. I do not propose to say more about it, but I think it is very undesirable that witnesses before us should comment upon other witnesses who have not yet been examined.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: May I say in that connection that my client, Dr. Stilwell, has received a letter also from Mr. H., and we do not desire to receive these communications. I will not say anything more about it than that. At a later stage probably the letter will be available for the Commission.

Chairman: Yes. We have received a number of letters. In ordinary circumstances, in a Court of Law, one would of course take very serious action in such matters, but we do not desire to lay undue stress upon these matters in this Inquiry. I merely say that it is quite improper that any such communications should be addressed to us or to any of the parties concerned in the case.

Then I think before we resume this morning, it might be convenient if the Commission were to indicate the points to which they attach importance in connection with Mr. H. It seems to us that we should be much assisted if Counsel appearing before us were to devote attention to two topics which have emerged, and upon which we should like assistance. The first is the circumstances in which it was thought proper that an urgency order should be pronounced in Mr. H.'s case; the justification for an urgency order instead of the more deliberate procedure of a reception order is a matter upon which we should like to hear some evidence. The other topic is also of some importance, namely, the circumstances of the certification. Mr. H. alleged that the examination was insufficient, and indeed, he went further and said negligent; and we should like to have evidence indicative of the circumstances of the examination—that is to say, the care with which it was conducted. I think that all present will realise that from our point of view the important question is whether the existing system provides adequate safeguards against improper certification of patients; and therefore it is of importance to us in this particular case to receive assurances that in Mr H.'s case, the examination was sufficient to justify the making of a certificate that he was of unsound mind. These two matters seem to us of importance. My colleagues are also anxious that if possible we should see Mr. Steele, who was referred to in the course of the previous proceedings, and address one or two questions to him with regard to the making of Mr. H.'s will. If Mr. Steele is present this morning, perhaps he will be good enough to remain with us for a short time in order that we may ask him a few questions. If not, I shall direct that he be invited to come. There is one other matter, rather for Dr. Stilwell, and that is in connection with the treatment of Mr. H. in Moorcroft after his escape; he complained that when he was brought back to Moorcroft he was punished, in the sense that he was sent to or kept in another part of the building where he had to associate with undesirable fellow patients, and his complaint was that his escape entailed those unpleasant consequences. Possibly you, Mr. Croom-Johnson, might give us a little assistance upon that matter. You will see, of course, its importance.

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Precisely.

Chairman: Now those seem to be the points of interest to us that emerge in our investigation, and if the evidence were directed to those topics it might, I venture to think, considerably shorten the proceedings, and at the same time give us all the assistance which is necessary for us in our task. Is Mr. Steele here this morning?

No reply.

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D., sworn.

Examined by Mr. H. C. Dickens.

9123. Sir Maurice Craig, you practise at 87, Harley Street, Cavendish Square; you are a registered medical practitioner, a doctor of medicine, Cambridge, a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians of London; you were the holder of the Gaskell Gold Medal in Psychology, Lecturer in Mental Diseases, and Demonstrator in Psychology in Guy's Hospital; the author of a work on "Psychological Medicine," and you have been a contributor of various articles for the medical journals upon these subjects, and you have had an extensive practice in mental cases for many years?—Yes.

9124. Now you first came into contact with Mr. H. in January, 1915, I think, at Teignmouth?—Yes, the 16th January, 1915.

9125. You have kept and you have here the whole of the notes that you made from time to time as you saw him with regard to his case?—Yes. I did not make notes on every occasion I saw him.

9126. But you have all the notes here that you did make?—Yes.

9127. And you did, in fact, see him off and on from January, 1915, to January, 1917?—That is so.

9128. I do not want you at the moment, although you can do it in cross-examination, to go into the whole of the details, but I think it would be more convenient if you gave the medical history of Mr. H. as you knew it from January, 1915?—I have my Chairman: He is evidently not here. The Secretary of the Commission will communicate with Mr. Steele, and ask if he will be good enough to attend later in the day. Now Mr. Dickens, have you anything to say this morning?

Mr. Dickens: I should like to call some witnesses who will be able to deal satisfactorily I think with the points you have raised. The witnesses I propose to call I will call in chronological order as far as the history of this case is concerned. There will be Sir Maurice Craig, Dr. Stoddart, Dr. Percy Smith, Dr. Porter Phillips and Dr. Cole. The only other witnesses whom I should have called and who would have given relevant evidence, are Dr. Adler, Dr. Dempster, Dr. McNaughton and Mr. Ashton, who are all dead, so I think I am satisfying the Commission that I am calling everybody I possibly can.

Chairman: Certainly. I am sure you will study economy of time in the matter.

Mr. Dickens: I will do my best.

Chairman: We cannot, of course, try out every case as if we were in a Court of Law.

Mr. Dickens: Of course you will understand that my clients feel very strongly the attacks that have been made against them. They do not desire in any way to skim this matter, and they are very anxious to go into every detail to show that they have done and said nothing which they cannot justify in this case, and if they should go into it at greater length than you think necessary, perhaps you will be good enough to stop it.

Chairman: We will leave the matter in your discretion to a large extent, but we are really concerned to keep our attention focussed upon the matters which will assist us in our inquiry.

Mr. Dickens: If you please, Sir, but at the same time these gentlemen have been attacked, and you will give them every opportunity of thoroughly defending themselves.

Chairman: No doubt.

Mr. Dickens: Then I will call Sir Maurice Craig first. I should say that I have now been instructed to represent Sir Maurice Craig, Dr. Stoddart and Dr. Cole, as well as the other two gentlemen I represented last time, in view of the fact that attacks have been made upon them personally.

Chairman: Very well.

original notes here, Sir, but I have made a copy of them, so that I can read them more easily, if I may use the copy.

9129. Chairman: If you please?—I saw Mr. H. first on the 16th January, 1915. I then saw him in consultation with Dr. Johnson at Teignmouth. That gentleman unfortunately has since died. I was informed that Dr. Dempster of Croydon was also his medical attendant, and I also met him on that occasion, and I met Mr. E. H., so far as I can make out. Then I was informed that Mr. H. was a consulting engineer, naval architect and shipowner, and that his age was 48. I was given certain family history, but as it brings in other persons' names, I do not know whether the Commission would like me to go into it.

9130. Chairman: Has it any relation to the history of the case?—Yes, it is with regard to the history. There were certain persons of unsound mind in the family.

9131. We need not have the names of the persons, but it is relevant from the medical point of view?—Yes. I am dealing, as the Commission will appreciate, with confidential matters, which I certainly should not have disclosed except under conditions such as these, and I presume that Mr. H. himself wishes me to disclose them; but if at any time I am stopped from disclosing things, I shall appreciate what you

SIR MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

as Chairman ask me to do. Of course, some of these points to which I shall have to refer, or perhaps ought to refer, are confidential matters regarding other persons.

9132. Earl Russell: Is it not enough for us that there was an undesirable family history?—Yes.

9133. Chairman: It is a position of some embarrassment for you, as I understand?—It is more a professional matter. I have nothing to keep back, but I do not want to disclose anything which would hurt other persons' feelings.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Now, Sir, before this sort of evidence goes any further, may I take your ruling upon it. You will observe, as far as my recollection goes, that nothing was put to Mr. H. with regard to any such escapade as is now being spoken of, and unless Sir Maurice Craig is prepared to say that these communications were made to him by Mr. H., I submit it is a little going outside the ordinary rules of evidence.

Chairman: I think we have gone outside the rules of evidence pretty flagrantly hitherto. Mr. H. has told us plenty of things which were said to him by other people which we did not stop.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Not on my invitation, Sir.

Chairman: On his own. The difficulty is that the diagnosis of this case is attacked. Of course the diagnosis of a medical man necessarily proceeds upon information he receives regarding his patient, and therefore I am afraid one cannot stop this.

Mr. Dickens: I am not putting this forward as being proof of these facts, but as evidence of what the doctors had before them.

Mr. Walter Stewart: It would have been fairer that the matter should have been put to Mr. H. when he was in the chair, so that he could either accept them or deny them.

Chairman: But even if he had denied them, it would still have been one of the circumstances in Sir Maurice Craig's mind when he dealt with the case.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I do not desire to say any more, Sir.

9135. Chairman: We will take your caveat, if we may so call it, on this subject. (To the Witness): Will you please proceed, Sir Maurice?—He regarded himself as a strong man. "He was taken to a nursing home, had cut himself very badly on the left arm. It took eight officers and men to hold him. He was only once difficult in the home." That was before I saw him. "His memory was said to be quite clear and he was now beginning to take interest in things. He thought people had thought that he was a German spy, delusions come and go. Gets depressed at times and believes that he is to be executed. At other times normal. At times more excited after seeing wife." There was no incontinence or any suggestion of that. Then "Illusions"—I have put a query against "illusions"—that I was not certain of. "Voices were not definite." I was not satisfied that they were. "No one had ever noticed any change in his speech. Three weeks ago used to read less than he is reading now. Most depressed in the evening and late afternoon. He had a sense of fullness and being over-fed. He never refused food. He had not attempted self-injury. Once got his brother down on the floor in early morning." That was in the home. I have not got a note about that. "His sleep at first was on certain sedatives, and he complained of feeling confused on waking." On the 20th December he "writes a letter, a statement re a murdered girl and raped first. He was the cause."

9136. Mr. Dickens: What is that statement of the 20th December?—I was just looking. I saw him on the 16th January; so 20th December must have been the date on which he wrote the letter, of 1914, I take it, about a murdered girl. "Raped her first and he was the cause. Really not in London, and re German spy." I am afraid these notes are rather disjointed, but they have been copied from the originals. And he "was in bed one month and since then walks twice daily. No interest. Only speaks if spoken to. Will play a game but gives little attention to it." There was no history of any bad habit. There was a suggestion that there was something about his wife. I will write it down or give it out, as it is wished.

9137. Chairman: If you will hand us a copy of your notes or your original notes?—I will hand you the notes by all means, but I am afraid they will be a little difficult to read.

9138. If you will give them to me that will be the best plan?—Certainly. (Handing same to the Chairman.)

Mr. Walter Stewart: May we have a copy of them?

Mr. Dickens: We have not another copy.

Mr. Walter Stewart: These are new to us, made behind our client's back.

Mr. Dickens: I object to this sort of insinuation.

Chairman: Surely a surgeon or a doctor does not make his notes in front of a patient's face?

Witness: These are all notes made at the time, but the history would not be, of course, Mr. Stewart. Of course, when I wrote about what the patient told me, that would be written in front of him. I took notes at that time. Now this is the patient's own statement: "He says he has got no headaches, no noises in his head. Lost one stone in weight. Sleeping better. Wakes up very frightened. Says that he is able to read a little. Feels that he is physically wrong. Bowels will not act every day. Normally constipated. His memory is good. Feels that he has treated his wife badly financially. Has had fear of disease. Tendencies to obsessional condition—doubts. Converses freely." Then there is a query about a collision re one of his fleet and a warship. I was not able to follow quite what he was talking about with regard to that matter. Then there is a complaint of another physical nature. "Eyes and all reflexes normal, but he feels he may have committed crime."

9139. Mr. Dickens: You do not remember whether that fear of disease was any specific disease, do you?—No. I examined him physically.

9140. Chairman: What date are we on now?—We are still on the 16th January, at Teignmouth. I have gone back to the first page, 1915. I put it in chronological order because it comes on my card a little in front of the mental history, but it really belongs to that time. He says he had retention of urine on several occasions. I put it down. I am not certain that that is really an organic condition, but it might have been a fear in his own mind—one of the fears he complained of. His knee jerks were normal. His pupils were equal and normal.

9141. Might I interrupt you to say that it is important to know how you came into contact with the case? Who called you in?—I have not an absolute record. I should have been called in by Dr. Dempster or Dr. Johnson, I should think. It was probably Dr. Johnson, because he was the doctor in charge at that time. I knew Dr. Johnson; I had met him in consultation before.

9142. Mr. H. professed to regard you at first in a friendly light, and one wanted to know how you came into contact with him. You were called in in consultation?—Quite right.

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

9143. You saw Mr. H., and what was his reception of you?—Very friendly. It always has been you will see, as I go through the case. It is one of those cases in which the legal requirements of certification embarrass the relationship of physician and patient, and you will see that the change comes about after that took place. I have evidence even that after he left Ticehurst he wrote me quite a friendly card; but the trouble arose over the legal position in which he thought I was a party.

9145. Mr. Dickens: Did you do your utmost from beginning to end to keep him, if it were safe, out of a mental hospital?—Yes, as I always do, feeling as I do after 30 years of work what a strain it is upon a patient. I have always taken the human side, even if at times I get very near the legal obligations placed upon me as a professional man. Now on the 9th March Mrs. H. said her husband was "improving steadily," and she arranged then with Dr. Munro to be with him. The wife is evidently apprehensive of being with him alone and living with him. The patient used to be afraid that the Germans would get hold of her. "Still worrying about how unkind he was to her. Patient is apt to slip out of the tram. If he is concerned in a case he had in Court, he would be up all night talking it over with her." This was merely a note that she said he was such an apprehensive man that if he had any problems he would be up all night talking them over, thinking that he may have taken the wrong view.

On the 13th May, 1915: "Came up with Dr. Munro and Dr. Dempster." At this time he was with Dr. Dempster. Dr. Dempster was a friend of his and had been for some long time, apparently, because he was very friendly with Dr. Dempster at that time, and he lived with him on and off long before the question of certification came along. It was not only a question of a month or two.

returned to his wife it would be wise for him not to give up business. "Wife began bombarding him with letters re money matters and this has upset the patient." That was what Dr. Munro told me.

9147. Earl Russell: Was that a fact, or was that a delusion?—I think there were letters. I think Mrs. H. had been very worried, and I have no doubt she did write to him on several matters.

9148. We do not want any details?—No; that was the case. "Mr. H. H. found the engineer man"—that was in the place of a male attendant, somebody to go about with him, or to relieve Dr. Dempster. "Is not depressed now, and is certainly better. Brother dealing with wife's matter. Patient told me he would like to go to Dr. Dempster, and I have suggested the engineer man staying with him during the week end." That is, so that he should have an opportunity of seeing him. "The wife denies writing letters on money matters."

Then on the 13th July, 1915, Mr. H. again came with Dr. Dempster. "He is better in many ways, more natural; still thinks he has no money. Now staying with Dr. Dempster of Croydon." That was as early as July, 1915, so that he was on and off 18 or 19 months with Dr. Dempster, and he was with Dr. Dempster at his own request when he was at his best, and more or less in quite a normal condition. "He eats and sleeps well. His weight was 11 stone 13½ lb. Can read with comfort. His pulse was normal."

Then on the 30th September, 1915: "The wife called this morning. The patient told his wife that he felt that he had been mentally afflicted all his life. Used to take everything to heart. He is now much better. Goes to Shoreham week ends. He is worrying about the Zeppelins. He is living with Dr. Dempster, and wife agrees that this is the best. Wife still is haunted by the incident and is evidently afraid of having him back again." The Commission will note that this fear on the part of the wife was antecedent to any tests that were made or any other point that came up in the medical history subsequently. I have a letter about this, and some notes.

9149. Mr. Dickens: We will come to that later on? Yes. "He wishes to have a flat. His wife feels that her confidence will never return. Her brother feels that they should not live together again. She does not even stay with him at Dr. Dempster's. (Before marriage he once took offence at the dentist and he was going to take an action.)" Some one told me that. "Dr. Dempster came with patient later. Patient wished to travel, but war on—no desire. Sleep good; not depressed. Feels too lazy. He is willing to stay if Dr. Dempster can put up with him. I told him his wife's nervousness was a factor re his going back." That is, the patient himself knew about the difficulty of the wife's nervousness following the incident referred to.

On the 23rd December, 1915, he is very much better. "Said that the Zeppelin raid had done him good. Inclined to talk too much and spending money more freely." Then I have a note that the wife lost her nerve. I do not know whether you would just wish me to read the next sentence, Sir.

Chairman: Yes, I think so. "The last time he was in bed with her he had on his boots, hat and overcoat."

Mr. Stewart: If this is read I must again point out that none of these matters affecting Mr. H., which he must have known of if they were true, were put to him in cross-examination. I submit that it is a gross evasion of the ordinary rules of fairness that this sort of thing should be allowed to be done, when Mr. H. was not given a chance either to admit or to deny it. It must have been known to those who are instructed on behalf of this gentleman.

Chairman: I have already expressed the view of the Commission. Sir Maurice is now giving us the information upon which he proceeded in his diagnosis of the case.

26 January, 1925.]

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Does that affect what I am raising by way of objection, Sir, namely, that no opportunity was given to the person most concerned either to deny or to admit this—something alleged behind his back which was not even called to his attention?

Earl Russell: Still that makes no difference to the effect upon the doctor's mind at the time.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am dealing with the procedure here. Would it not be right that Mr. H. should have the chance either to deny or to admit these matters?

Chairman: I have already pointed out that, if he had denied them, it would not in the slightest degree have affected the question we are considering now.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Would it not be fairer that he should have the chance either of admitting or denying them?

Mr. Dickens: If it is an attack upon me, which it seems to me to be, all I can say is that I was not Sir Maurice Craig's counsel last time, nor had I seen these notes.

Witness: I may say that these notes have never been used. I am forced to disclose these notes by Mr. H. himself.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Have they ever been disclosed to Mr. H.?

Chairman: I think, Mr. Stewart, you must restrain yourself. This is exactly an illustration of the class of embarrassment which the Commission will experience when we come to investigate particular cases. We have thought that we ought to hear a few individual cases. The atmosphere of litigation is being imported into them which we desire to exclude. Matters are brought before us by individual witnesses relating to their experience in this matter, and we have decided to hear them; but it is quite impossible to conduct this inquiry as if we were in a Court of Law. We can only take witnesses' statements, and we shall proceed to value them. Will you just proceed, Sir Maurice?

Witness: "Doing secretarial work at Croydon Hospital." That is, Dr. Dempster was encouraging him to do work. "He sees his wife regularly. Sleep good, pulse normal. Does not feel so active as he was. Wife lost all nerve and cannot face having him at home."

On the 28th July, 1916: "Has been away with wife and with Dr. Dempster. Not resumed marital relationship. Now appreciates his former cloudiness. Every five years had nerve storm. At one time dread of enclosed spaces or railway carriage. Still with Dr. Dempster, but anxious to get away. (Wife had been married before and had infinite worries.) He had been working at very high pressure and all his assistants left. No desire to return to business." You will see here that he admits now that he had appreciated he had been ill in the early part, because he says: "Now appreciates his former cloudiness."

Now we come to the more important time. On the 21st October, 1916: "I saw the patient at Dr. Dempster's, 94, Brighton Road, Croydon." The history was that: "He has been very excitable and over-active. Writing very florid letters to comparative strangers. Sexual excitement; and wife would not live with him. Had an attack of gastritis."

Earl Russell: Was he in bed when you saw him at this time?—Yes, I think he probably would be, because he was just back from an attack of pneumonia at Brighton; so I am almost certain he would be in bed; at any rate, he would be only sitting up in his room. "Dr. Bates, Brighton, wrote to Dr. Dempster saying patient had gastritis. Wife with him. Dr. Dempster went down and found him down with pleuro-pneumonia. Met Dr. Bates; could not look after him. Returned to Dr. Dempster 10 days ago. Pneumonia is better, but got very exalté, litigation, big schemes. Talks incessantly. Sleeping four hours or less. Cut off his moustache and shaved his head" (he was quite bald). "The right lung was dull. Now calling his wife a drunken woman. Very fond of her, but mother alcoholic, and now she was, and had it all his life." This is what he told me. Of course, his manner had quite changed. He had always spoken very kindly of his wife, but now, owing to his mental condition, was speaking in a more uncontrolled way. "Never resumed marital intercourse. Chatters on; but wife got drunk in the Pullman car. Wanders from subject to subject. The pupil was not re-acting well to light."

9150. Mr. Dickens: Was that significant?—That was a change from what had taken place before, and it attracted my attention. "Knee jerks also were dull and unequal, and pulse was normal. Speech normal."

9151. Now at that stage did you get a letter, dated the 22nd October, from Mrs. H., and have you the original there?—Yes.

9153. Then did you write a report on the 22nd October, addressed to Dr. Dempster?—Yes, I wrote one.

9154. That is to say, the next day?—Yes. That was the same day as I expect his wife wrote to me.

9155. "I saw this patient in consultation with Dr. Dempster on 21st October, 1916, at 94, Brighton Road, Croydon. I found him just recovering from an attack of pneumonia; the lung condition is clearing and there is no anxiety as to his complete recovery from this. As regards the mental condition, he is excitable and loquacious, wandering from subject to subject in a somewhat irrelevant manner. This excitement is the opposite phase of his former state of depression; on the other hand, there are one or two symptoms which would suggest more serious trouble, that is, that the condition is due to some organic disease of the brain. The symptoms that would suggest this are fortunately confined to one or two, therefore I hope that they may pass away, but in order to help the diagnosis I should suggest that the blood be examined and, if possible, a test of the cerebro-spinal fluid; if it is decided to do this, it would be advisable to get someone like Dr. Adler, 10, Bryanston Square, Portman Square, to make these investigations, and I would gladly arrange for it if so desired."—That is so.

9156. Did you know Dr. Adler?—I knew Dr. Adler; he had done a good deal of work on and off. I first got to know him through Lord Dawson.

9157. Just tell the Commission something about the doctor.—He was quite a recognised man for this sort of work. He had done a good deal of work for me. If you notice, I only say "it would be advisable to get someone like Dr. Adler"—I was not advising Dr. Adler.

9158. But he was a gentleman of repute in bacteriological examinations?—Yes.

9159. Did you speak to Mr. H. about Dr. Adler's visit? Did you tell him that Dr. Adler would come when it was arranged?—I do not know whether I have got anything on record about that. I may have told him that I wanted Dr. Adler to make an examination of his blood for me. Whether I would tell him why I wanted it examined is another matter. I mean a medical man does not convey every fear in his mind to his patient.

9160. No, but he has said that you told him that Dr. Adler was coming to do a small operation on him which would cure him of his trouble?—I certainly would not do that; it would be totally untrue,

26 January, 1925.]

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

and I never make an untrue statement to a patient in any sense that way.

9161. Earl Russell: It is not the kind of statement a doctor ever makes?—No, it is an unnecessary statement.

9162. Mr. Dickens: Subsequently was it arranged that Dr. Adler should go down?—It was. Then there is a note before he does go down on the 4th November, that the patient told me he was going to build a hospital. "His lung was not quite clear yet. He was in very great spirits." He was talking in a very jocular way about everything. "Pupils: the left is not so good as the right." I put a query there which expresses a doubt in my mind as to whether it is owing to the rapidity of the re-action that I cannot see it. It was in my mind that there was something in that; therefore I was not omitting to appreciate anything that might be happening, and therefore was on the look out for it; but I was satisfied, as other medical people were later, that this was not the case. Then he told me that, "When ill he felt that his testamentary affairs were not right. On the 12th October Dr. Dempster advised him waiting on this matter, but patient feels uneasy. The will was made in 1904. Query, drawn up by brother's firm or somebody named Harvey. Patient used to live in Croydon. White, Lodge, S— and Drummonds were one of the leading firms." There is a word there I cannot read. "He telephoned to Drummonds and a man named Muther, I think it was, came. He instructed the nurse to telephone." I may say that these matters with regard to the will were that he wanted me to say that he was in a fit condition to make a will. Therefore I had to tell him that if he was going to use me in that way he must disclose to me in what way he was altering his will, or why he was altering it, or some main facts; or I should be in a peculiar position, being a medical man, especially one who was on the nerve side, if it ever came to my having to give evidence; I should be asked certain questions about matters which, if I was going to protect his will, I should have to be in a position to know. He told me these facts.

9163. Chairman: Then you make a statement about his testamentary dispositions which we need not go into. Then you say: "His memory is lucid to a degree."—Yes.

9164. Memory is excellent. Left pupil is very little affected by light.—That means it does not re-act to light.

9165. "To see Adler on Monday."—Yes, in two days' time.

9166. Then I notice "Wassermann" and two crosses. What does that mean?—That is double plus—plus plus. That means that it is a "positive." Of course it ought not to be positive at all; it ought to be negative. Dr. Adler reported—

9167. Mr. Dickens: You have that there, have you not?—Yes.

9169. Earl Russell: Would you give us something we could understand, Sir Maurice?—I am very sorry.

Chairman: It is very technical, of course.

Witness: Yes. It points to what is known as general paralysis, or it might be some other form of specific disease, and that of course, taken with the physical signs as observed by myself, were very disquieting; because you see the clinical side had already led to something in my mind, therefore when I got this, saying that there was a bacteriological change, it was of much more serious import; in fact it would have been very wrong for me to have done anything else than to take count of it.

9170. Mr. Dickens: What does it denote?—If that is true, it points to the case being one of general paralysis. I mean of course you may say that this account of Dr. Adler was wrong, in what he had done, but I am not responsible for it in any way; I am taking it as it is.

9171. I think the Commission would probably like to know a little more about general paralysis of the insane, and what it denotes?—Of course it has passed through many phases, but it has at last reached a stage at which it is known that it only arises under certain conditions—that is, the person must have had already a specific history.

9172. Mr. Walter Stewart: What specific history?—"Specific" is a technical term for syphilis.

9173. Mr. Dickens: I need hardly say that the syphilitic infection may have been innocently come by?—Exactly.

9174. Chairman: Can it arise in a case where the syphilis is secondary, inherited syphilis?—Well, it would be a little late. It can, of course, but this might be a little late here.

9175. It does not necessarily indicate that the particular person has himself received contagion?—No; all it indicates is that the syphilis occurs.

9176. Earl Russell: But the patient may have been innocent?—Absolutely, may not even know he ever had it. Oh, yes, that frequently happens.

9177. Chairman: It is now recognised, is it, as definitely associated with syphilis, whether transmitted or acquired?—That is so; it is a syphilitic disease.

9178. Mr. Dickens: Syphilitic or post syphilitic?—Well, it is syphilitic. Everything must be post if once syphilis is there.

9179. Chairman: Perhaps you might enlighten us a little further, Sir Maurice. Has medical science reached the stage of being able to diagnose it easily? I mean is it one of those things the symptoms of which are readily detectable or is it one of those things in which the symptoms may be difficult of ascertainment?—Sometimes very difficult. If you have a large number of physical signs, of course it is easy, but if you have only a few, then it is more difficult; being a syphilitic disease, it must be curable in that sense, if you could only find the cure; and certainly I should be blameworthy if I had not given him every opportunity of getting a cure or of having a treatment for it.

9180. I hope I am not anticipating Mr. Dickens, but might I just ask this also: Is the Wassermann test supposed to be conclusive in medical science?—Yes, we accept it.

9181. Would you regard it as a conclusive test?—I believe there are certain other conditions, mostly oriental diseases, where it may arise. I dare say Sir Humphry Rolleston would help the Commission better on that, because it is a general question of medicine; but, broadly speaking, it becomes an absolute test, especially if you get it, as in this case, in the cerebro spinal fluid as well as the blood. You see you have it in two places here. Of course, the earlier you can attack a disease the more likely you are to stop it. Therefore it was absolutely essential that he should have treatment, and he had treatment as a matter of fact. Therefore from the neurological standpoint it is quite conceivable that what was done might have stopped the disease. You could not say medically and scientifically that that was not true. Directly this report came in, Dr. Dempster was informed at once, to give specific treatment.

9182. Mr. Dickens: Mercury?—Yes, mercury and iodide of potassium.

26 January, 1925.]

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

Sir David Drummond: We heard that he never had mercury in his life.

9183. Chairman: Mr. H. told us he never had mercury, and he threw it in the fire.—I was under the impression he had it from Dr. Dempster. Dr. Dempster would be carrying out what I asked in that sense. I understood he was treated.

9184. Mr. Dickens: How would it be given?—It might be given by the mouth, as ordinary medicine.

9185. A patient would not necessarily know, would he?—Not necessarily.

9186. At all events you prescribed it?—I advised Dr. Dempster.

9187. Then perhaps the Commission would like to know a little more about the subsequent course of this disease of general paralysis. Does that remain?—It usually runs a course of a varying period of from one to six years, but of course there are cases on record in which it apparently has ceased and has never advanced any further. Being a definite poison, the tissue cells may stop the progress of the poison.

9190. Mr. Walter Stewart: May we have the date of that letter?—27th February, 1918.

Mr. Stewart: May we have the letter as soon as convenient?

Mr. Dickens: You shall have it in the course of time.

9191. Mr. Snell: Should I be right in assuming, Sir Maurice, that general paralysis of the insane is not invariably progressive?—Not invariably. Of course it is a disease we have been learning very much more about during the last 10 years. In the old days if once one diagnosed G.P.I. you would say a person ought to die of it, but at that time it was thought to be something else. Now, however, it is known to be due to a specific organism; therefore it comes into the whole group of diseases caused by organisms. Therefore, scientifically, we are bound to come to the conclusion that it might be recoverable.

9192. Mr. Dickens: I have a book here on mental diseases, by Dr. Cole, in which he says that "about 7 per cent. of patients, however, improve marvellously and appear to get well, the disease being arrested for a period of months, or even a few years"—do you agree with that?—Yes.

9193. Sir Humphry Rolleston: What is the longest period of remission in your experience?—I have known of a case of certainly 15 years.

9194. Earl Russell: While we are on the Wassermann test, would you consider the one test sufficient?—There is a question whether he had another test, but you must remember it was during war time, and one was very heavily pressed for keeping notes. But I do refer in a letter here to "the last test." I can, however, find no record of it having been taken as another test. If it had been a test unsupported by clinical or physical signs, then I should certainly say one test was not sufficient; but when you get a test which corroborates physical signs, it is very much more usual not to take a second one. It is a very difficult thing to take. It is to some patients extremely painful, and gives them a terrible headache; therefore it is not a thing that you would do lightly. You would not make it merely from academic reasons. When you have clinical signs supporting a bacteriological examination, I should say it was a proper and sufficient test.

9195. Chairman: But suppose, Sir Maurice, that the only history of the case you had was that a single Wassermann test had been taken of the patient, and that that test gave positive results; would you consider that sufficient to pass judgment upon the case?—It would be commonly done, yes.

9196. Do you think it would be reliable—that is what we want to know?—Yes, it ought to be quite reliable. The only point would be that if treatment were given, there must be a further test made later as to whether the treatment had been in any way successful, or whether there was an improvement taking place in the condition of the patient.

9197. But for the purposes of getting an indication of the nature of the disease, would you in practice just rely upon one Wassermann test?—Certainly. In a diphtheria case you do not go on taking tests; you treat the patient at once.

9198. Chairman: One positive swab is sufficient in that case?—Yes. You might get into very serious difficulties in certain conditions if you did not.

9199. I was asking that because one of the points Mr. H. made was that he considered one test was inadequate, and that three tests should have been made before a considered judgment upon his case was pronounced?—That is contrary to medical practice, certainly.

9200. That is not the only question, whether it is contrary to medical practice or not. The question is really whether one test is reliable and ought to be relied upon?—Certainly.

9201. Mr. Dickens: Then if during one of these remissions a Wassermann test is made and turns out negative, what effect has that on your mind? That the first test was wrong?—No, not necessarily.

9203. Chairman: I have found the passage about the mercury; it is in question 8621. Mr. H. said: "It is not true that he ever treated me with mercury; because the only mercury that ever came near me was sent by Maurice Craig—"that is you, Sir Maurice—"and I used it for lighting my fire."—At any rate it was prescribed.

9204. That is the important point?—Yes.

Chairman: Shall we just go on with the notes?

9205. Mr. Dickens: You, Mr. Macmillan, used an expression about a confirmed judgment as to the nature of the disease. I understand Sir Maurice, you never came to a confirmed judgment as to his disease?—No.

9206. You were suspicious, and this gentleman presented all the symptoms of this particular disease?—Yes.

9207. Then your next note is a note of 20th November, 1916, when you met his brother-in-law?—Yes, with Mr. E. H. "He was full of libel actions. Imaginary wrongs. Stoddart went with me. He felt that patient was probably certifiable but had very great difficulty in obtaining facts to make a certificate upon." I might say here that of course this does not mean that he did not think Mr. H. was a person of unsound mind, but there are two points that a medical man is always faced with; one is that his certificate has to bear on the face of it evidence conveyed by another person that the person is of unsound mind. You may see and know a person, and from your own observation say he is a person of unsound mind, but it might be quite impossible to write anything down on a certificate that would convey to another person that that person was insane. Of course, in this case the difficulty was very great. It was much more by his general behaviour and conduct, and by the way he was writing huge numbers of letters. His views were much changed towards people and things. He was charging people whom he had not apparently charged before. He was now saying that the nursing home he had stayed at, which he had always spoken quite friendly of, had given him certain diseases, or at any rate he got diseases there—

Mr. Walter Stewart: Really, Sir, I submit that this ought not to be permitted. Mr. H. has never been suggested to have said anything of the kind. What he did say you know.

Witness: I am only saying what he told me.

Mr. Walter Stewart: We know what was written down.

Chairman: Mr. Stewart, you must really recall that Mr. H. had the utmost latitude from us; in fact the longest sitting of the Commission was given to him in order that he might put his case fully before us. I think we are also entitled to hear his medical advisers at the time.

Mr. Stewart: We have got this in writing, and the gentleman is being allowed to give evidence of something quite different from what is in writing.

Chairman: He is telling us what was in his mind as to Mr. H.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I have not been able to get access to the documents.

9208. Mr. Dickens: Will you go on with your notes please, Sir Maurice?—It was on that occasion that Dr. Stoddart signed his urgency certificate.

9209. Earl Russell: That is the 20th November?—20th November, 1916.

9210. Chairman: No, that is not right. He did not sign an urgency certificate on the 20th November, did he?—Yes, but it was never put in force.

9211. Mr. Dickens: As a matter of fact, you were in a position on the 20th November to send Mr. Holman to an asylum?—I would have been, yes.

9212. The legal formalities had been completed, and if you had been anxious to certify him and to send him to an asylum you could have done it there and then?—Yes. Mr. E. H. signed the order. He met us down there and signed the order, and Dr. Stoddart gave the certificate. But it was never put in force, as I will show you in one moment.

9214. Mr. Dickens: Would you read the note at the bottom of the page?—"Seen by Stoddart and he decided to certify, but felt that there was a difficulty." Now, there is a report by Dr. Stoddart.

9215. Dr. Stoddart will produce it. I do not want to read it twice.—If you please. On the next day, the 21st November, there is a note: "Last evening patient talked matters over with Dempster and said that he appreciated that he was doing foolish things and writing far too much, and said that he would be willing to follow any rules laid down if he could remain on with Dempster." He knew there was a question of him leaving; indeed, I told him about the position he was putting us in. "When I talked to him he was quite clear, and asked me to frame any rules, and he would sign them. This he did, and took a copy for himself. I told him that both Stoddart and I were doubtful whether he was fit to retain his liberty unless he were willing to be guided." In the case of a patient of this kind who understands things, I always tell them absolutely the plain facts. I mean there are certain persons who, of course, would not understand if you told them, but with a patient in Mr. H.'s state I always inform the patient of the difficulty he is placing his medical advisers in if he does certain things, and why, and what it means. Now you will see that immediately afterwards, on the 21st—

9216. First of all, did he understand that it was a question of his liberty?—He certainly did.

9218. Chairman: What is the date of that?—This is dated the 21st, the same date as that letter. I went down at once. Dr. Stoddart signed that urgency paper on the 20th November. He talked the matter over. The patient knew perfectly well what Dr. Stoddart's view was and what my view was: that he was not fit to be retaining his liberty. Therefore he lost no time. He writes this letter himself. He gets Dempster to ring me up to get me to come down again, which I did. Then we talked it over, and I wrote this: "I am willing whilst I remain at 94, Brighton Road, to write only to my relatives and if I write to anyone else I will submit the letter to Dr. Dempster or to my brother Ernest"—that is, he will not write to strangers, without asking about it. "I shall be willing to stay in bed and fall in with any rules Dr. Dempster makes. I am willing to give up the hospital scheme and I shall take no further action about going to Brighton at the present time."

9219. That is sensible enough?—Yes.

9220. Mr. Dickens: That is signed by him; it is drawn up by you and witnessed by you?—Yes. That is dated the 21st November, 1916. Now he keeps that letter, and he writes to me on that evening, after I had left: "Dear Dr. Craig. I enclose your original draft of agreement and have handed copies to Dr. Dempster. So many thanks for all the trouble you have taken. I am writing to advertise in Notes and Queries. Gentlemen of antiquarian tastes or otherwise will receive every possible care and attention in house of medical man living in Torquay. Box 570, 11, Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane, E.C." You will notice that this letter is not quite normal; it is a little distraught, but there is a good deal of it. "It looks fairly promising as a second string to my bow; will submit replies later. Personally I feel at peace with all the world with the exception of Arms matter. Will you please consider what is best to be done. I am giving up flat at Brighton at the soonest possible date, viz., 30th December, 1916, I cannot under lease relet. Again thanking you." Then I write—9221. There is a note first on the 21st November: "Patient expressed willingness to do anything we asked"?—Yes, I have read that.

9222. "Said he knew he had been abnormal"?—Yes. "I told him that both Stoddart and I were doubtful whether he was fit to retain his liberty."

9223. Did you make up your mind then that it was not necessary to send him to an asylum?—Yes; I was most reluctant to do so. I never wanted to do it. It is the last thing one wants to do, to send a patient into a mental hospital unnecessarily. All my difficulties were that if he was not going to be guided by me I was forced into the position, but he once more said to me: "I will be guided"—and here of course I was on very thin ice and on slender grounds, because I should like the Commission to appreciate that an independent medical man had now said he was a person of unsound mind and ought to be under care, therefore my legal position, or Dr. Dempster's legal position, was getting very doubtful. I was prepared even then to cancel, as I did cancel, the certificate, and never used it. I will read you the letter I wrote to his brother as to why I did it.

9224. That was on the 22nd, was it not?—Yes. That was the brother I had met with the doctor and who had signed the urgency order of the 20th November: "After leaving you on Monday I made all necessary arrangements for your brother to go down to Moorcroft; but yesterday morning Dr. Dempster rang me up saying that your brother had written to me and also spoken to him to the effect that he was perfectly willing to fall in with any recommendations and keep any rules that we made, and that he thought before anything was done it would be wise for me to go and have another talk with him, which I did yesterday afternoon. I put matters very clearly before him as to the difficulties he was placing us in by his want of judgment in writing letters, etc., and that I felt the responsibility so great that I had advised that further opinion should be taken, and that this opinion supported the view that he should be protected from doing unwise acts. Your brother fully appreciated the position and promised that he would sign any rules that we wished and keep them. These I drew up and he signed them. Under these circumstances, I felt that it would be improper to take any further action in the matter as to putting the certificates in force and sending him under care at the present time." So that as I say, it was the reverse of wishing to place him under care. I was most anxious to keep him out, as I had been all the way through.

9225. What happened between that date and the 9th which necessitated the urgency order?—Unfortunately I do not seem to have many notes about that time, but the point was that things fairly improved for a time—that means for a day or two; but of course Mr. H., with all sincerity and intent to keep an honourable undertaking—I am not saying he did not keep it, but his illness did not permit him to keep it, so that he was unable to keep it—passed straight away again into doing the very things about which he said he would be willing to abide by our decision, and the difficulties increased as to the number of letters that he was writing and the way he was writing. He had then got two monkeys in his bedroom, and the whole thing was getting impossible, and Dr. Dempster said he could not honourably keep him there because he was of unsound mind, and he felt he was doing some illegal act by detaining him.

9226. Chairman: He was paying, of course, for his keep?—Yes, and therefore I had to do something further in the matter to relieve him. Mr. H. himself was saying he was going to leave and go on his own.

9227. Earl Russell: No objection was taken to the monkeys, because they were allowed to accompany him to the asylum?—Yes. That is why I said Moorcroft, where I could send him with his monkeys. He was very attached to his monkeys. We were trying to meet him in every direction possible.

9228. Chairman: There is nothing necessarily wrong in a person having pets of that description?—No, except in a small room; with the monkeys living constantly together, the room was not altogether quite in a sanitary condition.

9229. I do not think the fact that a person has even a peculiar taste in pets is indicative of an upset mind?—Taken by itself it was nothing, but taken in conjunction with everything else it was a new factor.

9230. Earl Russell: Were the monkeys bought after the 21st November?—No, I think he had ordered them just before.

Mr. Walter Stewart: No, because it is in the certificate of Dr. Stoddart, "Mr. H. told me he had bought a monkey from the Zoo, and showed me the parrot cage he intended to keep it in."

Chairman: What was the date of that?

Mr. Walter Stewart: The 20th November.

Witness: He had not got them yet.

Chairman: I must say I do not attach much importance to the monkeys.

Mr. Dickens: I do not think Sir Maurice does.

Chairman: He might have had a parrot or something else, which might have been quite proper.

Witness: It was a new factor with him in that sense.

9231. Earl Russell: But not new since the 21st?—No, I am not saying that; but the real position was that Dr. Dempster said he considered he could not legally detain him.

9232. Chairman: That is a different point. An urgency order had been signed, and therefore Dr. Dempster's position became legally embarrassing?—Yes; that was the real point.

9233. Mr. Dickens: Will you read your note of the 9th December, Sir Maurice?—"Last night was abusive to Dr. Dempster and accused him of having him ill-treated at Teignmouth; he has written charges of all kinds. Last night threatened to leave. Still writing. I came down with Robert Percy Smith. Writing not affected." Now it was then Dr. Dempster had telephoned to me and said the position is absolutely impossible, and could I not do something. That I must take certain steps to have him either removed or have something done. I got into communication with his brother and decided that further opinion should be called in. Now, in calling in further opinion, I thought it would be unfair to call in Dr. Stoddart, or the patient might think it unfair, a person who had already prejudged the position; so I decided that I would call in somebody else, someone quite free, who knew nothing at all about it. Therefore, I called in Dr. Percy Smith, another physician of well-known repute. That was the reason Dr. Percy Smith was called in, and not Dr. Stoddart, on the second occasion.

9234. Did you see Dr. Percy Smith before he examined the patient?—No. I met him down there.

9235. Did you tell him the medical history of the case?—I gave him my history of the case, yes.

9236. And then he saw the patient alone?—Of course, yes, and had a very long interview with him.

9237. After that he drew up a certificate which you have seen, no doubt?—I have seen it, yes.

9238. Was that a certificate which was justified by circumstances as you knew them?—Absolutely.

Chairman: I think that is the certificate of the 9th December?

9239. Mr. Dickens: Yes. (To the Witness): What sort of length of time did that interview last?—A long time. It is a long time ago, and I could not say definitely. It certainly would not be under three-quarters of an hour or an hour.

26 January, 1925.]

SIR MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

9240. In your judgment did Dr. Percy Smith have sufficient information at his disposal to make that certificate?—Certainly.

9241. And in your view it was thoroughly justifiable under the circumstances?—In fact, it was the only alternative, unless we were going to allow him to wander outside and be taken up by the police.

9242. I was going to ask you why it was an urgency order and not a reception order?—The reason was that a reception order takes a longer time—that is, you have to get another medical man to see him, and also get a justice's order. Therefore he might have said: "Well, I am going; I am not going to stay any longer," and he might have left, and we should have had no power to restrain him, of course. Urgency is essential when a person is not under proper control.

9243. Then did Dr. Porter Phillips come on the scene?—Yes. Dr. Porter Phillips made the other certificate. He was another medical man.

9244. Have you seen his certificate?—I do not know whether I have; I could not say whether I have or not.

9245. You had better see it, Sir Maurice. Dr. Porter Phillips is also a gentleman of repute?—Yes. He is resident physician at Bethlem.

Chairman: We have it; it is dated the 10th December.

9246. Mr. Dickens: I want Sir Maurice to see it, and to say whether he thought it was justified under the circumstances. (To the Witness): Have you got it there?—Yes.

9247. "He was abnormally excitable, restless and loquacious. He was unduly effusive and communicative to me, a stranger to him, e.g., he told me about his private affairs and invited me to his country house. He exhibits the physical signs of general paralysis." All that was true, and Dr. Porter Phillips had an opportunity of seeing and talking to the patient?—Yes. I did not go down; he saw him alone.

9248. Under the circumstances his certificate was justifiable?—Absolutely.

9250. You had made up your mind that he was a person of unsound mind?—Yes.

9251. And then he went to Moorcroft, as we know?—Yes.

9252. There are some subsequent letters. I see you went to see him from time to time at Moorcroft—in fact you often went?—Yes; I saw him from time to time.

9253. And then he treated you as a friend?—Yes.

9254. I see you wrote a letter to his brother on the 3rd February, 1917—have you got that letter?—Yes.

9255. "I went down to see your brother yesterday. I have received many letters from him, but I was so glad to find yesterday that he was quieter and much more settled down. When I asked him about going away, he said that the weather was very cold, and that he thought it was fully early to get off yet." Do you remember in February talking about him going away, and his saying it was fully early to get off yet?—Yes, I do.

9256. "And under the circumstances it would be better to wait before giving him a change. He talked quite cheerfully and did not make any complaints at all."—Of course there was Dr. Macnaughton's report between that, on the 29th December. You saw that?—Yes. There was a letter from his brother asking that he should be sent down. There was a letter from Mr. E. H.

9257. Mr. Walter Stewart: What would be the date of that?—The 24th December, 1916. "I have just had a call from one of my brother W.'s greatest friends. He is very anxious that G. W. F. Macnaughton of 33, Lower Belgrave Street, Eaton Square, should be asked to advise whether he considers there is organic disease (I understand you were not quite definite on the point yourself) and if there is no organic disease what treatment he would recommend." So that I had been perfectly open to the friends, as I was to everyone. "Unless you see good reason to the contrary will you get this done promptly." Of course one was only too glad to have anyone and it was arranged that he should go down. I did not meet him.

9258. Chairman: Will you tell us whether Dr. Macnaughton is an expert in this branch of medicine, or was he a general practitioner?—I suppose he was in general practice. I do not know very much about him in that way, but he was asked by his own friends and relations.

9259. Mr. Dickens: At all events you saw his report, and it was a justifiable report?—Yes. He wrote to me "I am leaving this envelope open and perhaps you would be so kind as to forward it after you have seen it as I do not know the address." He had not got the address of the brother, so he forwarded the letter through me. He puts as a post-script: "I had a very kindly and courteous reception from Dr. Stilwell and Dr. Cole"—that is at Moorcroft. Then he wrote this report, of which I have a copy here; perhaps the Commission have already had it.

Chairman: Yes, I think we have had that.

9260. Earl Russell: Just before you read that report, you said you saw him at the asylum, and that he made no complaint. Did he make no complaint of detention?—No, he never made any complaint that I am aware of, to me. I think a little later on there was a complaint; I would not like to say definitely without looking at my note, but it was nothing of any serious point at all. Even when he was taken back he made no complaints on that occasion.

9261. He did not tell you that he was wrongfully detained at that time?—No, even when he escaped and had gone back.

9262. Mr. Dickens: You saw him after that?—I saw him after that. He was in a very happy condition and made no complaints whatever, either about his treatment or of his detention. This letter of Dr. Macnaughton's is from his own friend—nothing to do with any expert persons at all. "I visited Moorcroft to-day and examined Mr. H. He is mentally deranged and requires to be under care and treatment. This is readily ascertained from his conversation, some of his actions and his markedly facile manner. It is not easy to perceive at present signs of organic brain disease, although two early ones are present, namely, slight irregularity of the right pupil and a tremulous tongue. These symptoms along with the mental state, would denote almost invariably the early stages of general paralysis of the insane, it will, however, be two or three months before one can be positive as to the course Mr. H.'s trouble will take, but meantime one cannot consider the outlook good."

9263. Mr. Micklem: Was that in December?—That was on the 29th December, very shortly after he got there.

Chairman: Yes, we have that report already on the note in last Saturday's proceedings.

Witness: There is a report that he had an attack of jaundice when he went in. He was subsequently operated upon at Ticehurst.

Mr. Dickens: Does the Commission want to go any further with Sir Maurice?

Chairman: No, I do not think so.

Witness: There is one medical point there. He does rather suggest that we were not careful enough and ought to have done that operation earlier.

9264. Chairman: Now there is one question I would like very much to ask you, Sir Maurice. The reports contain what is no doubt from the point of view of the patient a very serious matter, namely, that he exhibits physical signs of general paralysis. Mr. H. subsequently came to know that these certificates contained that statement. Of course, you will appreciate that from the point of view of a patient such a diagnosis is a very grave matter?—I think I have already said so this morning.

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

9265. I want to follow out with you what we are thinking on the subject. It is naturally a very grave matter because of the implications of that disease?—Certainly.

9266. It might indeed have unhappy social implications in many cases?—It is a difficulty we are faced with in many cases.

9267. What I want to know is this: Was that statement, that the patient exhibits physical signs of general paralysis, essential to the finding which is the important finding in such certificates, namely, that the patient was found by the medical examiner to be a person of unsound mind. Let us assume that the sentence, "He exhibits physical signs of general paralysis," were deleted altogether from the certificate. Were the other circumstances of the case, the clinical record of the case with which you were familiar, sufficient in your opinion to warrant the pronouncement that he was of unsound mind, apart from the signs which had been noted and were said to relate to general paralysis?—I wish to give a fair account of this. It is to convey to some other person something, that is the intent of the certificate, and to give the Board of Control a fair opportunity of knowing and appreciating what is said in the other part of the certificate in a case like this. I should say that it was really the right action to take in putting it in. I fully appreciate that in law it would be unnecessary, because detention is not necessary for the organic disease—that is, a person suffering from general paralysis would not necessarily be detained as a person of unsound mind. I take it that is your point, Sir.

9271. He ought sincerely to set out the matters which seem to him to be important?—It is a private matter. One fully appreciates that the law permits that when a person recovers he shall get the certificate. Therefore is the medical man to write the certificate in such a way that it shall be acceptable to the patient when he recovers, or shall it be written in such a way as to contain full information to those in Government Departments who are responsible for saying whether his detention is wrong?

9272. Plainly the latter. He must sincerely set down the things he has observed, and the inferences he has drawn.—I quite see your point.

9273. Mr. H. C. Dickens: Would it be fair to say this, that the certificate purported to say two things, first that the patient is of unsound mind, and, secondly, to explain what in the certifier's opinion is the cause of that?—Yes, it may be superfluous, or may be regarded as superfluous.

9274. But it is helpful?—Of course in the majority of cases I am thankful to say that in medicine we make more correct diagnoses than bad ones. I see the point. In many other cases it might be very helpful.

9275. Earl Russell: Is it not more than the Board of Control—do you not want to convey to the people who will be responsible for his treatment what his treatment should be?—I quite agree—that is another point.

9276. Mr. H. C. Dickens: And there is also the question of the justice of the peace?—I do not know so much about him.

9277. But should you not give him all the information in your power?—Oh, certainly, but it might be arguable whether that would help him. Certainly it would be very helpful to medical people, or might be.

9278. Chairman: What I really wanted to know was this, whether the diagnosis that those symptoms were the symptoms of general paralysis was vital to the pronouncement that this gentleman was of unsound mind?—No, but there are two factors here. One is drawing attention to the condition itself. It is the data upon which the case is sent in to other persons. It may be regarded as superfluous, but in some cases it might be very important. I can quite imagine cases in which this would be of infinite importance, in the case, for instance, of some legal or criminal trial in which it was a question of having it on record that medical men appreciated a certain disease at a certain time. It is not only this you are dealing with; you may have many, many other factors coming in.

9279. Mr. Croom-Johnson: Sir Maurice, you know Moorcroft?—I do.

9280. It is apparent from the record of the attendances in this case that you saw Mr. H. at Moorcroft on many occasions?—Yes, I did.

9281. And you have also, I take it, seen other patients from time to time in the course of your practice?—I have.

9282. Do you recollect seeing him in what was described as the large room at Moorcroft?—Yes; after he had returned. Of course, he had his own room, but then he had used his own room in order to escape; therefore when he returned, in order to give him a certain amount of liberty, as much as they could do, they put him in what you call there the large room so that he could go about; but he would always be under the observation of some person.

9283. Rather more supervision of the attendants?—Quite.

9284. Do you know that room well?—Quite well, and he made no complaint.

9285. I was going to ask you that. Did he make any complaint when you saw him in the large room of his being there?—None at all; in fact it rather interested him to study the cases of other persons.

9286. He made no complaint. Was there anything when you were there which would indicate that that room was not a fit and proper place for him to be in?—No, nothing at all.

9287. Just look at that photograph, if you know the room. (Handing photograph to the Witness.) Is that the room as you know it?—Yes.

9288. A suggestion has been made here by counsel that that is a dishonest photograph dressed up for the occasion.

Mr. Walter Stewart: What was said was that the people who occupied it, 14 in number, were not represented in the photograph. That was what was said by counsel.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: It is Question 9075 at page 36. "It is a dressed-up photograph, to show what a pretty place it is."

26 January, 1925.]

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

Mr. Walter Stewart: It was my friend who put it about the dishonesty. What I complained of was that it did not show the people who were in it.

Chairman: That is running away from the point. The answer made by Mr. H. was: "It is a dressed-up photograph to show what a pretty place it is. (Mr. Croom-Johnson: Is my friend suggesting that it is a dishonest photograph? (Mr. Walter Stewart: I do suggest that. (Mr. Croom-Johnson: I would rather like to have this matter made perfectly plain. (Witness: It is a dishonest photograph.")

Mr. Walter Stewart: But there was a reason given as to why it was suggested, namely, that the people were not shown in it.

Chairman: That may be.

9289. Mr. Croom-Johnson: Sir Maurice, is that a photograph of the room as you know it?—Yes, I have known it many years.

9290. And have you interviewed other patients in that room from time to time?—Yes.

9291. In your view was it a proper thing to put Mr. H. in that room?—Yes, I think it was the kindest thing. He was allowed much more freedom there. Otherwise it would mean that he would have to sit in a room with a male nurse; whereas in that room he could wander about. It was a much larger room and he had much more freedom.

9293. Chairman: But another point which is important is that Mr. H. says that the persons who were with him in that room were unpleasant. "I had a number of very objectionable people with me. They were incontinent; they were noisy; they were bad cases—all of them. They had to be under the strictest supervision; there were two warders always in the room with them; and they were the most objectionable neighbours to any one with any sense of decency." I can quite imagine that if the people were of that description, it would be very unpleasant for Mr. H. to find himself in a room, however well furnished and however pleasant the room might be, if the occupants of the room were disagreeable persons?—I have never seen a noisy person or a person of that type in that room; he would not be there in that case. A person of that type would be in his own room entirely.

9294. We can only ask you for your own observation. You visited this gentleman on several occasions. On the occasions when you were there, were there persons of a noisy, incontinent and objectionable type in the room with him?—I have never noticed in that room any objectionable smell at any time.

9295. Mr. Croom-Johnson: Or objectionable people?—No; in fact I have known patients a good deal more normal than Mr. H. was at that time.

9296. In that room?—Yes, in that room; sitting drawing and doing things, amusing themselves.

Chairman: The real question is just this: Whether when brought back after his escape he was put into a place where he had to associate with disagreeable and nasty people, which might be regarded by him as a form of punishment upon him for having tried to run away.

9297. Mr. Croom-Johnson: Did you observe anything of that kind?—Nothing at all.

9298. Did he make any complaint of anything of that sort?—Never. He regarded it in an amused way, as he did everything. He knew me fairly well; I had looked after him for a long time; he had never kept anything from me that I was aware of. He was always very friendly. If he ever had difficulties he would always write or tell me about them, and I would certainly have seen that it was put right.

Chairman: Have you got all the material you want, Mr. Stewart? Have you got a copy of the notes?

Mr. Walter Stewart: I have not the letter of the 17th February, 1918, yet, Sir.

Chairman: I want to see, first of all, that Mr. Stewart has the proper materials to put his questions upon. Have you got a copy of the witness's notes?

Mr. Walter Stewart: Oh dear no, Sir. I had no idea of all this notetaking.

Mr. H. C. Dickens: You can have all my letters.

9299. Earl Russell: Just before we leave the subject of this room I want you to direct your mind to this. Mr. H.'s escape was made by night from his bedroom. During the time he was occupying this room, he was allowed to occupy that bedroom at night from which he had escaped; so we would rather like to know whether this room was not in fact rather a punishment than a protection against escape?—Moorcroft, you know, is one of the most open of all these mental hospitals; the doors are not locked, I mean. There is an obligation upon them to see that a person does not keep repeating these things, and they are responsible to the friends. If a person does it by night it does not mean that he will not do it by day.

9300. Still he continued to occupy the room from which he had escaped. The two things are not quite consistent?—I see your point. He was not placed in a dormitory, you see.

Earl Russell: I daresay we shall hear about it from Moorcroft.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: We might as well tell the Commission that the evidence that will be given will be that after the escape he had a man with him at night, which he had not before.

Chairman: Now, first of all, there are the notes which Sir Maurice Craig made of Mr. H.'s case. Unfortunately the copies of them seem to be very few, I have one here; perhaps Mr. Stewart will use my copy.

Mr. Walter Stewart: As this is the first opportunity I have had of seeing these notes, perhaps I might postpone any cross-examination arising directly upon them to a more suitable occasion.

Chairman: Mr. Dickens made exactly the same complaint, that you had not formulated your charges against the doctors, and he was in a difficulty in cross-examining. However, he put his questions that day and allowed us to get on. I think you can quite well put your questions to Sir Maurice upon the material you have, and I am very anxious that you shall have everything.

Mr. Walter Stewart: All I desire to say with regard to Mr. H.'s evidence is that his précis had been circulated to every member of the Commission many days before he gave his evidence, and copies had somehow or other got into the hands of the other side, if I may so express it; so that it is not quite a parallel position.

Chairman: Perhaps it is not. If I have done you an injustice I am very sorry, but I want you to have just now all the material you ought to have. If you have any difficulty in getting any paper, please let me know, and I shall see you have it.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am greatly obliged, Sir.

Mr. H. C. Dickens: I think Sir David Drummond wanted to see the handwriting of Mr. H. There were two original letters I handed in addressed to Dr. Cole. We have another one here addressed to Sir Maurice Craig in September, 1917. (Handing in the same.)

Witness: This was very much later—nearly nine months later. He sent me a postcard: "Dear Craig, —Will try and see you shortly. You were ill-advised to make a confidant of the late H. H. Newington. You must realise what professional jealousy is. Cole is also 'censored.' Kind regards, W. H. (Handing the same to Sir David Drummond.)

Mr. Walter Stewart: Before I begin my cross-examination, Sir, I would desire to call your attention to the terms of Section 28 with regard to certification: "Every medical certificate under this Act shall be made and signed by a medical practitioner. (2) Every medical certificate upon which a reception order is founded shall state the facts upon which the certifying medical practitioner has formed his opinion that the alleged lunatic is a lunatic, distinguishing facts observed by himself from facts communicated by others; and a reception order shall not be made upon a certificate founded only upon facts communicated by others." So that it requires that the facts should be disclosed.

Chairman: I think that is clear, and the statutory form of the certificate shows that also. We quite have that point.

Mr. Walter Stewart: If you please, Sir.

Cross-examined by Mr. Walter Stewart.

9301. Sir Maurice Craig, I want to ask your opinion on this. I do not think you were present, were you, at the early sittings of this Commission?—No, I was, unfortunately, laid up.

9302. Do you agree with this view which was expressed by Sir Frederick Willis: that, after all, the real safeguard of the patient depends upon the appointment of upright and responsible men as heads of institutions?—Certainly.

9303. And do you agree that as far as possible there should be no conflicting interests between the duty which the upright and responsible person owes to his patient and his own interests with regard to money?—Certainly.

9304. You agree with that?—Yes.

9305. I thought you would. So that you would be prepared, I take it, to agree to one of our recommendations, at any rate, namely, that as far as certification is concerned the remuneration of no official functioning should be dependent upon the nature of the certificate?—I mean a person who at the present time may have or has any financial interest, if you use the word, is barred; no such person could certify.

9306. Does a doctor get the same fee, whether he certifies or whether he does not?—Certainly. You are asked your opinion.

9307. So that the certificate is paid for, in any event, at the same rate. Now I noticed that you laid stress on the fact that Mr. H. was what was termed unduly loquacious; that means that he talked a good deal and rather fast, and did not always confine his answer, when he was answering a question which was susceptible to a plain Yes or No, to Yes or No?—I would not like to say that at all. When you speak of a person in his state you must remember he was wandering from subject to subject, as you may note in his letters; they are not altogether in sequence.

9308. It would not, in your view, necessarily be a sign of mental derangement if a person who was asked a question, which was susceptible to the plain answer of Yes or No, answers at some greater length?—Certainly not.

9309. But may I ask you, if I put a question to you which is susceptible to the plain answer Yes or No, that you would answer it by saying Yes or No?—Certainly. I am the person of unsound mind!

9310. I ask you to do that if you would kindly, just to shorten the proceedings?—Certainly.

9311. Are you acquainted with the institution known as the Medical Research Committee of the National Health Insurance?—Yes.

9312. I am going to invite your opinion on something that appears in their publication dated 1918, and reprinted in 1921 with regard to this Wassermann test. You have said already to the members of the Commission that it is contrary to the medical practice to make more than one test. Now just listen to this, which is at page 5 of the Report in question: "Quantitative investigations of this kind have already been undertaken in the Local Government Board laboratory under the general direction of Lieut.-Colonel Harrison, but it can hardly be hoped that these will bear fruit before the end of several months. The Medical Officer of the Local Government Board has kindly undertaken to communicate to the Committee the results of this work as it proceeds, and if necessary it will be supplemented by additional work undertaken elsewhere on behalf of the Medical Research Committee. Therefore, while convinced that the Wassermann test when properly performed affords most reliable information, the Committee are of opinion that, for the protection of the individual, in all cases, where the only evidence of syphilis is a positive Wassermann reaction, the serum should be retested before a diagnosis of syphilis is based on this sign alone." What do you say to that? Do you agree with it?—It was done twice in this case.

9313. I ask you do you agree with that?—I should say it is very proper. It was done twice in this case. They are only referring to blood here. The blood was tested, and subsequently the cerebro-spinal fluid.

9314. Listen. "The serum should be retested." Was the serum retested in this case? You can answer that, Yes or No.—You want the truth?

9315. I want you to say whether it was retested.—I am going to give you the whole truth, and that is that the cerebro-spinal is an infinitely finer test than the serum.

9316. I ask you was the serum retested?—The serum was tested once, as far as I know.

9317. Then we will pass on. What was recommended here in this case was not done?—Something more important was done.

9318. Listen to this: "In the present state of our knowledge the Wassermann reaction is an empirical one. There is every reason for hoping that it may eventually be brought within the domain of exact physical chemistry and reduced to a simple chemical test. But it is the opinion of the Sub-Committee that, until this is so, the original Wassermann test, with its full controls, is the best adapted for general use, though it may be supplemented, for the control of treatment, by more sensitive short-cuts, that is, by those admittedly likely to yield a larger percentage of positive reaction. The Committee would go further and recommend that in tests made for official returns only those methods shall be accepted which conform with the original Wassermann test as defined below, and that the so-called 'short-cut' methods are only to be accepted by way of voluntary supplement to the official tests." Do you agree with that?—The test that we went upon was not the Wassermann pure and simple; it was the cell content in the cerebro-spinal fluid, which is a very different thing, very much more important and more conclusive.

9319. Will you now answer my question? Do you agree with what I have just read?—This is technical. I am afraid I am not a bacteriologist.

9320. Would you rather express no opinion?—I am not a bacteriologist.

9321. At any rate, as to practice I will ask you this question, founded again upon this document: "The responsibility attaching to any imperfection or slovenliness of technique is so great, and the results of a false diagnosis may bear so heavily upon a patient and his family, that the Committee believe that the whole weight of responsibility for the reports made should be borne by a fully-qualified pathologist."—They were in this case.

9322. You have told us there was no retest.—Here we fulfilled what they ask, that is, it was done by a bacteriologist. It was not done by me or by any general practitioner; it was done by a bacteriologist of known repute.

9323. "The report of a pathologist that a given blood-serum has shown a positive or a negative Wassermann test has a greatly diminished value for statistical purposes, unless the report is coupled with a statement of the particular method employed."—It is in this case.

9324. Very well. "It is well known that no statement of this kind is commonly provided." Show me in connection with Adler's test, what was the method employed?—Hecht's modification of the Wassermann blood. That was on the blood side. There were two tests made at the same time, one of the blood and the other of the cerebro-spinal fluid. It was the cerebro-spinal fluid that carried weight with us and not the blood. All that you have been reading there has relationship to blood, and to blood only.

9325. You do not appreciate—it may be my fault—what is the purport of my question. The question is: Does that show what the technical method of the test was?—Yes, Hecht's modification. He tells us here.

9326. Now I understand you have committed yourself to the view that once syphilitic always syphilitic?—You mean as far as the test is concerned?

9327. No—as far as the patient is concerned?—I have not committed myself to any such thing. A person can be cured of syphilis.

9328. Very well. So that a person might on one occasion, according to you, as I understand, show a positive reaction and on a subsequent occasion a negative reaction?—That is true.

9329. Owing to what?—Owing to the change in the toxin.

9330. Due to treatment do you mean?—It is generally due to treatment but over an extended time; that is, a person without treatment can become negative over a length of years; that means that the blood cells can themselves correct the poison. It is the tissue cells that really do the destruction of the poison in the end, and all these other things are only to assist the tissue cells to eliminate the poison.

9331. Does that mean that in your view this very unpleasant disease may run its course and the patient become free from it?—Yes.

9332. I am glad to hear you say that. You do not suggest that you know of your own knowledge that Mr. H. ever underwent any treatment after Adler's certificate, do you?—I say that I prescribed it.

9333. Have you got a copy of the prescription?—I did not write it. I only spoke to Dr. Dempster.

9334. But he left Dr. Dempster immediately, did he not?—No, he did not.

9335. Within a very short time?—Within five weeks.

9336. And Dr. Dempster is dead. You know Mr. H. has sworn that he never in his life was subjected to mercurial treatment or to any treatment for syphilis?—Yes.

Mr. H. C. Dickens: He said it was given to him and he put it on the fire?

9337. Mr. Walter Stewart: Yes, sent to him. (To the Witness): But if he was with Dr. Dempster there would be no occasion, would there, to send it?—Dr. Dempster would get it from the chemist.

9338. Now let us come back to this gentleman who was the distinguished medical gentleman, as we have agreed to call him—Adler?—He was a known pathologist.

9339. Was he a friend of yours?—No.

9340. One of the unpleasant things that Mr. H. has said with regard to some of you gentlemen—you know the expression he used—we will call it a coterie for the purposes of this case.

Chairman: Do not flinch from it. Call it a gang.

9341. Mr. Walter Stewart: That is what he called it. (To the Witness): Were you on the mere relationship of a medical man working in conjunction with somebody whose name you knew as a bacteriologist?—Dr. Adler was very little known to me; he had never had a meal in my house, or anything of the kind; I did not know his relations. I do not know what further I can tell you to show that I had no intimate relationship to him.

9342. Were you collecting the 15 guineas on his behalf?—I was responsible for it.

9343. I am asking you whether you were collecting the 15 guineas?—Dr. Adler died. He got pneumonia very shortly after doing this. Dr. Adler, I understand, had six sisters who were dependent upon him, and when I called in Dr. Adler I was responsible for the fees, and therefore I should see that the money was sent to the sisters; indeed Mr. H. knew about the death of Adler, and he knew about the sisters.

9344. From you?—From me, I suppose, yes.

9345. Did you write to him saying that Adler was an old friend of yours?—No. I do not think so. I cannot imagine I did.

9346. Let us just see. 30th November, 1916: "Dear Mr. H., I herewith enclose memo. of fees." Was he dead or alive then?—I am afraid I cannot tell you that.

Mr. Walter Stewart: "I herewith enclose memorandum of fees as you ask. I am also sending you the memorandum of Dr. Adler's fees for going to Croydon and testing the blood and spinal fluid. You will be sorry that he has died after a few days' illness. It is all too sad, as he had six sisters, who lived with him and were dependent upon him. I will get a receipt from his executors and send it to you. The weather is very cold, so be careful. With kindest regards"—and so on.

Earl Russell: Where is there anything about an intimate friend in that?

Chairman: Do you think that helps us in the least in our inquiry, Mr. Stewart?

Mr. Walter Stewart: That is not the only answer.

Chairman: One knows that when your private practitioner calls in a consultant, you pay the fee in that case. There are some very important matters, Mr. Stewart, which I think you ought to attend to.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I only want to see what was the relationship between Dr. Adler and the witness.

Chairman: We are not impressed with the expression "the gang."

Witness: I have the answer here; it is dated the 1st December, 1916.

Chairman: Please remember, Mr. Stewart, that all this has to be recorded at the public expense, and we must really keep a check upon our notes.

9347. Mr. Walter Stewart: Certainly, Sir. I am passing from it at once. I only wanted to see what Dr. Adler's position was. (To the Witness): Now that being so, you have told us that you indicated. I gather, to Mr. H. with what object this test was being taken. Is that so?—Not necessarily at all.

9348. Did you tell him or not?—I do not remember that I did; I could not say, it is so long ago.

9349. On the contrary, did you not indicate to him that it was a matter connected with curative treatment?—No; certainly I did not do that. I may have said that I wanted his blood examined because there were certain symptoms I should like cleared up.

9350. At any rate you never thought it necessary to tell him why?—If there is any reference to curative treatment it would be in this way, that the curative treatment would be dependent upon what I discovered. It is conceivable that I put it in this way, but it would not be put as the primary reason for the investigation. Treatment would be the proper proceeding after any discoveries were made.

9351. Then from first to last did you ever indicate to Mr. H. what was the object with which he was asked to submit to this test?—I have no record of what I said.

9352. Have you no recollection of it?—It is eight years ago. I should not like to say what I said at that time. I certainly would not tell him a lie.

9353. You would not be a party, I mean, at all to any practice of deception upon any patient of yours?—Not knowingly.

9354. Who sent Dr. Porter Phillips down?—Dr. Porter Phillips would be asked to go down—

9355. By whom?—It might be by myself or by Dr. Dempster.

9356. I put it to you it was by you, and also Dr. Percy Smith?—Very well.

9357. Tell me this: On whose behalf were you acting?—I had been acting for the relations of Mr. H. I was acting for Mr. H. himself. You must remember that Mr. H. had been coming up voluntarily, willingly, at his own request, to see me, for over 12 months.

26 January, 1925.]

SIR MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

9358. On whose behalf were you acting when you sent down Dr. Percy Smith and Dr. Porter Phillips?—I should be acting then probably on the brothers' behalf.

9359. Did you ever tell your patient, Mr. H., that?—That I was acting on his behalf?

9360. Why do you repeat the question unless it is inaudible? Did you ever tell Mr. H. at this critical period that you were acting on behalf of his brother?

—No, I was not acting on his behalf in that sense. As you know, I have already read out that I told Mr. H. very definitely why he was having a further consultant called in.

9361. Now, will you answer my question: Did you ever tell him you were acting on behalf of his brother?—I was not acting on behalf of his brother. I was acting on my own behalf, as a medical man, to do my best by him.

9362. You have told the Commission that you were acting on behalf of Mr. H.'s brother. I ask you as a further question whether you ever told him that?—You take part of an answer, take it out of its context, and turn it round. You asked me on whose behalf I was acting. I told you I was acting on the patient's behalf and on the patient's brother's behalf.

9363. What you told me a moment ago was that you were acting on behalf of the brother?—And the patient.

9364. I know you were. Did you ever tell the patient that you were acting on behalf of his brother? Did you ever tell him that?—That was general knowledge. I do not think I ever should have told him.

9365. Do you mean to say it was within the knowledge of Mr. W. H. that you were acting on behalf of his brother, who was the petitioner?—That all depends upon the sense in which you are using the word "behalf." W. H. knew that I was seeing his brother.

9366. I daresay he did. But what you have not answered yet is: Did you ever tell Mr. H. that you were acting on behalf of Mr. H.'s brother, who was the petitioner?—Do you mean individually, and for nobody else? I never was acting on the brother's behalf.

Chairman: Please wait a moment. Is this of any value to you? A doctor does not act on written instructions as a solicitor acts for a particular client. A doctor who has a patient in a difficult situation is acting in the interests of all concerned. He is called in on behalf of the family. It is of no assistance to us.

Mr. Walter Stewart: With respect, Sir, what I want to show is that in these cases the system permits the medical man to act in an inconsistent capacity, to hunt with the hare and run with the hounds. This witness has just said that he was acting on behalf of Mr. H., who was his patient, and on behalf of the petitioner, and I want to show you that so long as that is clear, the importance of it is for you to determine. We think that is not right.

Witness: You are referring to some system. I do not know what system you are referring to.

9368. When did you begin to act for the petitioner H.?—I never did begin to act for the petitioner.

9369. From what point did you begin to take instructions from him?—When a person is placed under care, then his liberty is transferred to his brother. That is what the legal documents mean. You are transferring the liberty of the subject to some other person, usually a relation. From that time on I deal with the relation only.

9370. Was that the reason why you were so anxious to get that cheque for £90 odd, which was given by Mr. H. a day or two before he was taken away to Moorcroft?—Let me explain that. I quite appreciate the inference.

9371. Mr. Dickens: It is a very offensive inference?—It is a principle that I myself have always strongly held, that one should not be having monetary relationship with a person who is of doubtful sanity. Now in this case Dr. Stoddart saw Mr. W. H. on a certain date.

9372. Mr. Walter Stewart: 20th November?—Yes; and I sent Dr. Stoddart's account to his brother. His brother sends on the account, Dr. Stoddart's account, to W. H. himself, and W. H. pays that account; and he had been pressing me for some weeks before to let him have my account.

9373. You know he says you pressed him?—Let me tell the story, anyway.

9375. Do you regard that as a simple and straightforward answer to my question?—Absolutely. I think it is borne out by the correspondence.

9376. You thought Mr. H. was unduly loquacious, you told us. Was he, or was he not, in your view, of unsound mind on the 20th November, 1916, when Dr. Stoddart gave that certificate?—Yes.

9377. And after that you asked him for a cheque and got it?—Yes.

9378. Did you do anything else after that with regard to his will?—A good deal had happened before that. With regard to his will, he told me all about his will.

9379. Were you one of the legatees?—I was just going to tell you about that. He talked to me about the will, and he said, "I propose to put you in this for a sum of money." I said to him: "Now you are placing me in a very serious position. I can only ask you not to do this. Remember I am in a fiduciary position." We never let him do it; at any rate while he was under my care the will was never made, and I besought him not to.

9380. He says he told you, "I will put you down for £3,000"?—He told me he had put me down for £1,000.

9381. He told you that?—Yes.

9382. When did he tell you that?—I could not tell you the date. He did not tell me he had put me down; he told me he was going to, and I besought him not to.

9383. And up to what time was this will the subject of his solicitude?—I could not remember. As I have already read out, Dr. Dempster had asked him not to make this will. He told me that himself. I urged him not to make the will, and as a matter of fact as long as he was under my care he did not make the will. Mr. W. H. will remember that I told him that while I was in the fiduciary position in which

I was, I must beseech him not to do anything of that kind.

9384. Was not the will actually the subject of further consideration when he was afterwards at Moorcroft?—Never, as far as I was concerned; in fact I did not know about that until I saw it the other day. I never knew it was ever made.

Earl Russell: Which is the answer in which Mr. H. said that Sir Maurice Craig was pressing him to pay his fees?

Mr. Walter Stewart: It is quite at the end, in the re-examination.

Witness: You know there is a letter here in which he said: "Many thanks for your skilful attention." I mean he himself wrote to me in that way.

Mr. Dickens: "The cheque for 90 guineas I was asked for several days before my incarceration, and it evidently showed a guilty knowledge on the part of the person who asked for it."

Chairman: That is Question 9085.

Mr. Dickens: He deliberately says he does not mention names.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Here it is in writing, 30th November, 1916: "Dear Mr. H.,—I herewith enclose memo. of fees."

Witness: Yes.

9385. Was that the memo. in return for which a cheque for £90 odd was sent?—Yes.

9386. Then you did ask for it in writing.

Earl Russell: That is not pressing him for it.

Chairman: Why use epithets of that sort, which convey an impression?

Witness: He asked for it himself. I never asked for it; he asked me to let him have it. You must remember I could not go on refusing.

Mr. Walter Stewart: At any rate there is the letter, which I put in.

Earl Russell: That is all very well, but nobody regards his tailor as pressing for his account, simply because he sends it in once a quarter.

Chairman: We are really all concerned in some very important matters here, and one of them is the important question of the diagnosis of your client's case. We really are not getting on.

Mr. Walter Stewart: The way I put it is this, Sir, that it shows that the witness did not believe him to be insane.

Witness: I have given my reasons. If you do not accept them I can only state them as they are.

9387. Do you mean you would send in an account for a sum of fees to a man whom you knew to be insane?—No; I should never have sent them in.

9388. But you got your 90 guineas for this, and subsequently you got 100 guineas from the brothers for what you did for them?—It was for subsequent work, you must remember.

Chairman: I am not going to have this gone into. We are not in the least concerned with this part of the case, whether he received 500 guineas or 100 guineas.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I put it as a faithful discharge of duty, and I want to show how Moorcroft was conducted. Mr. H. has said that these people worked together, and I am in a position to prove that, if I am allowed to.

Chairman: I am quite aware of the fact that a number of medical men called in to a case work together, as you choose to put it. They profess to be acting in the interest of the patient. We are also aware that medical men are remunerated for their services. Beyond that I do not think this evidence is assisting us at all. What I want to point out is that there really is an important matter in your own interest which one is very anxious to get on to, namely, whether there was any necessity here for an urgency order, and also whether the diagnosis of this gentleman's case was carried out with sufficient care. Your questions about the Wassermann test seem to be of importance. This question of investigating the remuneration that Sir Maurice Craig received is rather personally offensive.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am putting it to show that there was no need of an urgency order. If there had been, surely an honourable gentleman would not have been sending in an account and taking a cheque. That is what it is directed to, if anything at all. I submit that as cross-examination on that point it is relevant. Surely, with respect to any ruling of yours, Sir, is not that so? Are we not entitled to see how the witness treated him?

Chairman: I think you bring out the point quite well without any heat. You say that a certain cheque was drawn by Mr. H., which was offered in payment of a certain debt, before which date an urgency certificate had been written by Dr. Stoddart. You have your whole facts there. You know them; I know them. It does not advance it very much to press it any further. I mean I see the point. I generally see points, I hope.

Mr. Walter Stewart: As long as it is clear to the Commission.

Witness: I may say I see the point, and I fully appreciate it.

Chairman: Please let us get on.

9389. Mr. Walter Stewart (to the Witness): Now that you do see the point, do not you agree that it is undesirable that that financial interest should be existing between the person sought to be certified and the medical man who is taking steps to get him certified? Do not you agree now that that is undesirable?—It is very difficult if medical men are to do certain things. Medical persons are paid for their opinion on certain things; and what you are putting here is not fees for certification, but for certain work done, and it is very difficult, of course; it cuts both ways. That is, if you say to a person that they are to be treated for charity, and no medical man is to charge a fee for doing certain things, he places an obligation upon the patient or the patient's friends which might be very unpleasant, if such were done.

9391. Do you think as a matter of principle it would be better that when the stage of certification comes on?—The certification should be made by the relations, I quite agree.

9392. And should be conducted by some person other than the regular medical attendant?—The law is very particular on that, that he should participate, because I take it the legislature considered that the medical attendant who knew the patient well, was the person who was more likely to protect that patient than a person who might be called in for some other specific purpose.

9393. There is this difficulty also: somebody must take the initiative. Let us assume the case of a patient who is really suffering pretty acutely; someone always has to take the initiative.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Mr. H.'s brother had already taken that.

Chairman: Someone has to take the initiative, and if the patient himself is disabled from taking the initiative, as he frequently is, it is very difficult to get some means whereby there is adequate protection for that patient. Take the case where there are relatives who might have an interest, for example, to have a patient put away. We are really touching the heart of the question here. We are very concerned to see that a person should not be detained in any circumstances of suspicion, and how one can get a solution for the difficulty, because someone must take the initiative. Suppose my brother becomes insane, I take the initiative. The retort is: "You are interested in getting him into an asylum." If I take no action who is to take action?

26 January, 1925.]

SIR MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

Witness: Of course, that question does constantly arise. It may seriously arise in the event, for instance, of a son who is going to look after his father, in which case, if the father recovered after certification, he might disinherit his son; and indeed it has happened, because of the action the son took at that time. Therefore I have known sons say to me: "I am not going to do it." I appreciate the difficulty.

9394. How is one to get the initiative taken in the matter?—Certification has nothing to do with medicine, I may say. It is an embarrassment, as it is in this case, of the relationship of patient to physician. Therefore it is never sought so far as the medical people are concerned. It is an obligation placed upon the medical persons by the State, that they are to do certain things under certain conditions. If they do not do it, they may be brought up for not doing it.

9395. But I am on the question of initiative?—I am only saying that medical people get more and more shy of doing it, because it is a legal obligation placed upon them, and they say: "We do not understand it; therefore we will go on with medicine; but we do not understand the legal requirements." It comes in seriously here, because it shows to the Commission the difficulties the medical profession is constantly in.

9397. But the question is about getting an independent medical opinion upon the case?—Here you have four or five independent opinions in this case.

9398. But it is suggested that it was not independent, because first of all you were called in by Mr. H., and then the relatives ultimately employed you, and then that you suggested Dr. Percy Smith?—But these are all recognised men. I mean if it is suggested that the medical profession is such an unworthy profession that even when you get into the upper layers of it, so to speak, the men are not to be trusted and are not honourable men, I do not think you will ever get a solution of anything.

Chairman: I am afraid that is the suggestion that was made to us.

9399. Earl Russell: Your trouble is that apart from Section 315 you could not continue to treat this patient?—I was not allowed to.

9400. Apart from that he would not be treated?—He himself said, "I am going to leave."

9401. A voluntary system would not have helped you here?—No.

Chairman: I am sorry to have interrupted your cross-examination, Mr. Stewart.

9402. Mr. Walter Stewart: I want to get this case of ours admitted, and the witness has admitted one of the chief points in it. Let us follow that up. (To the Witness:) Do not you see that in the peculiar position in which things are, the patient is not always in a position properly to look after his own interest?—Yes.

9403. Supposing in relation to such a crucial question for him as certification or non-certification, he was not himself in a condition to look after himself, would not you welcome the intervention of an upright independent authorised agent to act on his behalf with you?—Where are you going to get such a person?

Chairman: There is a difficulty there, Mr. Stewart. What sort of agent do you mean?

Witness: I have no feelings on this matter. Anything that helps you, you must remember, helps the medical profession.

9404. Mr. Walter Stewart: Let us go by steps. If I could get him, would you welcome the intervention of such an agent?—I should welcome anything which made the position easy both for the patient and the medical profession.

9405. Whether that authorised agent were a lawyer or layman, if he were honest?—I should like to hand over the whole thing to the lawyers.

9406. So that you would not be opposed to the patient being represented by an authorised agent at the moment of certification?—Personally, certainly not.

9407. Be it so?—But you must remember the financial position. You know the difficulty.

9408. I am not suggesting that the doctor would have to pay—the patient would have to pay?—You must remember that I, as a physician, look to the patient's interest much more than at the moment you think I do. I am only saying that the more payments you have to make, the more difficult it is for the patient.

9409. It is provided for in the case of paupers who commit crimes. Do you think it would be equitable that it should be provided in the case of non-criminal people who are in this dreadful position?—I am only saying that the more publicity you give, the more evasion of the law you will get.

9410. Supposing it were at the option of the patient or his representatives that this interview on the occasion of certification should be a public or a private one, there would be no difficulty there, would there?—Very great difficulties in some cases. I mean the places where they used to hold public inquiries were much complained about, because it was complained that they were treating a person as if he were a criminal.

9411. If there were an option on the part of an authorised agent that it should be public or private, it rests with him; there would be no objection on that ground, would there?—No. The difficulty would be who is going to exercise the option?

Mr. Walter Stewart: That is all provided for in our case.

Mr. Dickens: I put Sir Maurice Craig into the box, not to give his views upon the administration of the Lunacy Acts, but to answer the charges made against him.

Chairman: I believe Sir Maurice is going to give evidence on general questions later. It is quite true, Mr. Stewart, that you are really dealing with general questions of principle, and not with Mr. H.'s case at all at the present moment.

Mr. Walter Stewart: That is what I thought I was invited to do. This is the first opportunity we have had to put our general case to any medical man.

Chairman: You are going to have your general case put to us by Mr. Parker. In the meantime this witness is dealing with Mr. H.'s case. There are limits, you know.

26 January, 1925.]

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I thought it was on principle that you asked me to cross-examine Sir Maurice?

Chairman: I asked you to cross-examine him upon whether it was necessary that an urgency order should be made in his case, and whether there were sufficient precautions taken in his case under the existing system. I think it would be a good time now to adjourn for lunch.

Mr. Walter Stewart: If you please, Sir.

(After a short adjournment.)

Mr. Walter Stewart: Mr. Steele is now here, Sir, if you desire to see him.

Chairman: There are just one or two questions which Lord Russell wanted to ask him. We will finish with Sir Maurice first.

Mr. Walter Stewart: May I take your ruling, Sir, before I put any further questions? Am I in order here before this Commission to put to this witness or to any expert, what his view is with regard to the proposals that we ask you to adopt for the reform of the administration of the Lunacy Laws?

Chairman: No; that is not our contemplation in dealing with these particular cases.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Very well, Sir; if I may not I may not.

Chairman: We hope to have that matter explained to us very fully by Mr. Parker.

Mr. Walter Stewart: One of the most effective ways of establishing a case is to get the other side to admit it.

Chairman: I quite appreciate that, but what we propose to do is this: We are going to have evidence possibly from Sir Maurice Craig and other witnesses later on. Before that evidence is received, we shall have had Mr. Parker's points, and I propose myself to put those points to a number of those gentlemen in order to see what their view upon them is. I must maintain the control of these proceedings in my own hands.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I quite appreciate that, Sir, but if at that time any particular points have not been put fully before you, would you allow me on just those points to supplement questions which are put? This is our child, and we want to see that at any rate it is led out into the daylight.

Chairman: I think in the previous part of the proceedings you frequently favoured me with suggestions, and I adopted quite a number of them.

Mr. Walter Stewart: You did, Sir. 60 admissions were obtained.

Chairman: The course which I propose to take of examining certain gentlemen later on will take this form: I shall then have been apprised by Mr. Parker of the points to which you attach special importance. Then in conformity with the usual practice of Commissions such as this, I shall have an opportunity of putting those points to the witnesses who come afterwards, and see how they look in their hands.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I must not put them this afternoon?

Chairman: No, if you please.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am always anxious to avoid any insubordination. What I wish to do is to ask this gentleman questions with regard to the actual circumstances surrounding the certification and conveyance to and detention at Moorcroft.

Chairman: I do not think this gentleman had much to do with the actual conveyance or detention. He was a party to the earlier history of the patient, and he took part also in the preliminaries of the certification.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I assure you it went a great deal further than that, Sir, if my information is correct.

Chairman: Just go ahead with your questions, and we will see if any point arises.

9412. Mr. Walter Stewart: If you please. (To the Witness): You were not the certifying physician in this case?—No.

9413. Do you, as a consultant, in these circumstances ever certify at all?—Yes.

9414. In about how many cases in a year?—I am not a great certifying person. I do not know that I certify perhaps more than 12 or 14.

9415. You very often put the matter in the hands of some other qualified person?—No.

9416. But you do sometimes. Both the certifying doctors were introduced by you in this case?—Yes.

9417. You do not suggest that any of them told the patient what they were there for?—These gentlemen are of the same standing as myself.

9418. Eminent, we will agree, but did they, whether eminent or otherwise, ever let him know what they were there for.

Mr. Dickens: They are going to be called.

9419. Mr. Walter Stewart: You did not let him know what they were coming for?—Certainly.

9420. That they were coming to certify?—A question had arisen (I distinctly said so in my notes) whether his mental state was such that he should retain his liberty. There is correspondence with Mr. H. himself on that matter, in which he agrees.

9421. We know what the letters say, but we have to see what happened. You sent Dr. Porter Phillips down, did you not?—Yes; that is the last doctor.

9422. I am dealing with him at the moment. Was it on instruction by you that he was sent to represent, if he was told to represent, to Mr. H. that Mr. H. was to go and stay with him at his (Dr. Phillips') place?—All Dr. Phillips would be asked to do would be to see Mr. H. and enquire into his mental condition, and to see whether he was a fit person to retain his liberty, or whether anything else should be done.

9423. I may take it that you did not suggest to Dr. Porter Phillips that he should get Mr. H. away from Croydon by a suggestion to him that Mr. H. was to stay with the doctor?—Certainly I never made any such suggestion.

9424. Mr. H. said that he was led to understand that he was going to a doctor's house, but that Moorcroft was never mentioned.—The suggestion is quite untrue, as far as I am concerned.

9425. As far as you know.—As far as the statement by me. You asked me whether I made the statement.

9426. I asked if you knew of it.—I know nothing of it.

9427. I did not venture at that stage to say that you said it. Tell me this: Had Mr. H. all along regarded you as a personal friend?—Mr. H. was a very delightful patient, a very nice man, and I had a regard for him, as I have to-day.

9428. And you were always very nice to him?—I tried to be, the same to him as I should be to anybody.

9429. You do not suggest, do you, that you ever told Mr. H. that he was suspect of such a disease as syphilis?—I should never inform a patient of a doubt I had in my mind; I should never do it.

9430. Let us test it. If you were consulted by a person as a patient, would you not tell him if in fact you discovered that he was suffering from such a thing?—It might be necessary.

9431. In order that he might know where he stood?—Quite.

9432. You never told him that. Was it not your duty to tell him, in your conception of your duty as a medical man of standing, acting on behalf of the patient?—He was not opposing, as far as I know, being treated in any way. You see the point here is a very subtle one. Here is a gentleman disturbed in mind already. I had got a history of him, in which he said he was full of fear. I had a history which showed that he was afraid of disease as you know, at the very earliest date. Now for me to convey something to him that was not quite necessary, or may not have been necessary—

26 January, 1925.]

SIR MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

9433. Do you tell the members of this Commission that where a doctor finds that a patient of his gives definite signs of being a sufferer from such a disease as that, it is not the doctor's duty to tell him?—All the circumstances must be taken into account.

Chairman: You will certainly not convince the Commission of that duty.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I do not know what the Commission's view would be.

Chairman: Let us put this point for a moment: supposing an unhappy patient has indications of cancer, and the patient is in a low state of health at the time. You surely do not suggest that the doctor's duty is to walk into the patient's bedroom and say, "I am very sorry, but I suspect you of having cancer; you are going to die shortly." He might say, "We have examined your case and have come to a certain conclusion, but we think that a change of air and new surroundings may help you to recover." But to tell a patient straight out that he has a very dangerous disease would surely have a most detrimental effect upon the patient.

Mr. Walter Stewart: With deep respect, Sir, the case you put is not analogous. Cancer is an incurable disease, but the witness has said that general paralysis is recoverable.

Witness: You are now taking it very much further. I said it is a condition which, up to a certain point, may be recoverable.

9434. Mr. Walter Stewart: In dealing with your question to me, Sir, you have included in that a number of terms which I do not suggest. For instance, "You are going to die shortly." What I am putting is a very definite point. (To the Witness): Is it or is it not in your view the duty of the medical man, if he diagnosed the disease of syphilis, to inform the patient?—It may be, in a primary condition, yes; because of course the man is then in an infective condition; he may injure others; but in the later stages, especially as I say this man had fears, you must remember that to tell a person he has got a disease is to increase his illness seriously, and unless there is going to be some benefit derived from the medical side, you would not tell him.

9435. Is it according to the ethics of your profession, as you understand them, to treat a man for syphilis without telling him that he is suffering from it?—I should say each case has to be taken on its merits.

9436. Mercury is a deleterious drug in some respects, is it not?—It all depends on how it is employed.

9437. Do you say it is a drug you would give if you could avoid giving it?—One would avoid all drugs if possible.

9438. Therefore it is to that extent deleterious. Is it not a drug which, administered over a long period of time, produces very undesirable consequences to the patient?—If improperly employed.

9439. Do you say that you prescribed mercury or iodide of potassium for this patient of yours, without telling him what the prescription was intended to effect?—I might or might not.

9440. Did you?—I do not recall that I did.

9441. You never told him that?—I have told you as far as I can tell you. I have no memory that I did tell him.

9442. Then we will accept his story on that point. That being so, of course he had no representative except you; you were his friend, upon whom he relied?—Dr. Dempster was a personal friend of several years' standing.

9443. His general practitioner?—But more than general practitioner.

9444. You have said to the learned Chairman already that the usual medical attendant should be one of the certifying doctors. Why was Dr. Dempster not in this case?—Because he was a personal friend.

9445. Does the Act, as far as you know, contain any exception in favour of personal friends?—Personal relationship of some time standing is an important point.

9446. Is not the relationship between the usual medical practitioner and the patient always a personal relation?—Not in the close relationship of Dr. Dempster and this gentleman.

9447. Do you mean that he was a beneficiary under the will of the gentleman?—No.

9448. What do you mean?—He and his wife used to go and stay together, and stay in each other's houses; they were personal friends. He was down there the first time I saw Mr. H. at Teignmouth. Dr. Dempster was not attending him then. Dr. Johnson was the doctor in charge at that time, but Dr. Dempster was there as a personal friend and representative of the family—as a friend.

9449. Dr. Dempster would know more about this gentleman, perhaps even than Dr. Percy Smith?—He would know it in a different way. Dr. Percy Smith would be of more value a good deal from an expert's standpoint, and I understand that is one of the points that you would like. There may be a good deal to be said for it. That is, that persons who understand about mental disorders should always be the persons who certify, and not the general practitioner. I have seen that put forward as an important point, and in this case it was done.

9450. On that day when he was certified, did Mr. H. speak at any greater length in answer to questions that were put to him than you are doing now.

Chairman: Mr. Stewart, would you kindly refrain from insinuations of that sort, or else I shall stop this cross-examination at once.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I cannot get a proper answer, Sir. If you protect me by asking the witness to answer my question, I will not make any observations.

Witness: I am doing my best. If you tell me I have not answered it or have misunderstood it, I will gladly do my best to answer it. You must remember that I am looking at this as a medical man, and you as a lawyer. We may have a different appreciation.

9451. I will put it to you. What was there about the relationship which existed between the usual medical attendant, Dr. Dempster, and Mr. H. that justified his not being made the certifying doctor, or one of them?—I think it is a question you ought to have asked Dr. Dempster. Unfortunately he is dead. I mean I cannot say. Dr. Dempster did not wish to certify. I only know that he preferred that. He was a close friend.

Mr. Walter Stewart: So I will not ask you why it is not on the certificate.

Earl Russell: He really has answered your question three times. We are not getting on at all.

9452. Mr. Walter Stewart: I am afraid it is my incapacity to follow the witness's answers. (To the Witness): Now with regard to whether he was in a fit state on the 16th December, did you go down to Moorcroft after they had got him there?—On which date is that?

9453. On the 16th, that is the day I come to?—I should not see him that day, no.

9454. On the 18th I think you went down?—You may have the dates; I know they have been supplied.

9455. You paid him no less than nine visits at Moorcroft, did you not?—I know they asked for those, and they would have them.

9456. You had more than one patient there; I think several patients at Moorcroft were patients of yours, were they not?—The patients are not mine when they have passed under the care of others.

9457. I mean patients whom you have recommended?—Yes.

9458. I suppose you visit them, too?—Not necessarily. I sometimes never see a patient again. Patients go to different institutions.

9459. How is that arranged? How is it arranged, how often a consultant of your eminence should, once a man is certified, continue to pay him visits?—That is entirely the desire of the relations on the one hand, or it may be, as in this case, the expression of a wish

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

from the patient himself. He wrote to me, asking me to come and see him.

9460. Is it ever anything to do with the expression of a wish of the consultant to the person who keeps the establishment?—No, never.

9461. That has nothing to do with it?—No, certainly not.

9462. I suppose in an establishment like Moorcroft they are supposed to have first class medical men attached to the institution?—Some institutions have and some have not.

9463. Were the charges 15 guineas a week, including medical attendance?—The superintendents are always medical men, of course.

9464. They are supposed to be efficient medical men, I suppose?—They have their own medical attendants attached to the institution.

9465. Do you suggest that on the occasion of these visits you were examining Mr. H. as his medical attendant?—I was doing my best to help.

9466. What I put to you is that you merely conversed with him in a casual sort of way for a few minutes?—If that is your outlook on professional business it is not mine. You make the suggestion.

9467. I am asking you if you did that?—No; I never do such things. I carry out my work, as I hope I have been able to show to the Commission by the records I have got. We were right in the middle of war time. We were working 15 or 16 hours a day. I do not think it shows great negligence.

9468. I was asking if you had any records covering this period of the nine visits to Moorcroft?—No, I have not.

9469. Then that rule was not applied to those visits when there were nine of them?—No; he was out of my immediate care.

9470. Why were you visiting him?—I was asked to; I was asked on one occasion. He had got this jaundice, and then he saw Sir William Hale White.

9471. But you are an alienist, are you not?—My special line is in functional nervous disorders.

9472. Not for such a complaint, simple as it may be, as jaundice?—That comes in medicine. I hope I am a physician before I specialise.

9473. I am sorry to have to go into it, but it has been challenged in the case put to you in examination in chief, about this large room, or whatever you agree to call it. There were 13 other patients in that room, were there not?—Not to my knowledge.

9474. You would not know them all personally I agree, but you would know some of them. Were any of your patients in that room?—I could not say; they may or may not have been. I do not know at what date, or at what time, you are alluding to when these 14 persons were there.

9475. At the date in February when he was recaptured, and put in that long room instead of being allowed to use his own private room for which he was paying?—That you must get from Dr. Stilwell, I am afraid I cannot answer it.

9476. If any of them happened to be patients of yours you would know it?—Yes, but when you say patients of mine do you mean patients I have seen? I have seen a very large number of people in 30 years. Do you call all these people patients of mine?

9477. How many of the patients who are now in Moorcroft have you recommended?—I could not answer that question; I have no knowledge.

9478. But you are constantly there?—No. I only go when I am asked.

9479. I am looking to the number of visits in this period?—At that time I was going down more frequently—not now.

9480. Of course you have no personal?—At that time I was consulting physician to Moorcroft.

9481. You were in a sense a relation of Dr. Stilwell?—Not a relation. I had known Dr. Stilwell originally when he was a house physician, when I was at Bethlem Hospital.

9482. Were you not connected at all?—I was going to tell you. That was the first I knew of Dr. Stilwell, and subsequently my brother, who lived with me, got to know Dr. Stilwell and got to know his family, and he ultimately married Dr. Stilwell's sister.

9483. So that it would be more natural that you would go there more frequently, perhaps?—No. At the time I recommended Mr. H. to go there, one of the reasons, amongst others, was that if he could get into Moorcroft they were much freer in their liberty, and also that I had certain influence owing to the fact that I was consulting physician there, and that I could get him certain amenities which would not be given in other places. For instance, to take his monkeys down might not have been allowed in other places.

9484. Not even at 15 guineas a week?—No.

9485. Not even in a private room?—No.

9486. You know he was to have a private room?—Yes.

9487. I notice that it is put in Dr. Stoddart's certificates as one of the grounds for finding him to be of unsound mind. Do you know, having known the gentleman long before he was certified, that for years he had always kept those sort of pets?—I know that for 18 months prior to his going there he had not done so.

Chairman: We attach no great importance to the fact of this gentleman having a penchant for monkeys any more than a penchant for parrots.

Mr. Stewart: If it is in the certificate, I want to show the stuff the certificates are made of.

Chairman: If you think it is important, go on.

9488. Mr. Stewart (to the Witness): Now with regard to the condition of this gentleman I am bound to ask you the question: Do you now say that Mr. H. is suffering from general paralysis of the insane or not?—I have not seen Mr. H. for many years; I could not answer that.

9489. It would be a very remarkable case, would it not, if after 10 years from the onset, assuming 1916 to be the date of the first onset of the symptom, he should still be in the condition of physical health that he now enjoys?—It would be very unusual, and I think Mr. H. can be happy in the belief that the medical opinion, or any expression of opinion, at that time that he was suffering from general paralysis was probably wrong.

9490. I am greatly obliged to you for saying that. Is not this at the bottom of it all, that that is the underlying circumstance in this case that really turned the balance against him?—No. The question of his mental disorder and the reason why his liberty was taken away from him have in fact nothing to do with the general paralysis.

9491. Do you mean that all the doctors would have certified him just the same if that had not been there?—Certainly.

9492. Then we shall be able to deal with the certificates on that basis?—That is the proper basis. The question of behaviour and conduct is the whole proposition.

9493. Very well; then I must deal with that and that alone. He wanted to go to Brighton, did he not?—He threatened to leave.

9494. Do you know that he had at that time a tenancy in a furnished flat which still had three months or thereabouts to run?—Yes.

9495. Is Brighton a place less salubrious than Croydon?—It may be much more salubrious.

9496. If he were well enough to be taken away to Moorcroft in a motor car at short notice, was not he well enough to go to his own flat at Brighton if he wanted to?—That was the whole problem. We considered that he was unfit to retain his liberty of movement.

9497. Because he wanted to go to Brighton, amongst other reasons?—No.

9498. Did you not say a moment ago that that was the whole trouble—his conduct; he would insist on going away?—Yes.

26 January, 1925.]

Sir MAURICE CRAIG, C.B.E., M.D.

9499. To Brighton. I put it to you therefore: What was the difference between his going on the 10th November to Moorcroft in a motor car with a small handbag to what would have happened if he had gone to Brighton, accompanied, of course, by someone?—That was the whole problem—that he refused to be accompanied.

9500. How do you know?—That was the whole problem. I think every witness will tell you that.

9501. Alone?—Alone. He would not stay with Dr. Dempster. He refused to have any supervision whatsoever, and we had to decide whether he was fit to go alone and live his life alone and under these conditions.

9502. Will you venture to swear that that gentleman ever said to you that he intended to live alone at Brighton?—I presume—

9503. Did he ever say it?—Will you let me finish? If you say alone, I presume he would have maids, in that sense; I did not presume he was going to lead a hermit's existence. He would not take a nurse with him, for instance.

9504. Up to this time Mr. H. had been allowed to enjoy his personal freedom, had he not?—Up to that time.

9505. And after he once succeeded in effecting his escape he enjoyed it without special detriment to himself?—He was very much better, you know; he was steadily getting better. Your inference is that he was the same when he left as when he went in.

9506. Does a general paralytic generally get better?—Even if he were a general paralytic he can have a full remission. I have known a man, a captain of a ship, who took his ship to Australia, and brought it back during a remission.

9507. Was he under any treatment as far as you know; as you put that case on me?—It is not only one case; there are plenty of them.

9508. You have put it upon me, but you know nothing about the circumstances of that case. You put it upon me as an anonymous case; I cannot test it?—It is very difficult to test it. I daresay you may get that case from Dr. Percy Smith as well; but every one of us knows cases where a man returns to his work and does his ordinary work after he has once been taken ill with general paralysis; that is a common experience; you will find that in any text-book.

Earl Russell: You cannot ask a witness: "Does a thing ever happen?" and when he tells you that it does, complain that it is an anonymous case.

Mr. Walter Stewart: It is very rare.

Witness: No, it is very common; you will find it in every text-book.

9509. I have got one or two of them, but I am keeping them for their authors. What is your text-book?—I have written a book on psychological medicine.

9510. It does not include general paralysis of the insane?—Yes.

9511. What is the title of it?—"Psychological Medicine"; it has run through three editions. You will find it all there about remissions.

9512. When was it written?—1904 was the first edition, and there have been two subsequently, and you will find all about remissions there.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Subject to the ruling of the Chairman, I ought to go into that question. Do you agree to the usual course? What do you say to this?

Mr. H. C. Dickens: What is the book?

Mr. Walter Stewart: This is an article by one Percy Smith. I am in your hands, Sir.

Chairman: I have not noticed it conspicuously. What material are we at present receiving to assist us in recommending amendments of the law? I do not see that we are receiving any. There seem to me to be points upon which I am so sympathetic to your point of view, that it is a great pity you should injure your case by conducting it as you are doing just now.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I will not proceed with it another single sentence.

Chairman: I am sure you will not, but I should like you to appreciate that we are fully sensible of the important points that have arisen in connection with Mr. H.'s case. We are exceedingly sorry if those points are to lose their importance and value by being covered up by a great deal of irrelevant matter which is of no assistance whatever, and which is being recorded at the public expense, and at waste of time to important public persons, yourself included. Has not this eminent gentleman just said that in his opinion the suggestion that in 1916 Mr. H. had general paralysis of the insane was a misreading of the facts? Can you want anything more than that?

Mr. Walter Stewart: Very well, Sir. I leave it, never to return to it.

Chairman: Please.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Now I want to deal with this question of Mr. H. being treated as an urgency case. I think, Sir, that is important.

Chairman: That is a point we were wanting to consider: Why it should be treated as an urgency case and not dealt with by the more leisurely form of procedure?

9513. Mr. Walter Stewart (To the Witness): Dr. Stoddart had been down on the 20th November?—Yes.

9515. You put it to me. I want to put the opposite view and to test it. You say that was nothing to do with it?—No, nothing.

9516. Let us see what the certificate says, and then point out whether you regard this as a strong enough certificate to deprive a man of his liberty?—Dr. Stoddart is a recognised man. If on receipt that document was not considered satisfactory the question would be raised instantly by the Board of Control, and properly raised. I may say it is not infrequently raised.

Mr. Walter Stewart: If I am taking longer than I had wished, it is not my fault. Listen to this: "Dr. Stoddart, The most important symptom in this connection is his intention to remove himself to Brighton beyond care and control when he is obviously not fit to be at large, as will be hereafter seen. He was rather garrulous in conversation, so I am told; and still more so in writing. He writes letters all day long. He told me this himself; and Dr. Dempster showed me piles of letters written by the patient—about three inches thick daily." How many inches thick do you think would be an indication that the person writing was insane? That is what I cannot understand. These were three inches thick.

Mr. H. C. Dickens: It depends upon the thickness of the paper.

9517. Mr. Walter Stewart: "Many of these were to comparative strangers, and Mr. H. had to explain them away by saying he had nothing else to do." He had not much else to do at that place. "His nurse told me"—(so much of this is what is told)—"that Mr. H. was liable to uncontrollable fits of temper again, quite unlike his normal self, and that he had the desire to visit a matrimonial agency despite the fact that he was already married. Mr. H. told me that he had bought a monkey from the Zoo and showed me the parrot cage in which he intended to keep it in his room. In so doing he showed defect of reason for the circumstances were quite unsuited to the keeping of such a pet. He appeared also to have developed a litigious frame of mind respecting (1) some property belonging to himself and his wife conjointly, (2) a false accusation by his sister which was never made, and (3) his treatment at a nursing home in Devonshire a couple of years before where he claims that he was insulted by being massaged. He was also full of 'schemes' which, in his circumstances, bordered on being unreasonable. For example, he wished to convert his wife's house into a hospital for sailors." At that time, 1916, was not everybody who could help in any way trying to render the utmost assistance that they were capable of rendering to the cause of this country, and had not his wife, down in that part of the world where they lived, a house eminently suitable for conversion into a small hospital?—I have not any knowledge of it.

9518. You agree, do not you, that not any one of these things ought by itself to be regarded as an indication of insanity—do you agree with that?—Each thing separately probably would not be.

9519. It was only because in the same individual there was a desire to keep a pet monkey.

Chairman: Or to go to a matrimonial agency when he was already married.

Mr. Walter Stewart: That was what was told to Dr. Stoddart.

Chairman: So were the other things.

Witness: This gentleman was very much more of unsound mind to anyone seeing him than was capable of being written down. A patient's actions are extraordinarily difficult to describe.

9520. Mr. Walter Stewart: Would you call the surroundings in that long room with 12 or 14 persons ameliorative or not? I want to see what made him better?—They certainly would not do him any harm.

9521. It would do him good perhaps?—He had to be with somebody until he recovered his mental balance. The body puts itself right.

9522. Then there is no need for this highly specialised alienist and treatment—"the body puts itself right"?—But it has to be placed under such conditions that it will get right.

9523. It takes a long time in some of these specialised institutions?—It depends upon the conditions.

9524. What conditions?—The body may not be able to put itself right.

9525. Have you noticed at all that people who are private patients seem to have a longer average duration of detention than patients who are pauper patients?—No.

9526. We have figures on that. You do not know, or you do not agree?—I do not agree, most certainly from my experience. I have worked in every class of institution.

9527. Can you give us the figures? What is the percentage rate of discharge in the first three months in the case of private patients?

Chairman: Do not answer that question, Sir Maurice. I have already indicated that what we are concerned with is Mr. H.'s case—not the question of the rate of discharge from different classes of institutions.

9528. Mr. Walter Stewart: Very well, Sir. (To the Witness): Now have you told us all you wish to tell us with regard to why this was an urgency case? Is there anything more you would desire to say as to why this should be treated as an urgency case?—The urgency was that he was not under proper control, and he refused to remain under control.

9529. He had not done anything wrong, had he?—He was not allowed to; he had treatment.

9530. But if he had done nothing wrong, what was the necessity for the control and treatment?—But you are not going to wait till murder is done before preventing it, or suicide before preventing it! A person who is suggesting suicide may have to be looked after.

9531. Did he suggest suicide?—No.

9532. Why treat it as urgent?—He threatened to leave.

9533. Do you say you had the right of preventing him from going to Brighton if he wanted to?—I had the right to question if he was fit to go.

9534. You say that made it a proper case for an urgency order?—Then the law gives certain powers for dealing with those cases, and it places the obligation upon the medical man to see that it is carried out.

9535. And that was what made you regard this as an urgency case?—That is so.

Earl Russell: You are forgetting that Sir Maurice said in examination-in-chief that if Mr. H. had done this he might have been taken up by the police for wandering at large.

9536. Mr. Walter Stewart: That is his surmise. (To the Witness): What earthly evidence have you to base that upon?—In many cases they have done it.

9537. Had he ever been taken up at that time?—No.

Chairman: Of course not. The whole thing was an apprehension of what might happen.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Is this the way we must regard it: Is any patient who expresses himself dissatisfied with his immediate surroundings and who desires to go elsewhere liable to be made the subject of an urgency order on that ground—even if he has accommodation elsewhere?—Witness: No.

9538. You do not put it as high as that?—You know perfectly well I should never dream of it. It is almost insulting me to ask the question.

9539. In this case what was there to differentiate this patient from any other patient?—Because he was of unsound mind.

Chairman: You will not get it any further, Mr. Stewart.

Mr. Walter Stewart: If you please, Sir—not with this witness.

Chairman: And not with any other.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I accept your intimation, Sir.

Re-examined by Mr. H. C. Dickens.

9540. I only want to put one question that I ought to have put before, Sir Maurice. What was your exact connection at Moorcroft?—I was consulting physician.

9541. Excuse me putting it to you. Were you paid a salary?—Yes.

9542. Do you or have you ever had any financial interest in any of these institutions?—None.

9543. Moreover is it against the rules of the Royal College of Physicians to have any?—Certainly.

Chairman: Thank you, Sir Maurice; we are obliged to you for attending here to-day.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Mr. CHARLES RICHARD STEELE, sworn; examined by THE CHAIRMAN.

9544. Would you give us your full name in order to get it on the note?—Charles Richard Steele.

9545. You are, I think, a solicitor practising in London?—Yes, at 6, Finsbury Square.

9546. We shall not detain you more than a moment or two, but there are one or two questions which arise relating to work you had done for Mr. H.

Were you solicitor for Mr. H. at any time?—For W. H., yes; I ultimately became his solicitor.

9547. Was he a client of yours?—When do you mean? He became a client of mine, after I had acted for his wife in connection with this matter.

9548. What one wants to know is when did you first act for him in the sense of opening an account in your books against him—when did you first act for

26 January, 1925.]

Mr. CHARLES RICHARD STEELE.

Mr. H.?—I really do not know that, but I was acting in his interest in May, 1917.

9549. But, as you know, he became an inmate at Moorcroft in December, 1916. Had he been a client of yours before that?—No.

9550. I thought you had prepared a will for him?—No, I prepared the codicil which revoked that will; that was about the first thing I did.

9551. When did you prepare that codicil?—I prepared that codicil in May, 1917.

9552. Then was that the first piece of professional business you had done for Mr. H.?—Yes, I think so. He was never a client of mine. My client was really his brother-in-law and his wife. They were my clients when I went down to Moorcroft. I have a draft will dated December, 1916, and an executed engrossment of it dated 1917, and the first thing I did was to revoke those documents.

9553. Earl Russell: You were here when Mr. H. gave evidence about the long interview with you at Moorcroft, were you not?—No.

9554. I thought he said you came there to execute a will?—I am sorry, but there is a misapprehension. I was not here when evidence was given about me, and I certainly did not get any document executed in Moorcroft.

9555. Mr. Croom-Johnson: There was an appointment you may remember in connection with the appointment of the receiver which started in May, 1917?—Yes, those proceedings were initiated by me.

9556. Earl Russell: This is what Mr. H. said. He had a long private interview with you at Moorcroft?—That, as it stands, is true.

9557. That is so?—Absolutely.

9558. What date is that?—I believe it is the 3rd May, 1917.

9559. And no testamentary document was signed then?—Of course not; it was the first time I had ever seen the man.

9560. There is one other question I want to ask you, if we are wrong about the will—some of my colleagues are looking it up. You had this interview with him alone at that time?—Oh, rather.

9561. Were you told by the Superintendent that he was a dangerous lunatic before you went to see him?—I was absolutely, and I was told I need not be nervous, because a man would be stationed on the mat outside the door, and all that I need do was to raise my voice and he would come in at once.

9562. So that Mr. H.'s evidence on that is quite correct?—That statement is correct.

9563. Did you find him at all violent during that interview?—No, I remarked upon the ordinary tenor of his appearance when I went in.

9564. About how long did the interview last, one hour or two hours?—I should say an hour and a half probably.

9565. At that time when you saw him you were acting, you say, for his wife and his brother-in-law?—Yes.

9566. He was not your client?—I had never seen him before that day.

9567. Did you, when you left him, form the opinion that he was a sane man or an insane man?—Well, my feeling was that if he was insane I might go there myself one day, because he seemed perfectly normal; and I remarked upon it to the medical officer, to whom I had been introduced when I had arrived, and who had taken me along.

9568. Mr. Croom-Johnson: Who was that?—I do not know. He was the gentleman who was in charge of the place at the time.

9569. Earl Russell: You formed the opinion that Mr. H. was not insane?—I was startled that a man so apparently sensible should be there.

9570. Did he, among other things, complain to you of being improperly detained there as an insane person?—Mr. H.?

9571. Yes?—Of course he did.

9572. He did?—Absolutely.

9573. Did he ask you to take any steps for his release?—Absolutely.

9574. Did you take any steps?—No.

9575. Why not?—I had no instructions to take any steps for his release.

9576. Because he was not your client?—He was not my client, added to which I should have thought it a very improper proceeding on my part in the face of the statements made to me. The limit to the man's life was given to me. I was told that they already saw a difference in his walk.

9577. So that although you thought he was sane, you thought you must be wrong; is that what you mean?—Yes.

9578. The question about the will has been found. It is this. I would just like to put this to you:

"Was anything done with regard to that will while you were still at Moorcroft?—Yes," says Mr. H. Then he goes on to say the will was prepared by Muther in November, then there was a document prepared by Speechley Mumford & Craig. That has nothing to do with you, has it?—No.

9579. "The will was signed in the presence of R. H., my elder brother, and witnessed by Stilwell on the 30th January." That was not a day on which you visited?—It was prior to the third of May.

9580. The number of the question is 8609.—The will is made on the 30th January, 1917, and it is signed by Reginald Stilwell and witnessed by Reginald John Stilwell and others. I had nothing to do with that. I had recovered possession of these when I came to act as his solicitor.

9581. Yes; that was the misapprehension I was under. I thought it was you who had done it?—The first thing I did was to get the codicil dated 17th June, 1917, which revoked that will.

9582. Mr. Micklem: May I ask you this, Mr. Steele: when you saw this gentleman in May, 1917, at Moorcroft, did you consider that you were acting for him, or that you were acting for somebody else?—I was acting for somebody else.

9583. For whom?—For his wife and brother. I think I put the brother in. The thing originated in this way—

9584. By whose instructions did you visit him?—Answering that question strictly and technically, by the brother-in-law, who is a solicitor for whom I have acted for a number of years. He wrote to me and said: My brother-in-law is unfortunately an inmate at Moorcroft, but my sister wishes you to go and see him and see what arrangements you can make for his welfare, and do whatever you think is right in the man's interest. Accordingly I went down and spent an hour there talking with him, and I came away amazed.

9585. Did you then take any instructions from him at that interview as to his codicil?—No.

9586. You simply had a talk with him?—I simply had a talk with him.

9587. And you say you formed the conclusion that he was not of unsound mind?—I do not like to put it that I formed any conclusion about it. I went there. The position was staked out for me. I understood that the man would not be put there if he was not of unsound mind, but still it seemed to me—

9588. It seems a little strange, if you came to that conclusion, that you took no subsequent steps to try and get him removed?—I am afraid I do not follow that.

9589. If on seeing him, and acting as a solicitor for somebody, you came to the conclusion that he was wrongfully detained there, one would have expected that you would have taken some steps to get him out?—I had no authority.

9590. Chairman: You had been sent down in his interests?—I had no possible means of setting up my opinion against the opinion of the medical faculty.

9591. Mr. Micklem: But you could have given information to his relations?—But his relations knew all about him, more than I did; I had never seen the man before.

26 January, 1925.]

Mr. CHARLES RICHARD STEELE.

9592. Did you take no steps after you had seen him?—I took steps to get him more comfortably placed.

9593. You appear to have written about his removal from Moorcroft?—Very likely.

9594. I see there is a letter from you which was referred to by Mr. Justice Sankey in a previous action.

Chairman: It is printed in the proceedings at Question 8630.

9595. Mr. Micklem: Thank you. (To the Witness): In that letter, which is dated 14th May, you say this: "We are concerned for the above-named patient." Then at that time you were acting for him, were you not?—That I do not know. I was using his name.

9596. You observe how your letter runs: "We are concerned for the above-named patient and are desirous of making enquiries by direction of the Master in Lunacy as to whether there is a vacancy in your asylum?"—Yes.

9597. I suppose before writing that letter you had communicated with the Master in Lunacy?—I should not think so for a minute.

9598. You would not think so?—I should not think so.

9599. You see you say: "by direction of the Master in Lunacy."—I was determined to move him away from Moorcroft.

9600. Mr. Steele, I do not want to press you unduly, but you say in this letter: "We are concerned for the above-named patient and are desirous of making enquiries by direction of the Master in Lunacy as to whether there is a vacancy in your asylum." Do you now tell us that that was a mistake, that you had not received any directions from the Master in Lunacy?—Certainly there was no order in the ordinary sense of the word.

9601. I did not put that to you for a moment. You say he was not your client. I put it to you whether you had any direction, not whether there was an order?—No, I had not any direction in any specific terms, but it was a waste of time to go and issue a summons before the Master in Lunacy and ask for permission to remove the patient from Moorcroft to Ticehurst, then to find out when you got the order that Ticehurst had not got rooms for him, or rooms you could not accept.

9602. Is this what you really meant: I think I shall become concerned with the patient, and I am sure if I ask the Master in Lunacy he will give me direction?—No, I was dominus litis at that time; they were my proceedings.

9603. Then you go on: "We may add that the patient is a highly respectable gentleman and occupied a good position in the shipping world. He is not of a dangerous disposition, but it is desired to secure an asylum with better surroundings than where he is at present." You had been told that he was dangerous?—Yes.

9604. Why did you write "He is not of a dangerous character"?—Because he obviously was not dangerous in the sense in which it would be understood there he was a dangerous man, likely to do anybody an injury.

9605. You told us that you did not think he ought to be in an asylum at all?—What I meant to convey was that I was surprised that a man having such clear perception and an active brain should be the subject of the disease or complaint, or whatever it was, I was told he suffered from.

9606. Referring to your letter of the 14th May, 1917, is it not quite clear that at that time you thought he ought to be in an asylum, and that the asylum should be changed from Moorcroft to some rather more comfortable place?—Officially, yes. Personally, I had no opinion about it.

9607. Earl Russell: Why do you say you were determined that he should be removed from Moorcroft—why determined?—Because—I do not want to say anything—

9608. We do want you to say it.—I sat for an hour and a half in that miserable little room in Moorcroft looking out on the lawn, and it occurred to me that if anything were wanted to drive a fellow dotty it would be imprisonment for the whole of his days, and I wanted a sailor to have the sea to look upon, and that is what I went down to Ticehurst for.

9609. Can you see the sea at Ticehurst?—There is a fine view over the country, and you are supposed to get the air from the sea. I do not know whether you can see the sea. But at Moorcroft the patient was on the ground floor and the only sign of life was an occasional gardener going by with a mower. At Ticehurst I got him rooms where he got a view of the sun.

9610. Is that your only objection—that the view was restricted?—You may call it the only objection. It was depressing.

Mr. Walter Stewart: He had said it was a miserable room.

Earl Russell: We have heard that.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: May I ask a question of this witness on this part of the case, Sir?

Chairman: On the question of the room that he visited?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I wanted to ask him a question about his evidence on the 3rd of May when he went down there.

Chairman: Would you mind telling me to what purpose your question is to be directed?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Really for the purpose of seeing whether he could not form the impression which he says he formed of the sanity of Mr. H.

Chairman: I do not think we can enter into that.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: If you please, Sir.

Chairman: On the other hand, you can ask him about the question of the room.

9611. Mr. Croom-Johnson (To the Witness): How many times did you go down and see Mr. H. at Moorcroft, do you think?—Three or four times.

9612. Did you always see him in the same room?—I do not think I ever saw him anywhere else.

9613. I would rather like to have your impression about it. You have characterised it with epithets?—I only used one.

9614. Have you any idea of the size the room was?—No, I have not. It was a very small room.

9615. You saw him in a very small room. May that have been the room where you were interviewing him?—No, it was what was called his room.

9616. Chairman: His sitting room?—Yes.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Might I ask as to what was said to this gentleman by the people at Moorcroft? Earl Russell has got part of it, but not quite the whole.

Chairman: I do not know that we need pursue it. Of course, this gentleman's views upon the sanity or insanity of Mr. H. are not of much importance. He has said that he was told Mr. H. was dangerous.

Mr. Walter Stewart: If I may help you it will show you how patients are kept in these places.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: That is the very point upon which I was stopped.

Chairman: Let me hear the question, Mr. Stewart.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Did the medical superintendent, or whoever the gentleman was that you saw at Moorcroft, say that he had no hesitation in saying Mr. H. was suffering from general paralysis of the insane and that the end would come in 18 months' time—did he say that?

Chairman: First of all, we have to consider whether the question is to be put.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I beg your pardon, Sir.

Chairman: No, I do not think we shall allow that question.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Very well. Then with regard to the will. If the state of Mr. H.'s mind is still a matter the Commission desire to know about, there is something written on the document itself which bears a date, a scrutiny of which may throw some light upon it.

Chairman: Will you show me the document, Mr. Steele? (Document was handed to the learned Chairman.)

26 January, 1925.]

Mr. CHARLES RICHARD STEELE.

Mr. Walter Stewart: May the will be regarded as evidence? I tender it.

Witness: That is a draft.

Mr. Walter Stewart: There are certain instructions by way of alteration of that document.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Bearing in mind the case book, I should have thought my friend could not have had it more plainly than on the last occasion—the entry on the 30th January, 1917. May I read the entry?

Chairman: If you please.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: "Mr. R. H. visited his brother to-day and brought the patient's will with him, which the patient had recently altered. At Mr. R. H.'s request and with the consent of Mr. E. S. H. (the petitioner), after the patient had read through the will, I witnessed it with attendant Brewer. I considered that the patient is mentally well enough to do this and to thoroughly appreciate the contents of his will." That is signed by Dr. Stillwell.

Mr. Walter Stewart: So long as it is so regarded by the Commission, I am content.

(The Witness withdrew).

DR. WILLIAM HENRY BUTTER STODDART, SWORN.

Examined by Mr. H. C. Dickens.

9617. Dr. Stoddart, you practise at Harcourt House, Cavendish Square. You are a registered medical practitioner holding the degree of Doctor of Medicine, London, you are a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, London, and a Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, England, you obtained the Gaskell Gold Medal in Psychology and Mental Diseases in 1901, and since then you have been Examiner to the Medico Psychological Association?—Not all the time—just for a few years, five years.

9618. You are a Lecturer in mental diseases in St. Thomas's Hospital, Consulting Physician in mental diseases to the War Office, Examiner in psychology and mental disease to the University of London, and you hold a variety of other appointments in connection with the study and treatment of mental diseases and psychology?—Yes.

9619. You are also the author of a book entitled "Mind and its Disorder," and other books on the subject, and you are the author of a variety of articles on mental diseases, and the like, which have appeared in the medical journals from time to time, and you have for a great many years made a study of mental disorder and psychology?—Yes.

9620. You first came into contact with Mr. H. on the 20th November, 1916?—That is right.

9621. You made certain notes at the time, which you produce?—Yes.

9622. I think you made an examination of Mr. H. and had a conversation with him—how long were you with him, roughly speaking?—About three quarters of an hour, I should think.

9623. Whereupon you drew up a report which you produce, and does that accurately and sufficiently represent the result of what you heard for yourself, and what you were told by other people that day?—Yes, I think so.

Mr. Dickens: I do not know if I should read it, Mr. Macmillan.

9624. Chairman: Perhaps you might just put it in. (To the Witness.) Where was this?—At Dr. Dempster's house at Croydon.

Chairman: And have we got who had invited Dr. Stoddart to go there?

9625. Mr. Dickens: How did you come to go there?—Dr. Craig asked me to go and see Mr. H.

9626. For what purpose?—For me to give my opinion on the case.

9627. Chairman: But you had not known the case of Mr. H. before?—No.

9628. Mr. Dickens: Did you speak to Sir Maurice Craig beforehand?—Sir Maurice Craig gave me something of the previous history of the case.

9629. Did you see Dr. Dempster?—Yes, I saw Dr. Dempster.

9630. Did he give you any information about the patient?—Yes; he showed me some of his letters, a pile of letters as a matter of fact, about so high. (Describing.)

9631. You looked at them, so that you got the general nature of them?—Yes.

Chairman: Then I think this report which was made is of importance; it was a report made at the time.

Mr. Dickens: Yes, it was made at the time; it was a report to Sir Maurice Craig for the benefit of the relations of the patient.

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Dickens: Shall I read it, Sir?

Chairman: Is it very long?

Mr. Dickens: It is two pages. "I beg to report that I have to-day examined Mr. W. H., a retired Consulting Naval Engineer, at the house of Dr. W. T. Dempster, 94, Brighton Road, South Croydon, with whom he is residing as a patient. I was informed that Mr. H. had an attack of pneumonia about five weeks ago, but he now appears to have recovered completely from this and to be well and strong in so far as his physical health and condition are concerned. There are, however, many signs of mental disorder, some of which are sufficiently serious to raise the question whether he ought to remain any longer on the footing of a voluntary patient in a doctor's house or to be certified and sent to an institution for the insane. The most important symptom in this connection is his intention to remove himself to Brighton beyond care and control when he is obviously not fit to be at large, as will be seen hereafter. He was rather garrulous in conversation—unlike his normal self, so I am told, and still more so in writing, for he writes letters all day long. He told me this himself, and Dr. Dempster showed me piles of letters written by the patient about three inches thick daily. Many of these were to comparative strangers, and Mr. H. had to explain them away by saying that he had nothing else to do. His nurse told me that Mr. H. was liable to uncontrollable fits of temper, again—quite unlike his normal self, and that he had the desire to visit a matrimonial agency, despite the fact that he is already married. Mr. H. told me that he had bought a monkey from the Zoo and showed me the parrot cage in which he intended to keep it. In so doing he shows defect of reason, for his present circumstances are quite unsuited to the keeping of such a pet. The patient appears also to have developed a litigious frame of mind, respecting (1) some property belonging to himself and his wife conjointly, (2) a false accusation by his sister, which was never made, and (3) his treatment at a nursing home in Devonshire a couple of years ago, where he claims that he was insulted by being massaged. He is also full of 'schemes' which, in his circumstances, border on being unreasonable. For example, he wishes to convert his wife's house into a hospital for sailors in opposition to the wishes of his wife and family. Although any one of these symptoms by itself might be of little consequence, their combination in the same patient is suggestive of the disease known as 'general paralysis' or 'dementia paralytica.' This diagnosis is rendered more probable still by certain physical signs, although these again are not unequivocal. They are an increase of the knee-jerks, failure of the left pupil to react to light and (as I am told by Dr. Maurice Craig) a positive Wassermann reaction in the blood and especially in the cerebrospinal fluid of the patient. Moreover, certain changes in the cell content of the latter fluid are also suggestive of general paralysis, though again not unequivocally. I understand that Mr. H.'s mental symptoms, although slighter in degree, date from January, 1915, or earlier. Despite the fact that such a protracted duration militates against the diagnosis of general paralysis, I can come to no other conclusion than that this is the disease from which the patient is suffering. In typical cases of general paralysis there is progressive mental and physical deterioration, ending fatally in about a couple of years; but Mr. H.'s case is atypical, and it is therefore impossible to attempt a prophesy as to its duration—even assuming the diagnosis to be correct."

26 January, 1925.]

Dr. WILLIAM HENRY BUTTER STODDART.

Witness: Yes.

9632. Then did you sign a certificate which I think you have?—Yes.

9633. I think that has been read to the Commission; it is dated the 20th of March, and I need not read it again, but it embodies some of the facts that you put in your report?—Yes.

9634. There is no mention at all of the diagnosis of general paralysis?—No.

9635. But the facts that you put in your certificate are merely facts with relation to his mental derangement at the time?—That is so.

Chairman: Is that the one, Mr. Dickens, that was never used?

Mr. Dickens: That was never used.

Chairman: And there is not a word in it with regard to general paralysis?

Witness: No.

Chairman: We have not had that one; it was never used, and therefore did not go on the file.

Mr. Dickens: Sir Maurice Craig had it; I thought he had put the original in.

Earl Russell: It has been read.

9636. Mr. Dickens: This was a certificate intended to accompany an urgency order, and to be the foundation of an urgency order?—Yes.

9637. Was it a case, in your opinion, that necessitated an urgency order rather than the delay of proceeding by a reception order?—Yes.

9638. Why?—I have put it in here, as a matter of fact. "The most important symptom in this connection is his intention to remove himself to Brighton beyond care and control, when he is obviously not fit to be at large." That is the reason for urgency stated there.

9639. Whatever the correctness or incorrectness is of the diagnosis, have you any doubt that on that day he was insane and certifiable?—No doubt whatever.

9640. There are one or two more questions, Dr. Stoddart, which I should like to put. Had you been brought into contact with the late Dr. Adler?—No, I am afraid I never met him, I knew of him.

9641. Had he a reputation as a skilled bacteriologist?—Yes, certainly.

9642. One more question with regard to private asylums?—Have you any financial interest in any institution of this sort?—Not a penny in one of them.

9643. Do you ever certify patients on the orders of other medical men, apart from your own judgment?—No, certainly not.

9644. Can you produce your notes—I am not going to read them—the notes you made at the time on which you founded your report?—Yes.

9645. I see your final word is "diagnosis. General paralysis, litigious."

Mr. Walter Stewart: I will ask my friend Mr. Cremlyn to cross-examine this witness.

Cross-examined by Mr. Cremlyn.

9646. Dr. Stoddart, I understand that you have a very vast experience in dealing with lunatics and certifying them?—Yes.

9647. I think for some considerable time you were medical officer at the Bethlem Hospital, were you not?—Yes.

9648. Would you mind telling me when it was that you were at the Bethlem Hospital, and how long you were there?—From 1898 until 1914.

9649. And you were also, I think, an Examiner in mental diseases, and so forth, at the University of London?—Yes.

9650. Are you still an Examiner?—My time is just up.

9651. What I wanted to ask you was this, and I do not want to be offensive at all, I have to put a few questions to you: Have you changed within recent years the entire basis upon which you previously used to deal with mental cases? Have you changed your mind as to the basis of dealing with mental cases?—No, I do not think so.

9652. May I ask you this: I see you wrote a book a little time ago, which has run into several editions, "Mind and its Diseases," I think, or "Mind and its Disorders"?—"Disorders," yes.

9653. Now that book is largely based upon what is known as the Freud system, is it not?—Yes, the latter editions.

9654. In the latter editions of that book you appear to have adopted the Freud system, which is diametrically opposite to the system which you adopted before, dealing with mental cases?—Yes, that is a different question. I gather that you meant the way in which I dealt with mental patients, not the pathology. I do hold different views as to the pathology of mental disorder.

9655. I put it to you erroneously, but holding that different view about pathology as you do, has not that coloured your mind and altered the whole view that you take, and the way you look at cases now?—Yes, I suppose it has.

9656. Now did you submit Mr. H. to any of the Freud tests?—Certainly not; he was not capable of that.

9657. May I put this general question to you: you know that the view that you take of the mind was very severely criticised by "Guy's Magazine"—you know that review on your book?—Yes.

9658. I do not want to be offensive at all, but you know the view you take is not generally accepted, is it, by the medical profession—I leave it at that?—Quite right.

9660. You suggest, then, with your vast experience of it, that it is practically impossible to carry out Section 28 of the Act?—Sometimes, yes.

9661. Section 28 says that you must state the facts in the certificate—you think it is almost impossible to carry that out on the material facts?—Sometimes it is, yes.

9662. Now arising out of that, taking this report by itself—you have told us there were other things you could not reduce to writing—do you suggest that this report in itself would not be a sufficient ground for certifying Mr. H. insane?—No, I would not say that. I thought it was sufficient.

9663. You see, you, say that it is impossible to reduce to writing many things that you see in a man, which would warrant you in finding that he was not only insane, but sufficiently insane to be dealt with under an urgency order. Are there any of those material things that are not down here in this report?—There was one which just caught my eye here among the notes, "A delusion that his sister had been slandering him some years ago."

26 January, 1925.]

Dr. WILLIAM HENRY BUTTER STODDART.

9664. Now let me deal with that, because that is a point that would arise on my examination. How do you test that that was a delusion and not a fact?—I made enquiries after he had told me that his wife had been slandering him. It was something that sounded improbable, and then I made enquiries afterwards, I think from his brother, and he said that it was a delusion.

9665. Then I take it that, generally speaking, you cannot test whether a statement is a delusion or not a delusion, except by asking other people about the matter?—Unless it is something quite obvious; as, for example, when a person says he is God Almighty or the Emperor of China.

9666. Then may I take it as a general rule that you cannot test the state of a man's mind at all except by his conduct?—Including what he tells you.

9667. I want just to take these things. First of all, take the numerous statements that you have put down here in this report. I take it from you that by themselves, isolate those statements every one of them by themselves, and they would not warrant you in certifying him as insane?—I think so, I think not a single one by itself.

9668. Not even the general paralysis of the insane?—No, there are many general paralytics in the early stages that are not insane.

9669. Exactly; so that taking each of these statements by themselves they would not warrant you, but you say that collectively, because you have a number of them, that would warrant you in certifying him as insane?—He was garrulous in conversation. By itself on paper that means nothing, but as I heard his garrulity he was obviously insane.

9670. Now you are putting something different to what you then said. You told me just now that taken by themselves they would not warrant you. Do you say one particular form of garrulousness will warrant you?—Yes; taken by itself on paper it is not sufficient.

9671. That seems to me rather contradictory. I do not want to trap you at all. You see, the certificate that you give is the warrant on which a man is to be certified, is it not?—Yes.

9672. And on the face of the certificate itself there must be a sufficient warrant for finding a man insane, especially under an urgency order?—Yes.

9673. And on the face of it, can you say that this statement is not a sufficient one?—Not that one, but I put half a dozen.

9674. I am coming to the lot; I have disposed of that, and I have disposed of the general paralysis of the insane. You say that is not sufficient?—Yes.

9675. Now take the statement which you have put down here as a most important symptom—"the most important symptom in this connection is his intention to remove himself to Brighton beyond care and control." How do you come to the conclusion that that is a very important symptom as a test of the proof of insanity?—Perhaps I am wrong in having used the word "symptom." "The most important reason for giving a certificate," I think, would have been more correct.

9676. You agree it is not a symptom?—It is not a symptom, no.

9677. And did you think when he was going to Brighton that he was going to Brighton, to use a vulgarism, I mean it explains it, "on the burst"—he was going there on a sort of joy ride, or jollification, or something of that sort?—No, but I was quite sure that he would behave in some eccentric manner if he were outside.

9678. Do you say that you are entitled to certify a man as insane if you think that he will behave in some eccentric manner?—Yes, such an eccentric manner as will attract the notice of the police.

9679. Was there ever any evidence put before you by anybody that Mr. H. had behaved in such an eccentric manner as to attract the attention of the police?—No.

9680. That was not communicated to you by anyone, that he had ever behaved in that way on any occasion?—No. There was the history of the year before, of course, when he was suffering from nervous depression: "he attempted to injure himself." One has to bear that in mind.

9681. Yes, and bearing that in mind, is it not a fact that he had never behaved in that way from that time to the time you saw him?—Not that I know of, no.

9682. Was there any symptom about him which would lead one to the conclusion that he would be violent to anyone?—No, I do not think so.

9683. Nothing at all?—No.

9684. You see what I have to suggest to you, Dr. Stoddart, is this—please understand that I am not suggesting any dishonesty of any kind on your part—what I am suggesting is that the methods by means of which you arrived at whether he was insane were not scientific—that the tests applied were not sufficient to warrant you in signing an urgency order. That is my suggestion—that is what I have to put?—I do not know what other tests I could have applied.

9686. Yes, the suggestion is that he was not insane?—Well, I am sorry, there is a difference of opinion.

9687. Well, you see, I am putting to you that it is a very difficult matter, as I think you will agree, really to find out if a man is insane—very difficult?—It may be, but not always by any means.

9688. Let me put one case to you: Supposing a man came to you and he wanted to bluff you, and he talked to you and said he was perfectly sane, and he suddenly told you he was the Apostle Paul—how could you say whether that man was really sane, or whether he was really for some purpose or other trying to bluff you that he was insane?—I think one can gather that by the person's general demeanour—again a thing that one cannot put on paper.

9689. But you have to put on paper under the Act, before you certify a man, proper warrantable grounds for certifying him?—Yes. A person is not necessarily certifiable because he says he is the Apostle Paul. He may be able to carry on quite well in the outside world.

9690. Exactly, and the case I want to put to you is that a man might be entitled to go down to Brighton, although he was garrulous, although he had general paralysis of the insane, and although he told you he was going to bring some action, which as a matter of fact he did bring afterwards?—I did not know that.

9691. Will you take it from me that that is so? I submit to you therefore that there is not a single thing in the whole of this document of yours which either collectively, or taken by itself, is any proof at all of insanity or violence; it is merely eccentricity, at the highest?—Eccentricity can be very extreme.

9692. Did you come to the firm conclusion that he was suffering from general paralysis of the insane?—No, I did not; I was doubtful.

26 January, 1925.]

Dr. WILLIAM HENRY BUTTER STODDART.

9693. Would that weigh with you at all?—No, it would have made no difference.

9694. So that you do not regard that as being a very serious matter in this case?—Yes, certainly, a very serious matter.

9695. In his case?—It did not matter as regards certification. Of course to the patient it is a very serious matter indeed.

9696. But I gathered so far as Mr. H. was concerned it did not weigh with you one way or the other in certifying?—It did not make any difference as to whether I should certify him or not.

9697. Can you tell us really what did turn the scale, so to speak. What did make the difference, and why did you certify?—Well, as I say, the chief thing was that he was going to remove himself from care and control, and go to Brighton, where he would not be under control.

9698. He was not under care or control, was he not there as a voluntary patient?—Yes, but Dr. Dempster was willing to look after him, and as soon as he took himself away from Dr. Dempster he would not be under care and control.

9699. Did you see any signs of any uncontrollable temper about him?—No, he did not show any temper while I was there.

9700. There is one other point: When you had a conversation with him about his condition did you tell him that he was up against the medical profession?—Certainly not. He was not up against the medical profession. I went there to do what I could to help him.

9701. And you helped him by certifying him?—Certainly.

9702. You thought that was the proper way to help him?—Certainly.

Re-examined by Mr. H. C. Dickens.

9703. And you think so now?—Yes, certainly.

9704. It is suggested that a gentleman called Munro came to see you later on, and that you told him that you had difficulty in certifying, and that he said to you, "Why certify?" and you said,

"Because I was told to." Is there any truth in that suggestion?—Certainly not. I was asked for my opinion, and then I said he ought to be certified.

Chairman: Thank you, Dr. Stoddart.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Dr. REGINALD JOHN STILWELL, sworn.

Examined by Mr. Croom-Johnson.

9705. What are your qualifications, Dr. Stilwell?—M.R.C.S., M.R.C.P.

9706. Are you now one of the licensees of "Moorcroft"?—Yes.

9707. Were you a licensee in 1916?—Yes.

9708. I think the property belongs to your father?—Yes.

9709. That is Mr. John Stilwell, a Justice of the Peace, who has been referred to?—Yes.

9710. Were you there in 1916 and 1917?—I was.

9711. And did you see Mr. H. from time to time?—I did.

9712. Was he on friendly terms with you?—Yes, very.

9713. Did he frequently write you letters?—He did.

9714. Long letters?—They were.

9715. And were they expressed in friendly language?—They were.

9716. Now I want to come down to the point of time when Mr. H. escaped—the 23rd February. Do you remember his being brought back to "Moorcroft" on the 26th February, 1917?—Yes, I do.

9717. Was he brought back by one of the attendants at "Moorcroft" who had found him in Chancery Lane?—He was.

9718. On his return, was he searched?—He was.

9719. Have you any knowledge of his being stripped?—No, I have not.

9720. Did you give any orders that he should be stripped?—No.

9721. Is it any part of the ordinary routine of the institution that he should be?—No.

9722. And, so far as your knowledge goes, do you think he was?—No, I do not think he was.

9723. Now after his return he was placed by day in what is known as the large room?—He was.

9724. I will deal with that specifically in a moment. With regard to the night time, did he continue to occupy the bedroom from which he had made his escape?—Yes.

9725. But with the difference that there was an attendant who slept in the room with him?—Sat up with him.

9726. Was that, in your opinion, a necessary precautionary measure?—It was.

9727. Now with regard to the large room, first of all, do you recollect how many patients there were in the room during the time that Mr. H. was there?—No, not precisely.

9728. About how many would there be?—Generally from eight to ten patients.

9729. And two attendants?—Two attendants.

9730. We have seen the photograph. I might perhaps just ask you this general question about the photograph. Has the photograph been taken comparatively recently?—Yes, last week.

9731. For the purpose of putting before the Commission?—Yes.

9732. Is there any truth in the allegation that that room was dressed up in any way in order to convey a wrong impression to the Commission?—No—just as it always is.

9733. Now just tell me this: What was the object of putting Mr. H. in the large room?—There were two points; chiefly to have more special observation and, secondly, from a medical point of view, he would associate with others more, and the intention was that he would lose the idea of always trying to escape.

9734. Had it anything to do with any notion of punishment?—No.

9735. Is it any part of the treatment of these afflicted people, either in your establishment or, so far as you know, in any other establishment of a similar nature?—No, certainly not.

9736. In your judgment, would it have been a suitable thing to place a man who had recently escaped and had been recaptured in a room by himself?—Well, it would have meant that he would have been shut up, you may say, all day long with one man.

9737. You would have had to have an attendant there in order to see that he did not escape again?—Yes, in the room again.

9738. And in the exercise of your judgment and your knowledge of these cases, did you think it was better for him to be in this large room?—Certainly.

9739. Now just a word about the patients who were in that room with him. First of all, with regard to their social position, were they people all of a similar social position to himself?—They were.

9740. Were they noisy people or not?—No, probably not so noisy as Mr. H., or not so talkative.

9741. Were they well-behaved patients?—Yes, in my recollection of them, as far as I remember. They would not have been there if they had been very troublesome.

26 January, 1925.]

Dr. REGINALD JOHN STILWELL.

9742. Were all of them as bad as Mr. H., or were some of them worse?—There was no one there more talkative.

9743. And what about their general condition; were some of them more normal or less normal than Mr. H.?—I think there were some more normal.

9744. More normal than Mr. H.?—Certainly.

9745. Now next with regard to their habits. Were any of them from your own observation people of dirty habits?—No, certainly not; they would not be in that room if they had been.

9746. One other small point: after he came back was there any difference made in the food which Mr. H. received?—No, certainly not.

9747. [He suggests that some sort of difference was made, and that he was not as well looked after?—No, the food was all the same; the only difference was that most of the gentlemen in that large room have* their main meal in the middle of the day instead of the evening; they dine at 2, and the patients who are more normal have luncheon and dine later.

9748. Do you recollect how long it was that Mr. H. was in this room?—I think it was four or five weeks.

9749. We have got the information from Mr. Steele, at all events, that when he came on the 3rd May he did not interview Mr. H. in this room.

Earl Russell: Would you ask about Mr. H.'s toilet articles?

9750. Mr. Croom-Johnson: I am much obliged. (To the Witness): With regard to Mr. H.'s toilet articles, is it true that he was deprived of those?—No, it is not true. His bedroom was exactly the same as it was before.

9751. And so far as his bedroom was concerned, would he use his bedroom in the same way; although he would sit in the day-time in this large room, would he have exactly the same bedroom?—Absolutely.

9752. And the amenities?—Absolutely.

9753. And his washing and shaving, and all that sort of thing, would be done in his bedroom, presumably?—Not his shaving. We have a barber's shop.

9754. Was he visited in that room by his brother, the petitioner?—Yes.

9755. And also by Sir Maurice Craig, as we have heard?—Yes.

9756. Until the proceedings in the Uxbridge County Court, had you ever heard of any complaint by Mr. H. or by anybody on his behalf, about being put into this room?—No.

9757. Then, in the County Court proceedings, was the complaint there about the room, that he had been paying still at the rate of 15 guineas a week, but had not been allowed the use of his private sitting room in the day-time?—That was the charge.

9758. Was that the only complaint made ultimately in the County Court?—As far as I remember, it was.

9759. Just tell me one thing about the place generally. Have you from time to time a number of patients who come there voluntarily?—I have.

Cross-examined by Mr. Walter Stewart.

9775. Have you a prospectus of any sort relating to "Moorcroft," Dr. Stilwell?—No, I am afraid I have not.

9776. Are none issued at all to interested people? No, we have never had one.

9777. How do you arrange for the supply of certified patients to be delivered at "Moorcroft"; I mean if the public are not in any way circularised, who feeds you?—We have been at it some time, you know; our name is fairly well known.

9778. Who sends the cases?—Most of the doctors, and ex-patients.

9779. Tell us about the doctors. Are you supplied with patients by several London consultants?—Yes.

9760. Patients who are not certified at all?—Yes.

9761. And do some of them repeat their visits and come again and again?—They do.

9762. What was happening in Mr. H.'s time?—I cannot remember whether I had a voluntary boarder at that time, but I nearly always have.

9763. And have you them there to this day?—I have several, yes.

Earl Russell: While you are on charges, will you ask him how the £700 for six months was made up?

9764. Mr. Croom-Johnson (to the Witness): I do not know whether you have got a copy of the account. It has been suggested that £700 for six months was the amount that was paid you. Your charge was 15 guineas a week?—Yes.

9765. Was that an inclusive charge?—No, anything he wanted we got for him, you know.

9766. For example, who would pay Sir Maurice Craig's fees for coming down? Would those go through your accounts or not?—I do not think so.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Those were paid by the brother, the petitioner, out of the estate. We have evidence of that.

9767. Mr. Croom-Johnson: Have you any recollection about £700 being charged at your establishment for six months?—I do not remember what the amount was.

Chairman: It would come to 60 guineas a month at 15 guineas a week.

Earl Russell: It is about half the figure that was mentioned to us.

Witness: I do not think our account could have come to that.

Earl Russell: Very well, so long as you put it to him.

9768. Mr. Croom-Johnson (to the Witness): There was a Receiver appointed afterwards in the lunacy proceedings, was there not?—Was that while he was at "Moorcroft"?

9769. Just about the time he was leaving. Do you recollect whether you sent up your accounts to the solicitors in London for the purpose of their being examined and checked for the lunacy proceedings?—No, I do not recollect that.

Chairman: There is one thing—"the miserable little sitting room"—what was the size of the sitting room?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Yes, the private sitting room.

Witness: It is a very nice sitting room. I think it is about 14 feet square; it has got two good windows and it looks out on to the garden.

9770. Chairman: Is it on the ground floor?—Yes, on the ground floor.

9771. Mr. Croom-Johnson: Is it well furnished?—Yes.

9772. And very well appointed?—Yes.

9773. Is that sitting room very much the same to-day as it was at the time Mr. H. was with you?—I think it is very much the same.

9774. So that if any Members of the Commission care to go and see it they could see it in very much the same circumstances in which Mr. H. inhabited it?—Yes.

9780. Sir Maurice Craig being one of them?—Yes.

9781. About how many in a year does he send you?—I have not the faintest notion.

9782. But you can find out quite easily?—Yes.

9783. As I understand you will be here to-morrow, perhaps you will make a note of that. Now tell me this: they are not all on the same basis of payment, are they?—No.

9784. What is the highest scale?—Our terms now are roughly from 8 to 15 guineas a week.

9785. Are none as high as 20 guineas. What about that American gentleman—I do not want to mention names—did he pay 20 guineas?—I should think it is very likely he did. He had three rooms.

26 January, 1925.]

Dr. REGINALD JOHN STILWELL.

9786. How many of these paying guests had you at this time—in 1916?—We generally have about 45 or 46.

9787. At an average of about how much? You could look that up too, I daresay. Have you not prepared yourself at all to give evidence in regard to these details?

Chairman: I am not surprised he has not, because the question is how was Mr. H. treated while he was in the establishment?

Mr. Walter Stewart: But the whole range of the inquiry, I thought, was as to what was provided and on what terms, at these private places, and as to whether they were properly run?

Chairman: I thought the question was whether Mr. H. was badly treated when he was at "Moorcroft."

Mr. Croom-Johnson: It was all gone into in the County Court action.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Surely my friend has been seeking to show how good it all was.

Chairman: I do not see that the number of patients he has and how much he makes out of them has any bearing at all upon the matter in question.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I submit that the question of what is got for the money is strictly relevant to the ambit of the inquiry. I want to get the general conditions. This is a typical case.

Chairman: Please go on. The only question I want to deal with is the question of how Mr. H. was treated while in this establishment.

9788. Mr. Walter Stewart: If you please, Sir. (To the Witness): Now as to the general nature of the establishment, this is a place for the reception and cure, if possible, of mentally ailing patients, is it not?—Yes.

9789. That is what you hold yourself out to do, and you charge up to 20 guineas per patient. What do you purport or profess to provide in return for that payment—not only meat and drink and lodging, but what else?—Medical treatment.

9790. Including what? I will put something specific to you to indicate what I mean. We have heard, amongst the items of ameliorative treatment, massage and psycho-analysis specially stressed as proper in dealing with this class of patient. Do you provide either of those things?—Yes, both of those.

9791. Is either of them included in the ordinary charge or are they charged as extras?—No, ordinary charges.

9792. What—massage? In the Uxbridge case did you not actually claim additional payment because Mr. H. had massage?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: We claimed nothing in the Uxbridge case.

Mr. Walter Stewart: But was not that part of the claim which he disputed?

Witness: I do not remember it.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I have the shorthand note.

Chairman: I am not going to have this gone into.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Very well, Sir. (To the Witness): You say it included massage—you swear that.

Chairman: I do not care whether he swears it or not. Will you kindly address yourself to the question, how was Mr. H. treated?

Mr. Walter Stewart: I am dealing with the massage.

Chairman: I do not see that he is ill-treated because he is charged for massage or if he is not charged for massage.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I thought it was bad treatment.

Chairman: It may be bad financial treatment, but it has nothing to do with his ill-health.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I should like to add that there is not a word of this in the County Court claim.

9793. Mr. Walter Stewart: No, it is in the evidence; it was complained of. (To the Witness): Now let us come back to the point. Mr. H. was charged 15 guineas a week, we know. What sort of room was it? My friend has been allowed to ask you about this room; was it on the ground floor?—Yes.

9794. Was it infested with mice?—No.

9795. Was it an old crumbling panelled room?—No.

9796. Is it panelled?—No.

9797. Was it any less safe than the large room?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Do you mean with or without an attendant?

Witness: It is an ordinary room just as safe as any other room.

9798. Mr. Walter Stewart: Then why was he removed, after he had escaped, to another room, if that was just as safe as any other room?—I explained that before. I moved him there because I thought it was good for him to be with other people, better for him than to be alone in a room with one man.

9799. What about the old gentleman who came and sat down in an aggressive way on that day that he arrived? That is how he first knew he was in an asylum?—I can assure you that before Mr. H. escaped he had practically the run of the house, and he was all over the house, too.

9800. Do you profess to provide sufficient guards for the 15 guineas, to guard a man who is in a private room if necessary?—As a rule, we charge extra for a man at night.

9801. It was only in the day time that he was put in the large room?—Yes.

9802. Then it was not necessary to put him in the large room for safety?—For actual safety, no.

9803. Do you seriously suggest to the members of this Commission that the conditions in the large room were better adapted to ameliorative treatment than in his own room?—Yes, I do.

9804. Why did you not put him there at first?—He was, as I say, in every room when he first came there.

9805. Why did you not put him there first? There is an extra charge for a private room which you made, and continued to make throughout?—Yes.

9806. Why did you not put him in the large room at first?—I have no doubt he went there.

9707. He had his own room at first, and he was put back because of the complaint; that solicitor came down, did he not?—It was nothing to do with him.

9808. There was a complaint, was there not?—No, there was not.

9809. Did not his relations complain of his being put in that long room?—No.

9810. Very well, you are swearing all this. You understand, when I say that the photograph does not honestly disclose the conditions, what I mean is that it does not show the sort of people who were in it?—Of course not.

9811. I am not going to put any name to you for obvious reasons, but I am going to put on slips of paper the names of people who were in that room, what they were suffering from, and how they behaved. Just take, if you please, that one (handing a slip of paper to the Witness). This is the only way in which I can show what this room was like. I do not want publicly to mention any name. Do you recognise that name—aged about 32?—Yes, I remember him.

9812. Did he suffer very badly from scales on his skin?—No, I remember the gentleman very well.

9813. Was he constantly picking his skin?—I do not remember.

9814. Was he strapped up with bandages and put in the oak room?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: May I see that slip of paper? (The same was handed to learned Counsel).

Witness: What do you mean by strapped up?

9815. Mr. Walter Stewart: With bandages over the sores?—He may have had.

9816. And was he eventually so bad that he had to be put in the oak room?—Yes.

26 January, 1925.]

Dr. REGINALD JOHN STILWELL.

9817. And he was put in there with a man called Priestly—that is the attendant?—No. You are getting rather mixed, I think.

9818. Was another man of that name with him?—Yes.

9819. Was he a persistent blasphemer?—No, I am sure he was not.

9820. Do you remember this gentleman who was also in the room at the time (handing another slip of paper to the Witness)?—May I mention that the first gentleman you gave me the name of got quite well in about five months.

9821. I dare say he did, but I am dealing with the condition he was in when Mr. H. was sharing the room. I do not care what happened five months afterwards. What about that gentleman (handing another slip of paper). Do you recognise the name?—Yes.

9822. Was he one of those people who indulged in loud prayer in season and out of season?—I think that is rather exaggerated, you know.

9823. What is wrong about it, the loudness or the fact that he prayed in and out of season?—As a matter of fact he used to say rather a prolonged Grace before meals, but I cannot agree that he was a loud prayer.

9824. Did he vary it by reciting erotic verses?—No, I never heard of it—not erotic verses.

9825. You have references in your case book to all these people, I suppose?—Yes.

9826. That is what I am told was his peculiarity. He constantly recited erotic verses. He had been with you many years, had he not?—Not in 1916.

9827. Is he still with you?—Yes.

9828. Then you know whether he is like that?—He is certainly not like it now.

9829. He is better?—No, he is not.

9830. No better?—No.

9831. I am very sorry to have to put this sort of question to you, but is it a fact that these sort of people at times smell very badly? Mr. H. said that that particular man did. Is there any ground for that?—No.

9832. Do some of them smell very objectionably at times?—Some cases do, but they would not be in the large room.

9833. Mr. H. says that one was?—No.

9834. Do you remember the case of a solicitor of that name (handing another slip of paper). He was also in that room?—Yes.

9835. He was one of the violent resisters to feeding, was he not?—He had to be constantly forcibly fed by attendants, had he not?—That again would be in your case book, would it not?—It would be, if he was.

9836. Do you deny it?—No, I do not remember it.

9837. Would he be one of those patients who was frequently very tearful, weeping, melancholic—do you remember him?—I remember him very well.

9838. Was he a patient of that kind?—I do not remember that he was very depressed—no.

9839. On instructions, I am told that that was his condition. You will not deny it, will you?—I should like to look it up.

9840. I should be obliged if you would. I should welcome a verification of these particulars because I want to be fair. Now had you an attendant named Jacobs to look after a particular patient?—Yes.

9841. Did he look after this patient in the long room. (Handing a slip of paper to the Witness.) Do you remember the patient?—You have written down the Christian name, I think.

9842. He was a violent man, was he not? He used to kick the attendants, did he not?—No.

9843. I put the name of Jacobs to you. Perhaps that will enable you to verify it, but that was the name of the keeper. He kicked him and was struck in return?—If he is the patient I think you are referring to, it is very unlikely.

Chairman: I think, Mr. Stewart, Mr. H. made his point to us that he found these patients very disagreeable. Is not that almost enough?

Mr. Walter Stewart: It is suggested that they were worse than he was and I am showing what they were like, and the case book will show.

Chairman: I think he said that some were worse and some were better. Really I think the contents of this room eight years ago have ceased to interest, beyond the fact that the patient did not like being there, and thought the company was objectionable.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I have nine of them. (To the Witness): Do you consider that to share a room with people like that is likely to be ameliorative of the condition of a patient who according—

Chairman: Please stop. Cannot you ask the simple question: Do you think it would be nice to be in a room like that?

Mr. Walter Stewart: For a patient in that condition specially—even at that moderate rate of pay.

Chairman: Put your question in your own way, if you prefer to introduce parentheses of that sort.

9844. Mr. Walter Stewart: I am bound to, Sir, if I am to get the whole circumstances. (To the Witness): Do you think that that is likely to be a suitable environment to produce a cure?—Yes, I do. You see, I do not think you have got the hang of this thing, if I may say so. In this large room there are certain patients who go in there; if they are well enough they go in there. If they are not well enough they go into another room; they vary from day to day.

9845. It has nothing to do with whether they can afford to pay for a single room, has it?—If they can afford to pay for a private single room, they can have one, but it does not follow that they will always be in that room.

9846. For five weeks Mr. H. was kept out of it. Was that because he was not well enough, or because you wanted to punish him?—No, I did not want to punish him.

9847. Was it not for the purpose of punishment that he was made to consort with those people whose cases I have been putting to you?—No, certainly not.

9848. How came he to be put back again into his room?—I thought he was well enough to return.

9849. Is it not because complaints were conveyed to you in writing by his relatives as to the conditions by which he was surrounded?—I do not remember it in writing. I think Mr. E. H. said he would like to have his brother back into his own room as soon as I thought fit.

9850. And did you then put him back and not tell him?—I do not think so at all.

9851. You did not put him back before, did you?—No.

9852. What form of mental treatment did you give him to cure his diseased mind? Just describe it, so that we can know what he got?—He gets at the start a routine life.

9853. You can get that outside, cannot you?—Yes.

9854. What other advantages had he?—Occupation of a suitable character.

9855. What occupation did you find for him?—It was unnecessary to find him any.

9856. Very well; then that was not provided. What else did you provide for his mental amelioration—think, and tell us?—We devoted a good deal of time to him.

9857. What did you do to improve his mind?—I am not aware that I did anything particularly, except his general health.

9858. That is exactly the process; you do not do anything particularly. You provide them with food and lodging and let them cure themselves if they can. Is not that the actual basis and bedrock of the whole thing?—No, it is not.

9859. Was there any process of psycho-analysis in order to improve their minds?—Not in his case.

9860. I invite you now to take the opportunity to tell the Commission what there was in the way of special treatment?—I do not think Mr. H. had any special treatment.

9861. Very well. No special regular exercise, for instance?—He had plenty of exercise.

26 January, 1925.]

Dr. REGINALD JOHN STILWELL.

9862. I say no specialised exercise?—No.

9863. Then with regard to the bathing—baths are said to be such a great subject of this treatment. Had he an ordinary slipper bath in his room?—I cannot remember what bath he had.

9864. As far as you are able to say, was there any other special kind of bath ever provided in this special establishment?—There are the baths.

9865. Was there any other bath ever provided for him except an ordinary slipper bath filled from a can?—I do not know whether he used one of the bath-rooms or not.

9866. Anyhow, you do not know whether he had one of the baths for curative purposes?—I cannot say.

9867. Simple diet—I dare say he had that. I am not complaining about that. You say it is the same all through; there is no difference?—Not in the quality of the food.

9868. In other words, the highest paying patients get no better food than the lower paying patients?—No.

9869. That is a matter to be noted. What were the amusements provided? We know he had his own pets to amuse him, and a very good thing too. That is highly recommended nowadays by people connected with these establishments, is it not—that people should be allowed to have pets?—I have not heard of it.

9870. What amusements would you provide for 15 guineas a week, or whatever it was?—Mr. H. was so busy; I do not think he had time for amusement.

9871. He amused himself?—Yes, to a great extent.

9872. Be it so; I only want to see what the establishment is capable of doing. Now tell me this, as distinguished from amusement—occupation. He provided his own, did he not?—He did.

9873. Regulated employment—you did not provide that, did you?—No.

9874. There was no regulated employment provided. General care of bodily health; let us see what you provided in that way. What was the general care of bodily health?—Did you prescribe medicines for him?—Personally do you mean?

9875. Or anybody. You are a doctor, are you not?—Yes.

9876. Who is the medical superintendent in this place?—I am.

9877. Very well then. Who regulates the prescriptions for your 40 odd patients?—Either I or my partner.

9878. Then let us deal with you, you are here. What medicine, if any, did you provide for this gentleman?

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Do you expect this gentleman to give a list after this period of time?

Mr. Walter Stewart: Unless the Chairman stops me, I am disposed to do it in my own way.

Chairman: I have almost despaired of trying to stop you.

9879. Mr. Walter Stewart (to the Witness): Tell me what medicines you provided him with?—I really do not know what medicines he had. He might have had something for his bowels, or a tonic, or anything.

9880. But your case book is kept for the purpose of indicating what drugs are supplied, amongst other purposes, is it not?—Yes.

9881. I happen to have a copy of it. Have you your case book here?—Yes.

9882. I challenge you to show any member of this Commission that he ever had mercury or iodide of potassium at your establishment, if that be a relevant question?—I never said he did.

9883. I am much obliged. You are not in a position to suggest that he did. I put to you that you actually did on 2nd January prescribe this prescription.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: You must not take it that I accept that. I have the case book before me.

9884. Mr. Walter Stewart: Very well. (To the Witness): Is that what you prescribe (handing book to the Witness)?—That I prescribe?

9885. What was prescribed on 2nd January? What was the prescription; was that for the jaundice?—Yes.

9886. What is that?—This is calomel.

9887. Then what is the drug on the 2nd January?—That was on the 28th January. On the 2nd January I think it was for his temperature.

9888. Do not you know what it was?—Yes.

9889. What was it?—Salicilate of soda.

9890. That is what they give you for rheumatism?—Yes—temperature.

9891. Quite an ordinary tabloid drug. Anything else?—I see he had some capsicum.

9892. Do not you know what that is?—Yes.

9893. What is it?—It is a very useful drug.

9894. What is it for?—For the bladder, as a rule.

9895. He was suffering from some trouble with the gall-bladder. Had you diagnosed that?—Not the gall-bladder.

Chairman: The urinary system.

9896. Mr. Walter Stewart: Very well. How many medical attendants do you provide for these 40 patients?—There were two of us, resident—Dr. Potterton and myself.

9897. Which of those two was it who made the entry in the case book about the fact that he was suffering from general paralysis of the insane—an entry under date January 10th—"month's report, January 10th"?—That is Dr. Cole.

9898. Was he your visiting physician?—Yes, he helped me a great deal.

9899. And he placed that on record, did he not?—Yes.

9900. Do you know that shortly after that entry was made in your case book, Mr. H. managed to get a peep at it?—So he says.

9901. After that his attitude towards your medical confrère—the other gentleman you have told us of—I think his name was De Courcy?—Potterton.

9902. Mr. H.'s attitude towards him changed; he took a very great dislike to him?—Very likely, yes.

9903. With that entry in the case book, do you wonder, assuming Mr. H. thought it was Potterton who made the entry, that he took a dislike to him?—He says he was a general paralytic.

9904. Yes. You would not like the person who said it?—No.

9905. Especially if you knew it to be untrue?—No.

9906. Then you do not suggest that that dislike which he took to the doctor was in any sense a proper symptom upon which to diagnose that he was insane, or to emphasise his insanity?—It is a way people who are insane often have, is it not? They take likes and dislikes.

9907. But I am putting to you the reason for it—to show there was a reason for it?—There may have been.

9908. I see you have got this entry: "January 23rd, 1917. The patient spends most of the day in his own room playing with his monkeys and writing letters to various people. He has expressed a great dislike to me personally, and is best left to others for the time being. D.C.P."—that is Potterton?—Yes.

9909. Now I call your attention to the fact that he gained a peep at the entry in the case book. You do not wonder, in the circumstances, that he took a dislike to the medical practitioner if he thought he was responsible for that. It is reasonable, is it not?—I see the point.

9910. I hoped you would. It is a very serious thing, everybody agrees, and that was the first knowledge he had of it as far as you know, was it not?—Yes.

9911. Did he ever protest to you against it being said that he was suffering from it?—I do not think so.

26 January, 1925.]

Dr. REGINALD JOHN STILWELL.

9912. That is as far as you are prepared to go?—I do not think it was ever mentioned.

9913. I put it to you that he objected very much?—To being called a general paralytic?

9914. Yes?—To me?

9915. Not to you being called that, but to his being called that?—I do not remember it. I did not know he even thought about it.

9916. Did you ever tell the solicitor, Mr. Steele—was it you who saw him first of all?—Yes.

9917. Did you ever tell him that Mr. H. was suffering from general paralysis of the insane, and that he would not last 18 months?—I do not remember telling him.

9918. Try?—I will not say that I did not.

9919. Is that the sort of way that you doctors who run these places—you are a part-proprietor of this place?—Yes.

9920. Is it a limited company?—No.

9922. You justify it as being a thing that doctor proprietors of establishments should do. Would it tend, do you think, to induce relatives to keep the patient in your establishment—the knowledge, for instance, that the patient in question was suffering from G.P.I. and would not last more than 18 months? They would not be likely to withdraw the patient so readily, would they, if they thought that were true?—If the patient was well enough, they would, I take it.

9923. If a patient is going to die in 18 months?—If he got a remission, as they often do.

9924. You never told anybody that he got a remission?—Not that I know of.

9925. On the contrary, did you write a series of letters to his wife?—I have heard you say so.

9926. Perhaps if I read a little passage—

Mr. Croom-Johnson: Perhaps if you will produce the letter, it will be the best way of settling this point.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Very well, if my friend takes the point. Mr. H. is not here. I do not know, Sir, whether you think I am entitled to put the passages from the copies which are before you.

Chairman: I do not think that this is in the least contributing to our deliberations. I do not want to stop you, because I am so reluctant to make you feel that I am in any way wishing to stop evidence that you wish to bring.

Mr. Walter Stewart: But I am putting the reason why.

Chairman: Surely it is a question I have put to many witnesses. We are quite aware of the fact that where a person is an inmate paying them large sums weekly, they have an interest to detain that person.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Very well. If I am speaking to the converted, I will cease.

Re-examined by Mr. Croom-Johnson.

9927. Just on that last point: Your establishment has been constituted for a number of years now?—Yes.

9928. Is it over a hundred?—Well over a hundred.

9929. Is it a very well-known establishment?—I think so.

9930. And, speaking generally, have you more applications for patients to come in than you have vacancies into which to put them?—It very often happens that we cannot take patients.

9931. I must ask you this general question: Whatever you said to Mr. Steele or anybody else in connection with Mr. H.'s case, did you honestly believe what you said to be true?—Yes, I did.

Mr. Walter Stewart: A little bit leading perhaps.

9932. Mr. Croom-Johnson: With regard to the oak room, is the oak room different from the large room we have been talking about?—Yes, it is.

9933. After Mr. H. had been given the use of his own private sitting room again, did he frequently go back to the large room of his own accord?—He did.

9934. For the purpose of talking with the people who were in that room?—Yes.

Mr. Walter Stewart: If this is of any value, I do submit that my friend is dealing with this witness—

9935. Mr. Croom-Johnson: Indeed, there are considerations of time, Mr. Stewart. (To the Witness:) Did Mr. E. H. give evidence in the Uxbridge County Court?—He did.

9936. Did he give evidence with reference to the existence of this room?—Yes.

9937. Did he say one way or the other whether he agreed to his brother being put in it?—Yes.

9938. What did he say?—He agreed with everything I had done.

9939. And was he called on behalf of his brother in the Uxbridge County Court?—Yes.

9940. And was there a second brother also called, and did he give evidence to the same effect?—He did.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I think that is enough.

Chairman: Thank you, Dr. Stilwell.

(The Witness withdrew.)

(Adjourned to to-morrow morning at 10.30.)

5, OLD PALACE YARD,
WESTMINSTER, S.W.1.

SEVENTEENTH DAY.

Tuesday, 27th January, 1925.

MEMBERS PRESENT :

THE RT. HON. H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (Chairman).

THE EARL RUSSELL.

SIR THOMAS HUTCHISON, BART.

SIR HUMPHRY ROLLESTON, BART., K.C.B., M.D.

SIR ERNEST HILEY, K.B.E.

SIR DAVID DRUMMOND, C.B.E., M.D.

MR. W. A. JOWITT, K.C.

MR. N. MICKLEM, K.C.

MR. H. SNELL, M.P.

MRS. C. J. MATHEW.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

MR. WALTER STEWART and MR. CREMLYN (instructed by the National Society for Lunacy Reform) appeared on behalf of Mr. W. H.

MR. H. C. DICKENS (instructed by Messrs. Hempsons) appeared on behalf of Sir Maurice Craig, Dr. Robert Percy Smith, Dr. J. G. Porter Phillips,

Dr. William Henry Butter Stoddart and Dr. Robert Cole.

MR. R. P. CROOM-JOHNSON and MR. GEOFFREY MOSELEY appeared on behalf of Dr. Reginald John Stilwell and Dr. Bulkeley Footner.

Mr. Geoffrey Moseley: Mr. Croom-Johnson has asked me to express his regret to the Commission at his inability to be here to-day. Perhaps you would allow me, Sir, to carry on in his absence?

Chairman: Certainly.

DR. ROBERT PERCY SMITH, sworn.

Examined by Mr. H. C. Dickens.

9941. You are Dr. Robert Percy Smith, practising at 36, Queen Anne Street, and you hold the Degrees of Doctor of Medicine, Bachelor of Surgery, Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, and Licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries?—Yes.

9942. And, among other appointments, you were Assistant Medical Officer to Bethlem Royal Hospital, under the late Sir George Savage, and on his retirement in 1888 you became Medical Superintendent for 10 years, and, of course, as such, had an enormous experience in mental cases?—Yes.

9943. You left there in 1898, and since that date you have been practising as a consultant in mental diseases and nervous disorders?—Yes.

9944. And, without egotism, you are looked upon in the profession as a great authority on this subject. You have been President of the Medico-Psychological Association, President of the Mental Section of the Royal Society of Medicine, and of the Neurological Section of the Royal Society of Medicine, Examiner in mental disorders to the University of London and to the University of Leeds; you are the author of various books on the subject, and have done a lot of public gratuitous service in the matter. You acted as Government delegate to the International Committee for the Care of the Insane, which was held in Vienna?—Yes.

9945. A member of the Council of the Mental After-Care Association, and a member of the General Committee of the Lebanon Hospital for the insane in Syria?—Yes.

9946. In fact, the whole of your life has been devoted to this branch of your profession?—Not the whole of my life, but the whole of my life since about 1885. Before that I was a student at St. Thomas's and Resident Assistant Physician at St. Thomas's, and I held appointments there.

9947. Have you any financial interest of any sort or kind in any mental asylum or similar institution?—No financial interest, except a salary as visiting physician.

9948. It makes no difference to you and to your position—

Mr. Walter Stewart: Would Mr. Dickens kindly not lead the witness?

Chairman: Just go on, please.

9949. Mr. Dickens: It makes no difference to you, to your financial position whether a patient is certified or not in any case?—No, none whatever.

27 January, 1925.]

Dr. ROBERT PERCY SMITH.

Mr. Dickens: There is one other question, before we deal with the facts of this case, which I think Mr. Macmillan will allow me to put to you. It has been given as hearsay evidence with regard to a certain Dr. Munro that he has expressed a continued opinion as to Mr. H.'s sanity. Dr. Smith has an original letter from Dr. Munro here, in which he expresses a totally different opinion, and I ask the Commission, in fairness to Dr. Smith, to be allowed to read the passage out of the letter.

Chairman: It is rather collateral to our direct evidence, is it not?

Mr. Dickens: It is, Sir, but if the Commission have paid no attention whatever to the evidence of Dr. Munro, well and good.

Chairman: I should not like to say that, because we must, of course, attend to all evidence which is brought before us; but if it is a letter addressed to Dr. Smith, you might read it.

9950. Mr. Dickens: It is a letter addressed to this witness, dated the 16th December, 1917. You have the letter there, but I will just read one passage from it. "It is with surprise and regret that I learn that my attitude towards this patient does not altogether meet with your approval, and I am sure you will allow me to correct what I conceive to be a slight misunderstanding on your part. I am so far from believing that the patient was not certifiably insane at the date of your certificate, that I have been doing my utmost, and I think at last with success, to dissuade both Mr. H. and his advisers from any attempt to traverse the opinion of such an eminent authority as yourself." Now with regard to Mr. H., you saw him on the 9th December, 1916?—Yes.

9951. Was he then in bed?—Yes.

9952. And were you with him a considerable time?—Yes.

9953. Had you previously spoken to Dr. Maurice Craig, as he was then, about the patient?—Yes.

9954. And to Dr. Dempster?—Yes, I had the full history from Dr. Craig giving practically all the dates that he gave yesterday, and all particulars.

9955. Did you take down in shorthand what Dr. Craig told you?—Yes.

9956. And what Dr. Dempster told you?—Yes.

9957. And what the patient himself told you during your interview with him?—Yes, I have it all here.

9958. Did you on the same day transcribe your shorthand into that book which you have before you—those notes?—Yes.

9959. And have you furnished us with exact copies of those notes?—Yes.

9960. And are they correct?—Yes.

Earl Russell: Transcribed in longhand or shorthand.

Mr. Dickens: Transcribed into longhand, and we now have typewritten copies, which I propose to hand round to the members of the Commission. I do not propose to go through these notes again, and I will leave it to my friend to cross-examine. Dr. Smith has compared the copies with the original notes, and that is a correct copy of the interview. (Handing in the same.)

Witness: I made it myself.

9961. Chairman: You transcribed your own shorthand?—Yes.

9962. Mr. Dickens: Mr. Stewart has a copy, Sir. (To the Witness): Now I do not propose to ask you more than this: On that information, the information contained in those notes as received from Dr. Craig, Dr. Dempster, and the patient himself, what conclusion did you come to as to his state of mind?—I came to the conclusion that he was insane, and unfit to remain in a doctor's house.

9963. The Commission would like to know, I think, why you recommended the method of an urgency order in preference to the more dilatory method of a reception order?—There was his whole mental condition, and his whole conversation, and then he had developed what I considered to be dangerous ideas about Dr. Dempster, in whose house he was, and who was an old friend with whom he had been on very friendly terms.

9964. Did you think that there was danger in leaving him at liberty for any further time at all?—Yes; he was a case which one would call potentially dangerous.

9965. Was it in his own interests as well as in the interests of the people he was with that he should be confined?—Yes.

9966. And did you then make the certificate which the Commission have before them?—Yes.

9967. That was on the 9th?—May I look at the certificate?

9969. Now there is only one question more I want to ask you: It is suggested that you told Mr. H. that you were a heart specialist, and had come to examine his heart?—I never did anything of the kind.

9970. There is no foundation for that?—Not the slightest.

Mr. Geoffrey Moseley: There are just one or two questions I should like to ask on behalf of Dr. Stilwell.

Chairman: If you please.

Examined by Mr. Geoffrey Moseley.

9971. Do you know Moorcroft well?—Yes, I have often been there.

9972. You have been there many times?—Yes.

9973. And have you been able to form an opinion as to the manner in which it is conducted?—I think it is conducted extremely well.

9974. Have you seen the rooms in Moorcroft?—Yes, I have seen a good many of them. I do not know that I can identify any one particular room from memory.

9975. Do you know the room that is called the "common room"?—I am not sure that I do; I have generally seen patients in their own room, or in a separate room.

9976. From your experience have you heard that Mr. H. escaped on the 23rd February, and that he came back on the 26th?—Yes.

9977. Have you heard that he was then placed, not in his private sitting room, but in the common room?—Yes.

9978. Have you heard the reasons for which he was put there?—Because he was more safely guarded, I gather; I think that is the only reason I have heard.

9979. The other reason put forward was that he was associating with other people, which would take his mind off the fact that he had returned?—Yes.

27 January, 1925.]

Dr. ROBERT PERCY SMITH.

9980. In your experience would it be a proper thing to do, to put him with other people on his recapture rather than put him alone in his private sitting room?—If a patient has escaped, you have to take more care of him when he is brought back, naturally.

9981. The other reason is that it is suggested it is better for him to be with other people than to be alone in his own room?—It depends upon the case. There are some patients who do much better with others, and there are others who will do better by themselves. That is a matter for individual judgment at the time.

9982. You would not say it is an improper thing to put him in a room with other people?—No, certainly not.

Cross-examined by Mr. Walter Stewart.

9983. Dr. Smith, you say that for many years you have been engaged in this professional activity in relation to certifying people of unsound mind?—In relation to certifying? I have been engaged in the treatment of mental diseases for 40 years, I think it is.

9984. Let us come to more recent times. About how many patients do you think you certified in the year 1916?—I am sure I could not tell you without looking through my case book to see how many.

9985. Could you give us any idea?—No, I could not.

9986. Would it be 20, 30, or more?—I cannot tell you. I do not keep statistics in my head as to how many patients I certify.

9987. You have no idea how many?—I could not give you a guess; I could count them up if you wish me to.

9988. I would like you to give us an idea, if you will note that as a question I put to you?—May I say there are far more patients that I do not certify than I do.

9989. I want to know how many you did certify?—I cannot tell you unless I look them up.

9990. It is quite an ordinary incident in your professional life to certify a patient?—It is one of my duties from my knowledge.

9991. And you have certified a very great number in the course of your professional history?—A great number we may say—not a very great number.

9992. Do you appreciate that the fact that the patient has been certified is bound to cast a blight on his life, from the time of his certification to the end of his life?—No, I would not say it is bound to cast a blight on his life.

9993. It does, does it not?—It does in some cases, but not in all.

9994. I want to test you by a question, which is quite a general one: Would you do everything in your power to avoid anyone who was near and dear to you being certified?—Certainly, as long as it was safe for the patient.

9995. Let us come now immediately to the facts of this case. Have you ever until to-day, in any public court, or on any public document, alleged that Mr. H. was dangerous, either to himself, or to the public? I am speaking of public documents and public places?—What do you mean by public documents?

9996. On a certificate, or on any document which it would be your duty to prepare in connection with your professional duty?—I do not think I have had to prepare any document in relation to Mr. H. except the certificate originally signed.

9997. Let us deal with that. On that you do not suggest that you have anywhere stated that he was dangerous either to himself or to the public, do you?—I did not state in so many words that he was dangerous, but it was my opinion that he was potentially dangerous.

9998. You are quite familiar with the requirements of the section dealing with certification?—Certainly.

9999. May I call your attention to Section 28, requirements of reception order and medical certificates?—Is that the Lunacy Act?

10,000. It is?—May I look at it? (The Act was handed to the Witness).

10,001. Sub-section (2) I read yesterday, and I will not repeat it, that it must set out the facts upon which the certifying practitioner has formed his opinion?—Yes.

10,002. Now look at sub-section (3): "The medical certificate accompanying an urgency order shall contain a statement that it is expedient for the welfare of the alleged lunatic, or for the public safety, that he should be forthwith placed under care and treatment, with the reasons for such statement." Did you observe that condition in the certificate you drew?—Certainly. You have my urgency certificate here; the urgency clause is there.

10,003. Show me what is the statement in your urgency certificate?—You have a copy of it.

10,004. I have a copy of the certificate of Dr. Robert Smith dated 12th December, 1916. Is that your certificate?—That is not the urgency certificate.

10,005. That is the only one I have?—I do not know anything about that. That is not the urgency certificate, that is the second certificate.

10,006. That was the certificate upon which he was certified, together with the one prepared by Dr. Phillips, and sent to Moorcroft, was it not?—No, it is not. That is the certificate upon which the reception order was made by the justice after he went to Moorcroft. He went in on the urgency certificate.

10,007. Just call my attention to the passage in the urgency certificate that says that he is dangerous to himself or to the public.

Earl Russell: Those are not the words in the section you read.

10,008. Mr. Walter Stewart: I beg your pardon. (To the Witness): "Expedient for the welfare of the lunatic or for the public safety"?—This is the statement accompanying the urgency order. This is on the statutory form. "I certify that it is expedient for the said W. H.," and the words "or for the public safety" are put in brackets. I struck those out.

10,009. Why did you strike that out?—Because I did not think it was necessary to put it in.

10,010. Have you not just told us that the reason why you certified him?—I said he was potentially dangerous.

10,011. What is the difference between dangerous and potentially dangerous in your mind?—I should say a man is dangerous if he is hitting people or breaking windows, and that sort of thing. He is potentially dangerous if he has delusions about a man in whose house he is, showing hostility to him, and accusing him of being a vile instrument.

10,012. Did you say that he was potentially dangerous in the certificate?—I say it now.

10,013. On the contrary you struck it out—that he was dangerous?—No, I struck out the words "or for the public safety." It was not a question of the public safety.

10,014. It means danger, does it not?—If you like.

10,015. Very well, then I do like. Let us pursue that a step further?—And then I gave my reasons for the conclusion why it was expedient that he should be placed under care immediately, in the proper clause, which is here.

10,016. Have you ever seen Mr. H. until that day when you went down on the instructions of Dr. Craig?—Not on the instructions.

10,017. Who told you to go?—On the invitation of Dr. Craig—in consultation with Dr. Craig. I am not under his instructions.

10,018. Very well, on the invitation of Dr. Craig?—Or at the request of Dr. Craig.

10,019. Listen to what I am saying. Before ever you saw that patient you had, as you have told my friend, a long talk with Dr. Craig about him?—

27 January, 1925.]

Dr. ROBERT PERCY SMITH.

Certainly; he gave me the whole history, which is always necessary.

10,020. So that you went down with your mind, at any rate, to some extent, coloured. You could not go with a perfectly open mind, having heard a lot of things that were said before you saw the patient?—In every case where one is called into consultation, one has the history of the case; you do not go down blank.

10,021. That is given in the absence of the patient?—Certainly.

10,022. So that he has no chance of knowing what has been said about him?—Very often.

10,023. Now when you got down there, how did you introduce yourself to Mr. H.?—Dr. Craig, as he was then, introduced me to him, and left me to have what is the proper statutory separate interview.

10,024. Although you had all the discussion with him beforehand, and everything you have put in that report had been communicated to you?—I have said so. Every physician who is called in consultation has a history of the case given him.

10,025. Now you arrived for your interview in that frame of mind?—Knowing the history of the case.

10,026. Did you tell Mr. H. the purpose for which you had come?—I do not remember what I said to him in that respect. I mean, one began to talk to him in the ordinary way as a physician.

10,027. I do not know what that means. Just tell me this: Did you in any way warn him that anything that he did, or anything that he said to you, might be used as material for the making of a certificate to shut him up?—No, not as far as I remember.

10,028. I mean, that is done in the case of a criminal. You do not think that is desirable, perhaps, in the case of a person whom you suspect of being a lunatic?—Very often it would be a most detrimental thing to the patient. A patient is not competent to judge.

10,029. Mr. H. has said he would like to have been told, so that he might have dealt with you properly. Now he did not very much like you personally, did he—he showed some impatience?—Not the least. He talked freely the whole time; he did not show the least dislike. He talked so freely to me; and the details of his conversation, which are shown in the notes and which, of course, one would not like to read out in open Court, show the sort of confidential things that he said to me, which are hardly imaginable if he had taken any hostility to me, or unfriendliness.

10,030. Now you said the "whole time." How long was the "whole time," according to your recollection?—It is rather difficult to tell.

10,031. About?—I should say I was with him at least three-quarters of an hour, or probably longer.

10,032. He does not quite agree with you?—I know, he said 10 minutes.

10,033. It is his recollection against yours?—His recollection is entirely faulty about that.

10,034. This is a less common occurrence in his life than in yours. Is there any truth in the suggestion that is made by some people that very often patients are certified after an interview that only lasts for 10 minutes?—I do not know; I do not do it myself.

10,035. You think you were there three-quarters of an hour?—Yes.

10,036. Mr. Jowitt: In a very obvious case, surely you could tell a man is mad in a couple of minutes?—If a man is breaking up furniture and tearing his clothes, and that sort of thing, it is a matter of sight.

10,037. Mr. Walter Stewart: There is nothing of that kind here?—No, he was not tearing his clothes or breaking windows.

10,038. Now you said, of course, you would not wish to read things that are in the private note, nor do I. I want to see what you put on the certificate and to test it by that?—Yes, the certificate of the 9th December.

10,039. It is paragraph 3: "I formed this conclusion on the following grounds, namely, facts indicating insanity observed by myself at the time of the examination." This is something you observed, according to you. Then you go on at once to say: "He told me that while in the nursing home for a nervous breakdown two years ago he was vilely and improperly treated." Is that right?—That is what is written here. Yes.

10,040. Is that what he told you?—Certainly.

10,041. Did you take any step with him to test whether there was any ground for that?—I could not go and see the attendants two years ago in the nursing home.

10,042. Dr. Smith, pay me the compliment of listening to my question. Did you take any step with him personally to test that, to see what the nature of the vile treatment was?—But it is two years ago he refers to.

10,043. But still he could tell you if you questioned him?—He told me what he considered they had tried to do. He has no signs of it now, of course.

10,044. Did he say—I must put his version of it to you—was it he or Dr. Dempster who told you about one of the attendants named Jenkins?—He told me; it is in my notes here.

10,045. Jenkins had an unpleasant illness, he said?—He said so.

10,046. Can you suggest that such a thing as that could not happen in the sort of place that he was in?—He said that Jenkins had a filthy disorder, those are his remarks, and that he could smell it.

10,047. Is that impossible? I mean, did you test in any way whether it was likely to be true?—How could I test it? The attendant was not there, I could not smell the attendant.

10,048. You could ask him?—He told me this himself.

10,049. You could put further questions to him to see if there was any probability of it being right?—If a man said he had something the matter with him, I could not test smell at the present time.

10,050. For instance, you could have asked him: Did that attendant ever have occasion to try and pass a catheter in your case?—On the patient?

10,051. Yes.—He did not tell me so.

10,052. You did not ask him anything about the relationship between him and that attendant?—He continued to make a great many statements about Jenkins. There are other things which the Commission may have read of what he said about Jenkins, about when Jenkins shaved him, and so on. I do not like to read it out.

10,053. I am asking you about facts observed by yourself under this paragraph. I notice under that very paragraph you put this under the head of "Facts observed by yourself." "I am informed and believe it is a delusion"—that is about pieces of dressing having got into the meat pies?—Yes, that on four occasions he removed pieces of surgical dressing from the meat pies.

10,054. And then you say, "I am informed and believe that it is a delusion," under the head of "Facts observed by myself"?—Yes, because I questioned Dr. Dempster, who had been constantly seeing him at that time.

10,055. Behind the patient's back, or in his presence?—Behind his back.

10,056. So he had no chance of saying, "Well, doctor, I will tell you how it was"?—No.

10,057. Now he says, "The property which became his and his wife's on his aunt's death had been stolen from him by his first cousin"?—Yes.

10,058. Did he indicate what property, or did you ask him?—Let me look at the note. I think you have got there everything he stated to me.

10,059. You will know it, and I would like you to tell us?—"The property which became his and his wife's in 1913 on his aunt's death had been stolen from him by his first cousin, B. H."

27 January, 1925.]

Dr. ROBERT PERCY SMITH.

10,060. That is the very man against whom he subsequently had a litigation?—Yes.

10,061. Did you take any steps at that time (further than to put it in a certificate) to see whether it was a delusion, or whether it was founded on a fact?—I did; I asked his brother about it.

10,062. You did not ask him?—He told me. How could I ask him?

10,063. I am trying to test you now by asking you questions to see whether what you say is correct?—I say he told me. I asked his brother if there was any truth in it. I tried to ascertain whether it was a delusion or not.

10,064. Do you think that is quite a fair way to treat the patient, behind his back, to be asking people, who may be interested on the other side, if what the patient says is true?—I think it is perfectly impossible to hold a court before an insane patient.

10,065. Let me ask you this: Do not you think that in matters affecting the liberty and the whole status and life of a person, it would be fair that there should be some real judicial enquiry at which the patient might be represented, even if he could not be present himself?—I think it would be quite impossible to carry out any such course.

10,066. Would it be desirable, if it were possible, in your view that there should be a fair judicial enquiry on this all-important occasion?—There is a judicial enquiry, because there is a justice's order. The papers are presented to the justice.

10,067. We know about the present judicial enquiry, I do not want to discuss that with you, but I do propose to put something to you with regard to the material upon which certificates are based. I will do it now, if I may. I am quoting, it is fair to tell you, from the judgment of a former Chief Justice of the Realm, Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, in the case of The Queen and Whitfield, at page 136, and I invite your criticism of this statement of the learned judge.—How many centuries ago is that?

10,068. This is in the year 1885.

Mr. Micklem: What is the reference?

Mr. Walter Stewart: Page 136, of XV Queen's Bench Division.

Mr. Jowitt: The Lord Chief Justice, you mean?

10,069. Mr. Walter Stewart: The Lord Chief Justice, Lord Coleridge. "I am here, I know," says the Chief Justice, "speaking for myself, and I will own that the experience I have had of the flimsy stuff on which perfectly sane men are sometimes incarcerated in lunatic asylums makes me perhaps a severe critic; but I am not content to consider this sort of thing an examination under the Statute." What do you think of that dictum? Do you think it is justified?—I do not think that the judge had had any practical experience of lunatics.

10,070. He is talking of certificates, you know, not of lunatics.

Chairman: Just one moment. The date of that is 1885.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Yes.

Chairman: Then after that the code which we now have in the Act of 1890, whether successful or not, was designed to accomplish the reforms which the learned Lord Chief Justice had in view. I do not say whether they were effective or not.

Mr. Walter Stewart: May I say, first of all, that the Act of 1890 specifically declared there was no alteration of the law thereby. There was a certificate to that effect by Mr. Theobald. Secondly, this very judgment was cited by Lord Justice Atkin the other day in the Everett judgment which he gave, and cited with approval, and I can call your attention to the passage.

Chairman: I was only pointing out that defects in the Lunacy Law before 1890 had been the subject of much discussion and a Select Committee had been appointed, as I understand, for the purpose of investigating these matters. I have had the advantage of reading a considerable amount of the Report, in which many criticisms were levelled at the existing system. What we are considering now is whether the code of 1890 has efficiently met the difficulties of a very controversial topic. But it is important, I think, to have in view, when one is referring to matters before 1890, that they were made under a different régime from that which we have now.

Earl Russell: While we are on this subject, I should like to know what your authority is for saying that the Lunacy Act of 1890 made no change in the law.

Mr. Walter Stewart: My authority is that on the face of the Act itself there is a certificate by Mr. Theobald declaring that the 1890 Act incorporated nothing new—my friend, Mr. Parker, will show it to you.

Witness: I was superintendent of Bethlem Hospital when the 1890 Act came into operation. It introduced in the case of the patients of the private class, the magistrate's, that is, the justice's, order, which was not in existence before. Therefore, it was a very material alteration of the law.

10,071. Chairman: We are very fully alive to the very material alterations have been made.—May I make just one more point, and that is that I was a Superintendent at the time, it trebled at one blow, all the reports and certificates and returns that the Medical Superintendent has to make and sign for patients of a private class.

10,072. Chairman: Of course, we are still concerned in getting to what extent the efforts of 1890 have been successful. It is that which we are really exploring—how far the code in its operation has been successful in meeting all cases?—It seems to have worked very well.

Mr. Walter Stewart: May I answer Earl Russell's question? Here is the report of the Minutes of Evidence on the Statute Law Revision Bill in the House of Commons, 1890, on the 25th March in that year. "We understand," says Mr. Solicitor, "that you are the draftsman" (that is addressed to Mr. Theobald), "and responsible for the arrangement of this Bill?—(A.) Yes. (Q.) Is it a Consolidation Bill in which will be contained, subject to the exceptions shown in Clause 340, all the law with regard to lunatics?—(A.) Yes, I believe it is. (Q.) And does it reproduce the statuteable enactments which have passed in previous years?—(A.) Yes, it does. (Q.) I wish to direct your attention to Section 322; with the exception of that section, is there any divergence from the language used in previous statutes as to which you desire to inform the Committee?—(A.) No, I believe there is nothing in the Bill, so far as I know, that can be fairly said to be an alteration. It has been considered by all the Government Offices, the Home Office, the Local Government Board, the Commissioners, and they have all criticised it, and here and there they have suggested alterations; they have pointed out little things that have been alterations, and these have all been altered back. I believe now there is nothing that can be said to be an alteration of the law."

Mr. Jowitt: What tribunal was that before?

Mr. Walter Stewart: That is the Select Committee on the Statute Law Revision Bill, Lunacy Consolidation Bill, the proceedings of the Committee, and Minutes of Evidence.

Mr. Jowitt: That is the 25th March, 1890.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Jowitt: That is only four days before the Royal Assent is given to the Lunacy Act of 1890.

Mr. Walter Stewart: That is my point, and Mr. Theobald saying there is no alteration.

Earl Russell: That does not in the least answer the question I put to you. The question is, do you say there was no alteration of the law subsequent to 1885, and to tell me this is itself a Consolidation Act and makes no alteration is not an answer; because this Act repeals and re-enacts two Acts which are set out in the Fifth Schedule, and particularly the Lunacy Act, 1889—that was new legislation.

10,073. Mr. Walter Stewart: But the Act of 1890 was nothing new. With regard to that, I must not argue, I know, but I can call the attention of the Commission to what Lord Justice Atkin said with regard to that, but I do not want to be accused of wasting time. Listen to this: "It seems to me the merest travesty of an examination; and the elaborate system of protection and careful enquiry prescribed by the statute, if this is a legal compliance with it, is, to use old and famous words, 'a mockery, a delusion, and a snare.'" "This case with which I absolutely agree" (he cited a case), "shows to my mind that the statute requires that there should be a real inquiry, a real weighing and sifting of evidence, a real examination with an unbiased mind, a real serious and solemn exercise of judgment." (To the Witness): Now, do you think that the kind of enquiry you held answers that definition?—I think I took every step to ascertain what was the patient's mental condition, and to verify from those who were closely associated with him how far his statements were delusions or otherwise, and in what way these ideas were likely to influence his conduct.

10,074. Let me ask you this: In the light of what you now know, do you wish to express any regret for the fact that you certified Mr. H. on this day?—Not at all; I think I should have been very wrong not to have certified him.

10,075. That is your view in spite of all you know?

Chairman: If you are going to take up that line, I am afraid it will be my duty to make public certain communications which we have received from Mr. H. since. We have received communications, which, if they were made public, would be very serious. You are asking this witness to express his regret for his action with regard to this gentleman.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Justifying his certification.

Chairman: Well, I am not going to take a step which I might take. Would you wish me to read the telegram which we have received this morning?

Mr. Walter Stewart: No, I do not ask you to do anything. I ask the witness something in view of what he knows and what I know. That is, the term of the disease.

Chairman: Very good.

10,076. Mr. Walter Stewart (to the Witness): The general term of the dreadful malady that you call general paralysis of the insane is a period of about two years, is it not?—It varies very much in different cases.

10,077. But in your article in Quain's Dictionary of Medicine have you not expressed that view, that the term is about two years?—That is an average, but some cases last only three months; others last 10 or 15 years.

10,078. I think it fair to ask you, do you personally still say—I know what other people say—that Mr. H. is suffering from general paralysis?—Did I ever say so?

Mr. Walter Stewart: I do not know.

10,079. Mr. Dickens: He has never said so here, and he has never said so in any certificate.—I said he had symptoms pointing to the early stage, and I think I should have been wrong not to put it down for the guidance of those under whom he was going.

10,080. Mr. Walter Stewart: Did you ask Mr. H. or not what it was that was his grievance against Dr. Dempster?—I do not know that I asked him, but he told me.

10,081. What was it?—He volunteered these things; they came bubbling out, as it were.

10,082. What did he say?—I will try to find it, if you will give me time.

Mr. Dickens: "says he was in the hotel, was put in a nursing home by the local doctor, or Dr. Dempster."

Earl Russell: "Dr Dempster said that yesterday the patient was accusing him."

Mr. Dickens: That is what Dr. Dempster told him.

Witness: Yes, that was "facts communicated by others." Dr. Dempster says "that yesterday the patient was accusing him of being a vile instrument in ill-treating him at Teignmouth." The attendant tried to inoculate him with syphilis, and so on. "Three nights ago called Dr. Dempster names, said he had found him out."

10,083. Mr. Walter Stewart: I am asking what Mr. H. said.—Yes, if you will give me one minute.

10,084. As many as the Commission think right?—It is in the last part, I think. When Dr. Craig came back, that is, after I had had my separate interview with him for the purpose of certifying, Dr. Craig came back to see if I had finished.

10,085. And the patient said that Jenkins—?—"When Dr. Craig came back" (this is a copy of my note), "patient said that Jenkins"—this is the man whom he had accused of trying to give him venereal disease—"is going to turn round and say that Dempster organised the thing." That is the thing Dr. Dempster told me, of course, that the patient had accused him of initiating vile treatment at Teignmouth.

10,086. "Says Mrs. Dempster is the ruling power and he is willing to stay as long as she likes"?—Yes, as long as she likes, but he was hostile to Dr. Dempster.

10,087. And that is all, then, that he said with regard to Dr. Dempster?—Yes, it was very important.

10,088. You said it came bubbling out. There was no accusation by him against Dr. Dempster, except that he said that Jenkins was going to turn round and say that Dr. Dempster had organised the thing?—Yes; it seems to me ridiculous.

10,089. At any rate, there is no accusation by Mr. H. ?—It is all part of the statement of Mr. H.

10,090. Well, the Commission can judge for themselves how far that is an accusation by Mr. H. against Dr. Dempster. Did you know at that time that, quite shortly before, his will had been prepared in draft and submitted to him?—I think he said to me that he had prepared a will.

10,091. Did he tell you that he had left considerable sums of money to this very Dr. Dempster?—No, he did not say that.

10,092. And to Dr. Dempster's wife?—No; the only reference he made, I think, to a will in my interview with him was this—it is on page 3: "Says he was put in charge of four men, three of whom were infernal blackguards; they were temperance male nurses. Says he has left one 50 guineas in his will, he was a good one, says that this one told him that Jenkins, another attendant, was not doing right by him," and Jenkins was the man who was afterwards to turn round and say that Dr. Dempster had organised the whole thing.

10,093. That is what Mr. H. said, that Jenkins was going to turn round and say that Dr. Dempster organised the whole thing?—Yes, although Jenkins was the very man who was accused of vilely treating him.

10,094. Do you know whether Dr. Dempster, in fact, had anything to do with Mr. H. being taken care of in that place two years before, where Jenkins was?—I understood that Dr. Dempster had been down to see him at Teignmouth. Dr. Craig told us all about that.

10,095. Was it true that Dr. Dempster had organised that arrangement—organised that thing?—Organised? Dr. Dempster was a doctor who was, I think, or had been his medical attendant. When you say organised, he naturally took part in the arrangement for him to be under treatment.

10,096. Then that was true?—But not in the vile treatment, not organised vile treatment, he organised his going to a nursing home.

10,097. May I put it to you as a question: If an attendant in a place like that had got an objectionable disease of the kind indicated, it would be vile treatment to allow such a person to come in contact with a patient?—It was not the mere statement that he came in contact, but that the attendant was going to inoculate him with a vile disease, which Mr. H. said the attendant had.

10,098. Mr. H. has given his version of this, it differs from yours?—This is the version he gave me.

10,099. Do you know that Mr. H. said here?—No, I do not.

10,100. He said it was necessary that a catheter should be used upon him, and he objected to Jenkins using that instrument; that is what Mr. H. said to us?—Yes. I will tell you what he said to me.

10,101. I will not go back over that, because you have already dealt with it. I put it to you whether he had had occasion to use any instrument?—

10,102. Mr. Jowitt: Apart from this case, is it a delusion which you have come across before, that patients imagine that endeavours have been made to infect them with venereal diseases?—Yes.

10,103. It is very common, is it?—Yes.

10,104. Mr. Walter Stewart: That is not confined to the insane, is it? I suppose you have heard that patients complain that people have infected them?—Have tried to infect them.

10,105. Very well. Now I pass over the fact that he was garrulous, because that is quite a common symptom, is it not?—Very common in maniacal cases and excitable cases.

10,106. And in some other cases. Now, "The said W. H. appeared to me to be in a fit condition of bodily health to be removed to an asylum." How long was it before that that he had recovered from pneumonia?—Several weeks.

10,107. Was it? He was still in bed, was he not?—He was not in bed from pneumonia. He was in bed.

10,108. What was the reason of his being in bed?—I should think partly to keep him in one room and to keep him out of mischief.

10,109. Now I want to ask you this. Are there not at Brighton many very eminent and efficient medical people?—Oh, yes, a large number.

10,110. You know now, do not you, that he had, in fact, a furnished flat there?—Yes, I believe he had.

10,111. Would there, in your view, have been any harm at all, if he was well enough to have been taken a long motor drive to Uxbridge, even in going by train to Brighton to his own flat?—The drive to Uxbridge does not compare with the drive from Croydon to Brighton, to begin with, it is only just over the bridges to Middlesex, it is from Surrey to Middlesex.

10,112. It was the difference in the distance?—It is 40 miles to Brighton from Croydon.

10,113. It was too far, you think?—I do not raise that point.

10,114. I thought you did?—I think he was unfit to stay in his flat at Brighton, quite unfit.

10,115. Would it not have been possible, if it was only the welfare of the patient that was being considered, that somebody might have attended him there?—I do not think so. In his condition nobody could tell in what way that man might suddenly develop in the next day or two.

10,116. He had never, as far as you were able to ascertain, while he was at Croydon, been guilty of any overt act of violence, had he?—I do not think he had, no.

10,117. And have you ever heard that since he left Croydon on that 10th December, if that was the right date, that he ever was guilty of any overt act of violence towards anybody?—No, he was put under care, of course.

10,118. You have been asked about Moorcroft. It was sworn yesterday by Mr. Steele, who was not Mr. H.'s solicitor, that Mr. Steele was told that Mr. H. was dangerous. From all you know regarding Mr. H.'s conduct at Moorcroft and elsewhere, can you point to any single act indicating that he was dangerous?—In the history of

Mr. H. there is evidence that he at one time was extremely dangerous; and, therefore, as he had got now a development of excitement following what had been a depressed condition, there was every reason to anticipate that he might be dangerous.

10,119. You are talking of something that had happened two years before?—Yes, but it is all part of the man's history.

10,120. It is put in your note, but not in the certificate?—Quite so. It was not a fact I observed myself; that is a fact of previous history. You do not put everything in the previous history in "facts communicated by others"; you put the things that are relevant at the time.

10,121. Was that not relevant at the time?—It was relevant in his history that he had had a very dangerous attack, in which it took eight men to hold him, in which he broke through a window and cut his arm. He showed me the scar on his arm.

10,122. I think I am accurate in saying that that suggestion that he at any time required eight men to hold him was never put to Mr. H.?—That I do not know about. I did not put it to him. You do not always ask a patient about everything that has happened in his past life. He showed me the scar on his arm.

10,123. Did you ever see him again?—Not till the other day in court here.

10,124. I want to put, if I may, this general question to you. Bearing in mind that these people whom you are called in to certify are, ex hypothesi, in a condition in which they are not well able to look after their own interests, do you think it fair that there should be some neutral authorised representative to see that they get fair play?—I think the patient does get fair play. I think all doctors who approach these matters take a very serious view of it; certainly all physicians do, and the whole thing is not so simple. There are patients who will not speak if what you may call a Commission is held over them. There are others whom it would excite and make worse.

10,125. You do not quite follow what I am putting. I am putting that there should be someone to watch the interests of the patient, who is unable to watch his own?—In the ordinary way the relatives of the patient and the family doctor are watching the interests of the patient.

10,126. Have you never known a case in which relatives have desired to put a patient away because he was awkward for them, rather than dangerous to himself or the public?—Certainly, there may be such cases. On the other hand, there is nothing more distressing and more wearing to the relatives of the patient than to have an insane patient in the house, there is nothing so dangerous and so exhausting.

10,127. For the first time I find myself in complete agreement with you, but let me ask you, do not you think even in the case of such a patient that it would be expedient, desirable and just, that there should be someone to separately represent the interest of the alleged lunatic?—I think there is. There is the justice, to whom the papers are presented.

10,128. The justice—think you?—It is a most difficult question, introducing any condition of that sort.

10,129. Earl Russell: I would like to clear up one point that has been bothering me a little. Did you hear Sir Maurice Craig's evidence?—Yes.

10,130. You heard him say that this patient had a bad family history?—Yes.

10,131. I notice at the beginning of your notes, "Family history said to be nil."—I understood Sir Maurice Craig, as far as I remember, to say that there was not any family history. I do not know whether he found any family history afterwards.

10,132. He certainly said so yesterday.—Yes, he did say so.

Chairman: We are much obliged to you, Dr. Smith.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Dr. JOHN GEORGE PORTER PHILLIPS, sworn.

Examined by Mr. H. C. Dickens.

10,133. You are a Doctor of Medicine and a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and at the moment you are Superintendent Physician of Bethlem Royal Hospital?—Yes.

10,134. Physician and Lecturer in psychological medicine at St. Bartholomew's; Lecturer in Mental Pathology at the London (Royal Free Hospital) School of Medicine for Women; Examiner in Mental Diseases to the Medico-Psychological Association of Great Britain and to the Royal Army Medical College?—Yes.

10,135. You were Gold Medallist and Gaskell Scholar in Psychological Medicine, 1911, and you have specialised in this branch of medicine for over 17 years?—I have.

10,136. Did you on the 10th December, 1916, receive a telephone communication from Dr. Maurice Craig, as he then was?—I did.

10,137. Asking you to go and see a patient?—Yes.

10,138. Mr. W. H., at Croydon?—Yes.

10,139. Did he tell you anything else?—I asked him the object of my visit, and he told me that he wished me to see this patient there, to examine him and to give an opinion, if necessary, and he informed me that the brother of the patient had been acting as petitioner and that already he had been seen by other practitioners, but he wished to have an independent opinion.

10,140. Did you go down to see him in your car, or in a car?—In a car.

10,141. That you had hired at the time?—Yes.

10,142. On the 10th December?—Yes.

10,143. Did you first see Dr. Dempster by himself?—Yes.

10,144. Did he tell you what sort of mental condition the patient was in?—Yes; he informed me that Mr. H. had been under his care for some time, but recently during the last week or two he had been giving him cause for anxiety, his personality had completely changed, and he had become very excitable and restless, and resented control and any treatment that he wished to carry out.

10,145. Did he tell you anything about the letter writing?—Yes; in addition he showed me a pile of letters which I examined; there were a great number of them, and they appeared to me to be very badly and carelessly written, and the contents seemed to be incoherent.

10,146. Abusive?—Yes; there were abusive letters to various comparative strangers in the neighbourhood, I understood.

10,147. Then did you see him alone?—I saw him alone.

10,148. Did you go into his room?—Yes, I went into his room.

10,149. What sort of condition did you find him in?—I found him in a very excited, restless and talkative condition. He had his coat off—I remember he was in his shirt sleeves—and seemed to be in such a restless condition, moving from one part of the room to another. After conversing for a little while he left the room and then came back again, and from that I gathered that he was in a very restless and abnormal condition.

10,150. Was his head shaved?—Yes.

10,151. Did you tell him what you had come for?—Yes, I told him I had been sent by Dr. Craig, who was a friend of his, to enquire into the state of his health, and I specially alluded to the fact that they were nervous about him, because his nervous condition seemed to be in an unstable condition. He rather laughed at that. I had a great difficulty in questioning him, because he was so garrulous, he was telling me about his affairs, and within a very short time told me about his financial status, that he was a wealthy man, and wished to make great use of his money. His attitude towards me was quite a reasonable one as far as that was concerned. He seemed to be quite friendly, and he said, "You know I like you very much; I should like you to come and stay with me in the country." It struck me at the moment as being very unusual, because it was within five minutes of my first visit.

10,152. Did you ask him to go and stay with you?—Never.

10,153. Did you make a physical examination?—I did.

10,154. Did he tell you anything about his left eye?—Yes, he had received an injury to it some years previously. I examined it very carefully, but I saw no evidence of an injury, but on comparing the pupil of that eye with that of the right eye I noticed they were unequal and also that they were rather sluggish in reaction to light.

10,155. Was there any tremulousness?—Yes, I examined his tongue and lips, and he showed marked tremor of the tongue and lips; also his hands were in a very tremulous condition. I examined his tendon reflexes, they were certainly very exaggerated.

10,156. He was obviously in a very highly nervous condition?—Very highly.

10,157. He discussed his private quarrels and affairs with you, and so on?—Yes.

10,158. How long were you with him?—About half an hour I was in the house.

10,159. Now as to his mental condition, did you come to a definite conclusion there and then?—Yes. I did definitely.

10,160. What was it?—That he was of unsound mind.

10,161. There was no doubt about it?—There was no doubt about that.

10,162. Then had you been told about Moorcroft, that there was some suggestion of his going to Moorcroft?—Yes; Dr. Dempster told me that they had made an arrangement for him to go to Moorcroft.

10,163. Did you speak about Moorcroft to Mr. H.?—Not at that moment.

10,164. But at any time before you left the house?—Before I left the house I told him, "I understand you are going to a nursing home mutually arranged between you and Dr. Craig," and he said, "Yes," that, in fact, he had a number of his things packed.

10,165. He had them packed before you told him?—I remember seeing a trunk and various other articles being packed up in his room.

10,166. How did it come about that he went with you?—He seemed to be so agreeably disposed towards me. He asked me where I was going, and I told him I was going home. He said, "Now what about you driving me over to the place where I am going." I considered it very carefully, and I went back and talked it over with Dr. Dempster, and Dr. Dempster, who apparently was in a very anxious state of mind, said, "Now that he is so willing to go, and wishes to drive with you, do you mind taking him?" I again considered it, and I thought it a kindly act, and I said, "Yes, by all means. This is Sunday afternoon, and I can drive round that way." Mr. H. suggested that it would be very nice of me if I would take him, so he assented at once and we drove off, but he specially wished his two monkeys to go with him, and on looking at the monkeys I could see they would not give any trouble, so the two monkeys were put into the car and we drove off.

10,167. Earl Russell: Was he quite friendly all through the drive?—Perfectly.

10,168. Mr. Dickens: Is it true that you told him you were taking him to your own house?—Absolutely untrue.

10,169. Then did you drive together?—Yes.

10,170. And you left him at Moorcroft?—Yes.

10,171. Was that the last you saw of him?—Yes, until the other day.

10,172. The suggestion he made is, "I think it was a dreadfully wrong thing for him to spend his Sunday afternoon coming down and trapping a poor engineer in a workman's cottage."

Mr. Walter Stewart: Would you tell me the number of that question?

10,173. Mr. Dickens: 8687. (To the Witness): Is there any truth in the suggestion that you trapped him?—Absolutely no truth at all.

10,174. He was allowed to take what clothes he wanted?—Quite.

10,175. And his monkeys?—Yes.

10,176. Now with regard to your certificate; you had no doubt that it was your duty after your interview to sign that certificate, which you did sign dated on the 10th?—No.

10,177. The only other thing I want to ask you about is the sentence. "He exhibits the physical signs of general paralysis." First of all, is that true? Did he exhibit the physical signs of general paralysis?—Yes.

10,178. Now will you just explain to the Commission why you put that in your certificate?—Not to prove that he was insane—I thought it would be a guidance for those who would be looking after him;

Cross-examined by Mr. Walter Stewart.

10,184. Tell me, Dr. Phillips, who was it that put you in motion to visit Mr. H.?—Dr. Maurice Craig, as he was then.

10,185. You were in frequent touch with that gentleman at that time, were you not?—I cannot say frequent.

10,186. Seeing patients whom he was interested in?—No, not frequently.

10,187. You now hold a public appointment at Bethlem Royal Hospital?—I do.

10,188. I suppose you do not do this work any more—certifying in private cases?—I am often asked out to give an opinion.

10,189. Do you still certify?—Very seldom.

10,190. But occasionally?—Occasionally.

10,191. I need not ask you, you yourself appreciate the extreme gravity of such a step as certifying a person who had never previously been certified?—I do.

10,192. And that being the case, you would use every endeavour to make a really independent examination so as to arrive at an independent conclusion?—Yes.

10,193. How long were you occupied in your personal examination of Mr. H. on that 10th December?—I have stated about half an hour, as far as I can remember—and, of course, there was the journey in the car too.

10,194. I am not talking of that. You had already certified, had you not, when you got into the car?—No, I had not.

10,195. But you had decided to take the step?—Yes.

10,196. Were you told before ever you started off on that journey to Croydon that you were to try and get Mr. H. to enter a licensed house?—Not to my knowledge.

10,197. Not by Dr. Craig, as he then was?—No.

10,198. Then you had no idea when you went down that it was an object held in view by anybody to get Mr. H. into a licensed house—what is generally called a madhouse?—No. I remember Dr. Craig telling me on the 'phone that there was a question of his entering the place, but not instructing me to get him into it.

10,199. Did Dr. Craig ever say to you that he had disclosed to Mr. H. that he was going to have him put into a madhouse?—No, not to my knowledge.

10,200. And you never disclosed that to Mr. H.?—I told him he was going to a mental home.

10,201. Home you said. Mr. H. took a great fancy to you, did he not?—Apparently.

10,202. You would not regard that as evidence of any insanity on his part, would you?—It would so that it would really be a note for observation and treatment, if necessary, should the physical signs develop and not disappear.

10,179. I take it that, in addition to certifying that a man is mentally unsound, it is advisable to give all the information about his case to those who are going to treat him that you can, within your observation?—In my opinion, yes.

10,180. In other words, to certify not only why he is unsound in mind, but the reason why he is unsound in mind in your opinion?—Yes. I did not suggest that he was suffering from general paralysis, and that therefore he was insane; he had certain signs which suggested that he might develop into that condition.

10,181. Those notes may have been very useful to the doctors who came after?—Essential, I think, in the interest of the patient.

10,182. Mr. Jowitt: Such as the reflexes and the tremor of the tongue?—Yes, and the condition of the pupils.

10,183. Sir Humphry Rolleston: It is a short description, I suppose, in other words?—Yes.

Mr. Geoffrey Moseley: No questions.

be very ungracious on my part to suggest that, but to the extent to which he showed his appreciation of my presence—

10,203. Did not you lead him to understand that you would be glad for him to come and stay, to be taken care of by you?—Never, I never mentioned it to him.

10,204. I have got the passage in his evidence?—It is absolutely untrue.

10,205. (It is at Question 8291. Did you hear him give his evidence?—I did.

10,206. "He came with the usual story, that he was a friend of Maurice Craig's." You did that, did you not?—No, I did not say I was a friend of Dr. Craig's.

10,207. But you were a friend?—I hope I am a friend of his in the ordinary professional sense.

10,208. "And that he" (that is, you) "was to take me to his country house"?—Absolutely untrue, I never mentioned it.

10,209. "He examined my eyes with a little flashlamp, and he tried the knee-jerks—the clipping on the back of the knee-cap." You did those things?—Yes, I did.

10,210. So that, in that answer, the only part that is untrue is the part in which you said you were to take him to your country house?—And also as to my being a friend of Sir Maurice Craig, I do not agree to that—not in the ordinary sense.

10,211. You were, in fact, but you say you did not say so. How did you introduce yourself to Mr. H.?—I told him who I was and Dr. Dempster was with me, and I think Dr. Dempster helped to introduce me.

10,212. Do you say that neither of you said you were there as a friend of Dr. Craig?—Not to my knowledge, no.

10,213. I must take your recollection. I suggest it is extremely likely that that might have been said to explain your presence. You knew that Mr. H. regarded Dr. Craig as his personal friend?—Yes, as a great friend.

10,214. Do not you see, if he did know that you were a friend of Dr. Craig, that that would have been likely to predispose him in your favour and make him friendly to you?—It might have done.

10,215. You were eight years younger then than you are now?—Yes.

10,216. Now, that being so, just try and take your mind back. You had made up your mind that it would be desirable that he should be got away from Croydon?—No, I had not formed the opinion then.

10,217. Had not Dr. Craig communicated anything to you?—Not an independent opinion. He had suggested the doubt as to whether he was fit to remain there.

27 January, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN GEORGE PORTER PHILLIPS.

10,218. With that in your mind, going there to examine him for the purpose of seeing whether he should be certified, do not you see it is highly probable that you would seek to induce him to come, by a representation that was not the whole truth—that is likely, is it not?—No, I do not agree.

10,219. You would not tell a patient straight out to his face that you were proposing to take him to a madhouse, would you?—Certainly not.

10,220. And yet if you were proposing to take him anywhere, and Dr. Craig had put that in your mind and you communicated that to him, would not you in that case try to put it to the patient in as nice a way as possible?—I try to put everything in a nice way.

10,221. Did you not in that case?—Perhaps I did.

10,222. And was not that the way in which the proposal for that little drive first originated?—No.

10,223. That is what I suggest to you, and that is what Mr. H. has sworn?—That I disagree with.

10,224. Very well, I do not want to labour it unduly. If you did say such a thing as that, that you would like to take him to your country place, would not that make it very reasonable for him to say, "Well, I hope some day you will come and stay with me"?—If I had said so, but I did not.

10,225. It is a question of recollection, his memory against yours. I know that my client has been certified, his testimony is destroyed. But where it is oath against oath, we must do the best we can. As far as any physical examination is concerned, you have told us all you did—knee-jerks and reflexes?—Yes.

10,226. I know you will be quite fair with me, are not those signs equivocal?—Abnormal knee-jerks and defective reaction to light on the part of the pupils may be referable to a number of different causes, may they not?—Taking the whole range.

10,227. I am taking all you said?—Associated with that clinical picture that one saw.

10,228. Was not that coloured by the statement made to you beforehand that he was suffering from general paralysis of the insane?—I had not been told.

10,229. Had you not been told that?—No.

10,230. Do you mean to say you had not been told that?

Chairman: The witness has said he was not told.

Mr. Dickens: Where was it ever suggested to anybody else that they told him?

10,231. Mr. Walter Stewart: I was only going to put a question about that Wassermann test which had been made and as to whether that had not been communicated to him. (To the Witness:) Surely you had been told that?—Not by Dr. Craig.

10,232. By anyone?—By Dr. Dempster.

10,233. Be it so. Did not that colour your mind against Mr. H.?—It did not colour my mind; it helped me to form an opinion.

10,234. Upon the mere physical symptoms, the reflexes and knee-jerks, you would never surely put such a thing against a man as that he is suffering from general paralysis of the insane?

Chairman: He has never said so, Mr. Stewart; really, do try and be accurate. He said that he showed symptoms which were indicative of the early stages.

10,235. Mr. Walter Stewart: I know. (To the Witness:) You would never put that against him on those mere symptoms alone?—No, I would not. As a matter of fact, I may say that I teach that particular point, that one should not diagnose conditions like general paralysis of the insane.

10,236. Because of the terrible consequences to the patient?—I will not say "terrible"—they are grave.

10,237. Supposing a man's wife were told that, do not you see what that would mean for the rest of his life, for him and for her?—I certainly think if one diagnosed a condition of general paralysis and told the wife—

10,238. Do not you agree it ought to be kept as secret as possible until there is no longer the possibility of doubt?—I agree.

10,239. Do you think anything suggestive of such a fact should be put on a certificate until it has been probed to the very heart?—Under the conditions I think one would be lacking in one's duty not to mention those facts, that there were certain signs suggesting general paralysis.

10,240. We have been told by doctors who have been called here, Sir Maurice Craig amongst others, that that factor was not necessary for the purpose of certifying, and you agree there, do you not?—Oh, yes.

10,241. Sir David Drummond: It would have to do with the treatment?—Yes.

10,242. Mr. Walter Stewart: Sir Maurice was his physician, and he knew the fact, and he was visiting Moorcroft, and he could have told them at Moorcroft without writing it on the certificate?—Of course, I did not know that Dr. Craig was in possession of those facts. I was sent down as an independent individual to give an independent opinion.

10,243. And it was only put there for the purpose of guiding the person. Looked at now, with your present knowledge, do not you think there would have been a better way of doing it than putting it on that certificate?—I think, taking everything into consideration, at the time that was the best method of conveying that opinion to those who were to look after him.

10,244. Without seeking to make any aspersion upon you personally, this was all done behind his back, was it not?—No, I cannot say all.

10,245. Did you communicate to him any of those things which you put in that certificate?—I remember distinctly informing him that the anxiety he had caused was due to the fact that he was not mentally well.

10,246. Did you communicate to him the object with which you were asking these questions?—Which questions?

10,247. About testing his reflexes, testing his knee-jerks?—I told him I was examining his nervous system.

10,248. But not for the purpose of certifying him as a lunatic?—No; I should not do that.

10,249. I know you would not, that is just the mischief. And do not you see there was nothing to put him on his guard, or to enable him to defend himself in such a dangerous emergency?—I think it would stultify the whole thing.

10,250. Supposing there were a neutral representative who was entitled to see the doctor's report before ever a man is certified insane, do not you think that it would be fairer?—In very few cases, I should think.

10,251. Fairer, I am saying?—Fairer in a very few cases.

10,252. Do you think it is fair, in any case, that a man should be certified without himself or any agent on his behalf having any knowledge of what is being done?—In some cases I think it might be advisable to inform the patient, but I think those patients are very few in number.

10,253. Not the patients, but the representative who could act on his behalf. Would that not be better for you, even as a doctor?—It might be.

10,254. It would protect you, would it not?—Yes.

10,255. And would give the patient a better chance to explain, if the facts were communicated to his agent?—Yes.

10,256. Now everybody admits, if I may be allowed to say this, that the conduct of affairs in Bethlem Hospital is better, perhaps, than any other institution of the kind in England. There they do not try and take advantage of patients by keeping them in the dark, do they—by deceiving them?—That is a thing we do not ever adopt—deception.

10,257. You try to avoid deception as far as the patient is concerned?—Certainly.

10,258. Is there anything more calculated to destroy a man's equilibrium than the suspicion that he is being deceived and kept in the dark?—I think it is a very dangerous thing to do.

27 January, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN GEORGE PORTER PHILLIPS.

10,259. Now, when once he is there in the institution, do not you think it would be desirable that there should be someone who should have the right to represent him on the occasion of his trying to get his discharge?—I presume he has.

10,260. On inquisition proceedings?—The relatives.

10,261. But sometimes, you will agree with me, there are interested petitioners whose interest is personal to themselves and not to the patient?—There may be occasional cases.

Re-examined by Mr. H. C. Dickens.

10,266. It is suggested that a neutral person should be invited in on these occasions when there is a question of certifying a patient. Do you consider yourself a partisan in the matter in any case—do you consider yourself in any other light than that of a neutral in these matters?—Perfectly neutral.

10,267. You have no interest in the matter one way or the other?—Not at all.

10,268. Do you see the necessity for any other neutral to come in? Are you acting in anybody else's interest than that of the patient?—Only in the patient's interests.

10,269. Mr. Jowitt: How far would the presence of a third person interfere with the intimacy you wish to establish?—I think it would interfere to an enormous extent. I think in order to gain the confidence of the patient you must, if possible, be alone with the patient. That is my experience.

Mr. Walter Stewart: May I say it is not suggested that the doctor should not see him alone. The doctors make a report, and then at the judicial enquiry the doctor should be a witness, and subject to cross-examination. I do not know whether you have the case which has been drafted on behalf of the Society before you. That is what I am reading here.

10,270. Chairman: That is a general question of much interest. The stage of certification is a very important and critical one in the patient's career?—Yes.

10,271. It is the stage at which the law intervenes for the first time?—Yes.

10,272. What we are all so interested in is the question of the legal safeguards, as you know. I am afraid we have dealt with it with much reiteration?—Yes.

10,273. Personally (I do not know how far I speak for my colleagues) I am very puzzled at that stage. One is so apt to look at things from the point of view of regulations on paper; but if one is able to use one's imagination and visualise cases as they must come before the medical practitioner from day to day, it is helpful to try and reconstruct the situation. Suppose we have an ordinary case of a patient who is living at home, has begun to give anxiety to the relatives and to the ordinary medical attendant: now in such a case is it the usual practice to invite a consultant to come in and consult with the general practitioner who is attending the case?—Not always.

10,274. Earl Russell: It is partly a question of means, I suppose?—Chiefly, I should think.

10,275. Chairman: We must assume that the case has given anxiety to somebody, and is, therefore, already in the pathological region, so to speak. Now do some cases suddenly develop acute symptoms in their home?—Undoubtedly.

10,276. And is it necessary in some cases, either for the welfare of the patient, or for the protection of the public, or for both, that some immediate steps should be taken?—Yes.

10,277. I mean that some immediate form of control is necessary?—Urgently, yes.

10,278. Can those forms of control be put in operation in a private house where a patient is living in his own home?—I presume so, yes.

10,279. Can you get in nurses and restrain the patient for the time being?—If funds are forthcoming?—Yes.

10,262. Is not that a terrible danger to the patient?—If it exists, yes.

10,263. Answer me, I know you will, fairly, has not your attention been called to cases in which husbands, from interested motives, have tried and succeeded in getting their wives certified, and vice versa?—It has been alleged, but I have not any experience of it.

10,264. Have you never known a case?—Not personally.

10,265. You have heard of such cases from other doctors?—Yes.

10,280. I suppose in many cases the absence of means would prevent it?—Absence of means and perhaps absence of adequate facilities for looking after the patient.

10,281. Suppose the patient happens to be the mother or father in a home where there are a number of children, with few rooms, and limited means, has some step to be taken to cover such a case?—Undoubtedly.

10,282. That, of course, I take to be the explanation of the urgency order which is provided for under the Act?—Yes.

10,283. Then that, I take it, is a step at which something has to be done at once, and at that stage it would be impossible, would it not, to have the kind of investigation that is suggested, namely, a magisterial investigation with yourself or the other consultant cross-examined, and so on?—Quite impossible under those conditions.

10,284. Therefore there must be some provision, somebody must be trusted for at least the temporary detention?—Yes.

10,285. Of course, as one knows, the urgency order expires in seven days?—Yes.

10,286. Then you come on to the next stage, where the more deliberate procedure is required for a reception order. Now there the magistrate, of course, intervenes?—Yes.

10,287. The patient may be seen by the magistrate or not, as we understand?—Yes.

10,288. If the patient were present with the magistrate, would it be injurious, do you think, to have the patient's condition discussed in the presence of the magistrate?—In many cases I think it would be very bad for the patient.

10,289. On the other hand, outside the presence of the patient, though I am afraid Mr. Stewart would call this behind his back, if the patient were not present—

Mr. Walter Stewart: If his agent were.

10,290. Chairman: Shall we say behind the back of the patient, but in the presence of his agent—if the investigation were so carried out, do you think that that would be likely to be protective? If we are to have the kind of cross-examination which we have had here for two or three days of medical experts, do you think that would be likely to lead to assisting the magistrate materially upon the problem before him?—I think in some cases it might eliminate a good deal of controversy.

10,291. Of course, the difficulty that one sees would be this, that you would have no doubt examination, and I suppose cross-examination, and possibly proceedings more resembling an inquisition, would you not?—Yes, I presume that would be so.

10,292. You would have possibly rival evidence, and so on?—Yes.

10,293. Mr. Jowitt: May I ask on that, what sort of agent have you in mind—is he going to receive instructions from the patient—the invalid?—I can see the difficulty at once: Who is going to be the agent, and who is to instruct him?

10,294. The question being: Is the man of unsound mind? To say he is to appoint an agent to resist or support his treatment, as the case may be, seems to me to beg the question.

27 January, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN GEORGE PORTER PHILLIPS.

10,295. Chairman: One is anxious to investigate the question; one wants to explore the possibilities of it in reality rather than merely on paper.—It is a difficult point.

10,296. It is a difficult point, but take the point that Mr. Jowitt put. Who is to instruct the agent in the case figured? The agent might be equally open to the instructions of those designing relatives we have heard of, on the one hand, or to receive instructions from the subject of the investigation. It is difficult to see where else he would get instructions from.

Mr. Jowitt: Could you have somebody like the "Soldier's friend"?

Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Walter Stewart: That was the first suggestion. The justice is to do it, according to our suggestion.

Chairman: The difficulty about the justice is this. We have heard, and I have no doubt there is some truth in the criticism, that justices vary very much in the conception of their functions. Some will be much more perfunctory than others in the discharge of their duties.

Witness: Some justices insist on seeing the patient; they are very few.

10,297. That is a matter we shall have to consider. It is a question of the relation of procedure to the whole matter of certification, and it is hedged about with embarrassments.

10,298. Earl Russell: Have you ever known a justice insist on seeing either of the certifying doctors?—No, I have no knowledge of that.

Earl Russell: He has the power to, I take it, as the Act stands.

10,299. Chairman: He has. Now may I take it, Dr. Phillips, that in a large proportion of the cases there is really comparatively little difficulty?—Yes, I think, speaking generally, difficulties should not arise, and I do not think they do arise.

10,300. On the other hand, that is no reason why the exceptional case should not be protected, the rarer case which does arise?—Not at all.

10,301. And there are cases of difficulty, the borderland case, as we have always heard it described. What one is so anxious about is to see that there are adequate precautions for the full investigation of such a case, before the very serious step of depriving a person of his liberty results?—Yes.

10,302. A case, possibly, upon which even the most expert alienists might differ in opinion, a case in the balance. As one knows, opinions do differ sometimes. It might depend upon the action of the particular alienist who was called in whether the person was or was not deprived of his liberty?—Yes.

10,303. Sir Humphry Rolleston: With regard to the question of a neutral agent, that neutral agent would protect theoretically the alleged lunatic or suspected lunatic, against, on the one hand, any designing relatives, and, on the other hand, any liability on the part of our profession to certify unduly easily?—Yes.

10,304. With regard to the relatives, would it be fair to regard the judicial authority as representing their interests?—I do not think so.

10,305. You would not regard the judicial authority as taking the part of the alleged lunatic?—I think that the judicial authority in the exercise of his duties would be studying the case from the patient's point of view.

10,306. Exactly; that is what I mean. Then, from the point of view of the profession, is it not true that, at the present, the profession are very loth to certify unless they are driven to it?—Very loth. In fact, I know many doctors at the present time who refuse to have anything to do with mental patients.

10,307. I want to bring that out, because I believe it is the case that a very considerable number of people in Bethlem are not certified?—Nearly 50 per cent. of them,

10,308. Chairman: If we saw our way to recommend a provisional stage in the history of the patient's career, would not that eliminate a great deal of this difficulty? Suppose we had the type of case you are figuring, the borderland case, as to which you may be called upon to give an opinion at once: would not a very large measure of protection be enjoyed by the patient if, before the serious step of certification were taken, these borderland cases were retained under observation and time afforded for a fuller medical investigation of the case?—Undoubtedly, that is the procedure one would recommend.

10,309. It does occur to one that possibly the escape, on the one hand, from the over-elaboration of what one may call the legal element, and, on the other hand, from the risk which we have heard occurs in certain cases, might be secured by the interposition of this provisional period of observation?—Yes.

10,310. It seems to afford, possibly, the solution, I do not say necessarily that it does, but it may afford a solution, or at least a mitigation, of the risk which undoubtedly does exist?—Yes.

10,311. However, I do not think it is quite fair to go back again with you on these general questions, because you have been already good enough to give us evidence.

10,312. Sir David Drummond: Is it not a fact that, with regard to a considerable proportion of patients who are certified, it would be impossible to introduce this tribunal—in acute cases, I mean?—Yes.

10,313. Cases requiring an urgency order?—Yes.

10,314. It would be impossible to introduce this question of an agent?—Of course, the patient could not appoint an agent, in a very acute case, or an acute maniacal condition; it would be quite impossible for the patient to appoint the agent.

10,315. So that it could not be made universal, as it were?—No.

10,316. Mr. Jowitt: You and the medical profession would be only too pleased if you could shift what must be sometimes a very serious responsibility on to some other shoulders?—Undoubtedly; the feeling of the profession is very strong at the present moment.

10,317. Mr. Snell: I would be very glad if you would help me on a matter that has arisen in your evidence. Is the regulation of the patient's reflexes within his own volition?—Yes, he can exercise an influence over his reflexes—not the pupil reflex.

10,318. The argument has been that if the patient had known for what purpose he was being examined it might have made some difference to his condition. What I want to find out is whether, if a patient had known for what purpose the examination was taking place, he could have normalised his reflexes?—He might have controlled them to some extent. It depends upon whether he knows what "normal" means. The knee reflex he might control.

Mr. Walter Stewart: That never was asked him.

10,319. Earl Russell: On the question of a tribunal, do you happen to know anything about the proceedings with regard to pauper lunatics in Islington. I am told there is something rather resembling a tribunal there?—No.

10,320. I would be very glad if any medical man of your eminence could tell us what he thinks of that, from the point of view of effect on the patient?—I am sorry to say I have no knowledge of that.

10,321. Mr. Micklem: May I ask you about the patients in Bethlem—you say 50 per cent. are not certified?—Sometimes it is 50 sometimes below—over 40 at any rate.

10,322. Now in the ordinary course there is no reason why any of those should ever get certified. They may get treated and discharged, or they may get worse, but still, if they do not ask for their discharge you would not get them certified?—Did you mention treated at home?

10,323. No, in the hospital.—I did not gather what you said.

27 January, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN GEORGE PORTER PHILLIPS.

10,324. I am afraid my question was not clear. There is no reason why these cases which are not now certified should ever be certified?—No; many of them are never certified.

10,325. Many of them would be cured and get a discharge ultimately?—Yes.

10,326. Many others would get worse, but there would be no reason to certify them unless they asked for their discharge, would there?—To conform with the law, of course, if a patient develops serious delusions, and yet does not ask for his discharge I think it is the idea of the authorities that the patient should be certified, because his volitional power is impaired at the time.

10,327. Earl Russell: You mean the Board of Control would make you do it?—They suggest it.

10,328. Mr. Micklem: Do you mean these are not voluntary boarders?—Becoming worse, as you suggest.

10,329. A voluntary boarder becoming worse is not necessarily certified, is he?—It depends to what extent his mental state has reached an abnormal condition. There are voluntary boarders whom I certainly consider should be detained on that status, and yet they have got very much worse; but if a patient becomes seriously ill mentally, then, of course, in order to conform with the law you have to certify.

10,330. But there is nothing in the law, is there, which says that a voluntary boarder, who becomes more insane than he was when he first became a boarder, should be certified?—No.

Mr. Dickens: Otherwise you could not keep him if he wanted to go.

10,331. Mr. Micklem: Then how about the voluntary boarder who is insane, but is not wildly insane, we will say?—I see your point, and I must say I am in harmony with your view that perhaps the patient who goes in voluntarily should remain on that status; but, of course, the Board of Control do not like to see a patient who is acutely ill mentally, perhaps in a state of confusion or maniacal excitement, who is not certified.

10,332. Earl Russell: The pressure really comes from the Board of Control, not from the doctor?—On their visits I have had suggestions made that certain patients are not on a proper footing as voluntary patients, and should be observed with a view to certification.

10,333. Chairman: Are the voluntary patients paying patients?—A voluntary boarder may be a fee-paying patient or a free patient.

10,334. The gravity of the position is this, if he is a paying patient and then is manifestly insane, you are at once in breach of the law, which says that no person should be detained for gain who is insane. I see your difficulty. A voluntary person comes in, anxious to have the shelter of your institution, and then, as Mr. Micklem puts it, while there develops the most maniacal symptoms; what is to be done?—You cannot take any money from him after that because you would be contravening the law. Then he might equally say—one form of his delusion might be, "I want to go away." In such a case in the interest of the patient himself you would require to take some step. You would have to proceed to certification?—Yes.

10,335. It is a question whether it should be done in the same institution or not—that is another question, as we have heard?—We now suggest that such patients should leave the hospital if they can—if the physical or mental condition will warrant it.

10,336. That is to avoid the unfortunate idea which might prevail that a voluntary patient going into one of those institutions, more or less inevitably becomes a certified patient. I mean that that idea should get abroad would be most unfortunate?—Yes, the patient would feel you were taking advantage of him.

10,337. Earl Russell: When you did have to certify them at the end, I remember that the procedure was letting the relieving officer take them?—Not at Bethlem.

10,338. Chairman: It does seem in one sense a very cruel thing as regards a patient who has come voluntarily into your institution for treatment, and then unfortunately becomes acute; some step has to be taken, and you say, "Well, in order to keep up the reputation of my institution as a voluntary institution I cannot have you certified here," and the unhappy person is removed to some other place, to go through the necessary procedure, before he can come back to you as a certified patient. I can imagine that would inflict great hardship?—We try to avoid hardship. A doctor will come in and carry out the certification at Bethlem itself. A case occurred only the other day; a boy who came in, I think he was about 22 years of age—he came in as a voluntary patient, quite willingly, and the very next day he refused to remain; he wished to go, and yet he was in an acute melancholic condition, and perhaps suicidally inclined, and yet under his condition, when he definitely wished to leave the hospital he was allowed to go home; then his own practitioner certified, and he came back the same day.

10,339. That was comparatively an easy case?—He was handed over to responsible persons.

10,340. You kept him under a certain kind of charge?—Undoubtedly.

10,341. If he were of his own volition to say, "I want to go away now; I shall just be in time to be decapitated by the 6.50 express," of course you would not allow a man to go away under those circumstances, even if he were a voluntary patient?—Even if he were a voluntary patient.

10,342. Sir David Drummond: Cannot you detain them at all?—According to the agreement with a voluntary patient, 24 hours' notice has to be given.

10,343. Mr. Jowitt: It would not be a bad thing if that were given the force of law, and you had the right to detain them?—We do, really.

10,344. Earl Russell: What has been your general experience?—In some cases, of course, they show resentment. They think an unfair advantage has been taken of them: "I came to your hospital of my own free will; when I became worse you certified me," and it does always rankle in the mind of some patients.

10,345. Mr. Micklem: Take the case of a person coming in who is insane, but who is neither a danger to himself nor to other people; supposing after he has been with you six or ten months, and is getting rather worse and claims to be discharged, should you let him go?—It all depends. It is rather difficult unless you have a specific case, to consider the various symptoms. But, generally speaking, if one considers that he is a person of unsound mind in the ordinary meaning, then one has to take precautions if he leaves the hospital, and he has to be handed over to responsible individuals; or, if it is decided to retain him, owing to his marked mental symptoms, then the relatives are asked to take the step of certification, and the petitioner signs the petition, and the two visiting doctors will then sign their certificates, and he is retained; he may be retained for further treatment, or retained for the time being, to be transferred eventually to another institution.

Chairman: I am afraid we have strayed a good deal beyond the immediate topic of Mr. H.'s case, but we are much indebted to you for your contribution to our discussion.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Mr. Walter Stewart: On the point of urgency, may I direct your attention to this case. It is in the same case of Whitfield, at page 132. "Mr. Hillman is not alleged to have been a raving and dangerous lunatic. The Common Law always allowed the restraint of the liberty of such persons." That would meet the urgency point. In our case there is no suggestion about urgency, as you have noticed.

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Chairman: We are going to hear all that from Mr. Parker shortly.

Mr. Walter Stewart: If you please.

Chairman: May I make a suggestion to you, Mr. Dickens? As regards Dr. Cole's evidence, I understand that he is coming before us later on in another capacity. As to this particular case of Mr. H., I think, if we may suggest it, we have really had as much medical evidence as it is desirable to have upon it; and we may assure Dr. Cole that there is really nothing more he can contribute to the case that will assist us. We have heard both sides very fully. I quite understand some things were said against Dr. Cole.

Mr. Dickens: He is anxious to give a denial to the outrageous charges made against him, so long as the public understands—

Chairman: I think it is enough if you say that Dr. Cole is in attendance here to-day and is prepared to counter the allegations against his professional conduct. I think if that goes on the note that will be sufficient.

Mr. Dickens: If you please.

Chairman: On the general matter we will hear Dr. Cole later on.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: With regard to Moorcroft, there were one or two points on which, had Dr. Cole been called, I should have asked questions, but that also, it seems to me, has been explored.

Chairman: I think it has been fully explored.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I think it has been explored somewhat fully; and, unless the Commission think I can be of any further assistance upon the Moorcroft case, I propose to abstain from calling him as my witness.

Chairman: I think you have exercised a wise discretion. We have gone fully into the H. case, and we are obliged to the parties who have assisted us.

Mr. Dickens: I hope my clients have been of some assistance to the Commission in their investigation. It has been very distasteful and very unpleasant to have these charges made against them in public, and it has been a very expensive matter. If you think they have assisted you in your investigation, they have clearly done a public service, and it is very unfair that the Medical Defence Union should have to pay that. I do ask you to recommend the Government to make a grant towards the expenses to which my clients have been put in this matter as part of the expenses.

Chairman: We have no power to deal with costs in any shape or form; but as regards individual witnesses who have come, you know the very restricted scale upon which witnesses who attend are reimbursed. I doubt very much whether it would be within our province to make such a recommendation as you have indicated, although I fully recognise the hardship entailed upon your clients. However, we shall consider the matter.

Mr. Dickens: If you please.

Mr. Croom-Johnson: I make the same application on behalf of my clients, who have no Defence Union behind them, and who have come here on their own charges.

Chairman: We certainly are obliged to all the parties who have taken part in this investigation.

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER called and examined.

10,346. Chairman: Mr. Parker, are you Chairman of the National Society for Lunacy Reform?—I am.

10,347. When did you become Chairman?—I recently became Chairman, about three months ago, on the resignation of Mr. Bailey Weaver owing to ill-health.

10,348. I think you are also a member of the Bar?—I am, but I do not practise.

10,349. With regard to the Society which you represent to-day, I think it was founded in June of 1920?—That is correct.

10,350. And it has now a membership of just under 1,000?—Yes.

10,351. Will you tell us the objects of the Society?—The Society was originally formed to press for a reform in the Lunacy Laws—that was its primary object—and also to investigate the general position, to offer advice to ex-patients, or anybody else interested in lunacy matters; and in carrying out those objects it has sent a succession of deputations to the different Governments: one to Sir Alfred Mond in 1922, another to Mr. Neville Chamberlain in 1923, and to Mr. Wheatley in 1924. Then it also tried to stir up public interest by obtaining signatures to a petition to Mr. Wheatley that a Royal Commission might be appointed. I may say, Sir, that the Society has always taken a very strong view that this matter should never have been investigated except by tribunals who could hear evidence on oath; and perhaps it would not be out of place to mention here that for that reason no evidence was given before Sir Cyril Cobb's Committee.

10,352. I think the services which your Society render are voluntary except for the payment of your small permanent staff?—Yes, purely voluntary.

10,353. How do you manage to carry on?—We are supported by our members, and also, at times, by quite considerable contributions.

10,354. You get subscriptions from people who are interested?—Subscriptions from the public. They vary very much, and on more than one occasion, of course, those interested in the Society have had to maintain it temporarily.

10,355. Do you issue reports?—Yes, but I should say that in that respect, of course, the Society with its growth is changing rapidly. We hold an annual public meeting.

10,356. It would be rather interesting if we might see the reports of the Society; you no doubt have printed reports of some sort?—Yes. I rather think the last one was typed, but it will be brought this afternoon.

10,357. I would rather like to read the reports of your work if you will be good enough to make them available to us?—Yes.

10,358. I understand that you find yourselves brought largely in contact with persons who have been patients in institutions?—We have a continuous stream of people calling. That is really one of the difficulties of our work, that we cannot deal adequately, both because of the limitation of our staff and the limitation of our finance, with the matters which are brought to our attention both in correspondence and personally.

10,359. That part of your work must obviously be difficult?—It is very difficult.

10,360. Do you, personally, interview ex-patients sometimes?—I do on occasions. Of course, I have seen a certain number since the Commission was appointed.

10,361. No doubt that has attracted a certain amount of public notice?—No; I think most of our patients we have had in hand from before then, but we are getting them every day.

10,362. I observe that you assist them to obtain the documents upon which they have been certified?—That is almost the invariable feature of all our proceedings; they come to us not knowing why they have been certified, not having the slightest idea; and in our first talk with them we try to ascertain what is in their mind. Then in giving them advice we give them a statutory form to fill up and ultimately they get copies of their certificates from the Board of Control.

10,363. Earl Russell: Is that a kindness to them?—I think it is a very great relief to their minds.

10,364. Chairman: There is, of course, just a point of view on this, and I am going to put all sorts of points of view because I am sure you will be most helpful to us. We have read this excellent and

27 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

instructive précis of yours with great interest; and if any of us are critical, I am sure you will appreciate that it is because we want to explore these matters from a practical point of view, and we want to put everything to you. Lord Russell's point strikes me, looking at the matter from the human aspect, as an observation worth examination. One would feel that when one had had an unhappy episode in one's life, assuming perfectly justifiable detention, and a case where everything had been all right, the last thing one would want to do would be to dwell upon the past, when one had emerged from that phase and returned to normal life. You want to make a fresh start instead of brooding on it again?—I quite see the point, and I can only answer it from those cases I have investigated myself. I cannot recall a single instance in which the patient was not relieved at hearing what was the matter with him, simply for the reason that, in many cases, for months and for years he had been trying to find out, and the moment he did find out he could direct his mind to that point; he might not agree with the finding on the certificate, but, undoubtedly, in all the cases I have seen, he was vastly relieved. Up to the time they have come to us they have practically been pawing the air to find out what is wrong with them.

10,365. Then the cases that come before you will all be cases where the patient has not recognised the propriety of his or her detention?—I should not like to say all. Of course, a great number of them are anxious to make complaints; that is the second aspect we get, people who think they have been wrongly detained, and I should like to add to that a very common feature, and that is, people who are so impressed with their own sufferings that they come to us and say they would like to join in our work and bring relief to others in a similar condition.

10,366. One quite appreciates that attitude of mind, but you tell us that a number of people wish to see the documents upon which they have been certified. Of course, I will assume that these must be people who are not satisfied as to the propriety of their treatment?—The great majority, I should not like to say all.

10,367. And these are people who think, rightly or wrongly, that they have cause to complain of the way in which they have been dealt with?—That is so.

10,368. Then a first step which they take, I understand, is to get the documents upon which they have been certified and which they then see for the first time?—We see them; they are generally sent to us, not always, and then we hand them over to the person concerned, and generally we keep copies of them for reference.

10,369. It is just at that point that this difficulty does occur to one. Let us assume for the moment the case has been a perfectly proper one for detention, and the certificate discloses for the first time to these persons what was wrong with them at the time, and the history of a series of acts which, fortunately, have entirely passed out of the recollection of this person, because one knows that, on recovery, a great many things mercifully disappear from the mind?—Quite.

10,370. You find that the wife or husband of the patient has had to recount and record many unhappy family incidents which were necessary to the case. I do feel there that you may be just renewing the whole distress again by giving this person for the first time the notion, "Oh, that was how I came to be in there, and that was what was said of me," and so on, causing just a renewal of the old unhappiness?—I can only speak from my experience; we have not come across a case of that sort. Inevitably there seems to be a relief; and when you say they see the whole details, of course, these certificates are very brief. We frequently get patients saying, "That is quite true, but that only lasted a week or 10 days, and I have been there for months or years." We get nothing at present beyond the original certificate.

10,371. Earl Russell: It is also a record of acts which they may have done which they would very much regret being reminded of.—I can only say we do not find it.

10,372. Chairman: This very case which you have brought before us seems rather to exhibit that feature, because had it not been for the certificates being brought to Mr. H.'s knowledge he would never have known, nor would any member of the public have known, that there had even been a suggestion that he exhibited symptoms of general paralysis of the insane. Now Mr. H. has had that most distressing side brought to his knowledge and to the knowledge of other persons which would never have reached them at all, had it not been for these very proceedings.—I quite see the point, and it seems to me that the question of mentality comes in. I do not think until you fully grasp, as we try to grasp, the atmosphere in the asylum, that you can, if I may say so, give full sympathy to the state of mind in which the patient comes out. I am very much struck, as one gets further into the subject, with the state of mind in which they do come out. I am reminded that Mr. H. looked into the case book of Moorcroft, and that is how it came to his knowledge.

10,373. That may be more unfortunate still. You see the point is rather a general question in medical practice; it is not always desirable to tell a patient what he is suffering from. It may be a death sentence to do so.—I suppose it is one of the difficult points in medical practice, but may I suggest this, that a decision on that point presupposes a very detailed knowledge of your patient, as to whether you shall tell him or not.

10,374. That is a question of the adequacy of the investigation—we shall come to that.—Quite.

10,375. But it is just at the very outset of your evidence, when you told us that you had seen a number of these people, interested as you are in their welfare, that one finds on this whole topic as on so many questions that there are two sides; indeed you develop them yourself as you go through your own précis; and the balancing of those two counter considerations seems to be the most difficult task that could be set to anyone.—I quite agree.

10,376. Now we are asking you about the day-to-day work of your Association. A number of persons come to you from day to day and you interview them: Do you find that these people are all reliable people to talk to?—No, far from it; there is a sifting process which goes on, and, of course, it is only fair to tell you that there are a certain number of them who, when they find we cannot give them financial assistance, or cannot help them in contemplated litigation, drop us. Of course, that is another point that is frequently cropping up, the litigious ideas these people have, and possibly rightly.

10,377. I can see that the task of sifting, as you have described it, must be one of great difficulty?—Very great.

10,378. And you come to the conclusion that in a certain number of cases their grievances are imaginary and unfounded?—Yes, I think generally one could admit that.

10,379. On the other hand, some of the cases seem to you to present genuine features meriting investigation?—Unquestionably, and our only regret is that the cost of investigation, especially at a distance, is prohibitive really. Our investigations are really limited, except in rare cases, to London and round about. We cannot send people up to the North of England; there are the hotel and railway expenses. We cannot get access to any official information.

10,380. How many people come to you in the course of a year?—That is a question which I find it very difficult to answer; I should think the letter book would answer it the best. We do not keep any file of cases. I mean a case may involve a couple or three letters, or it may run on to a very long file of correspondence stretching over months. I think our Secretary could answer you better than I could.

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,381. One only wants a rough idea of how many cases come under your cognisance, let us say, in a twelvemonth?—Personally?

10,382. Of your Society.—I should think it is quite a common case to have five or six people come in the morning, and ten or a dozen letters to go out, sometimes much more.

10,383. Of course, some of these are people coming back to see you?—Undoubtedly.

10,384. Earl Russell: There may be a thousand cases a year, or more?—Perhaps, I might just enquire.

10,385. Chairman: Yes, please enquire?—Our Secretary informs me that he thinks there are about 150 to 200 new cases a year.

10,386. That is quite sufficient for our purpose—and of those, how many do you think you have found to merit real consideration and investigation in each year?—Certainly, the bulk of them bring up points which we try and investigate. I mean our views are based, really, on investigating those cases.

10,387. Of those 150 to 200 cases that come before you in the course of the year, in how many cases have you found matters which, in your opinion, involve serious issues?—I think most of them raise questions that we should like to investigate, and then as we get complaints coming from various quarters we get a sort of cumulative weight of evidence; we get something up in the north and something in a couple of asylums just outside London, all speaking to the same thing. Then we begin to get evidence which we feel is of some value.

10,388. Then, I suppose, your investigations are entirely independent of medical advice?—Quite.

10,389. You do not have any professional man on your Council, do you, to assist you in investigating the cases?—Yes, we have both on our Council and on our Executive Committee, professional men and ladies, who are of very great assistance to us—experts. I should qualify that answer.

10,390. As regards your own personal experience, have you visited any asylums or licensed houses?—I have this year visited one licensed house and my home county asylum, the former many times, as it happens.

10,391. Which is your own county asylum?—Hertfordshire.

10,392. And in investigating cases, what means have you at your disposal. You told us, first of all, that the patient is entitled, as we know, to get copies of the certificates. Beyond that, what practical steps can you take?—Well, there are very few. We can get access to no official records. We get support and statements from the relatives. In many cases they are just as annoyed about the facts as the ex-patient, and occasionally, but not very often, we take up references to other patients in the same asylum who have got out. Of course, we send down sometimes a visitor to the asylum and check facts which have been put before us by conversation with inmates.

10,393. Do you have the authority of the ex-patients to make the investigation for them?—Yes, undoubtedly.

10,394. I can imagine it must be a task of very great difficulty?—It is a task which, to be properly carried out, would require a very big organisation, which we have not got, frankly.

10,395. But whatever the size of the organisation, it is a very difficult task?—Very difficult.

10,396. Earl Russell: Are these complaints which could not properly be made to the Board of Control?—Well, Sir, I think, speaking of all these patients, or most of the patients we see, they are tired of corresponding with the Board of Control; the most of them have in their time corresponded, and we certainly get a consensus of opinion that that correspondence leads to nothing; and there are patients who have corresponded with the Board of Control since they came out, and who have received very courteous replies, but they do not advance the matter at all, so then they come to us.

10,397. Chairman: So far as the Board of Control is concerned, after the patient has left the institution, they have really no further concern with him, have they? Their function is to look after the patients while they are in the institution?—Yes. I think it is only fair to say that I understand they do go into complaints if they are lodged by patients after they come out.

Earl Russell: A case of ill-treatment?

10,398. Chairman: Of course, they would have to investigate a case of ill-treatment, but their actual duty relates to the patients in the institution?—Quite. I think it is only where their management or their control is impugned that they do, I understand, give quite an attentive ear, but nothing ever comes of it as regards the patient. I am reminded that in the Harnett case it was held that they were not acting. You will remember that Harnett went back to the Board of Control and they had no duty to act.

10,399. No, but you have pointed out quite rightly, and it must be the case, that if anything has arisen during the period of detention, then, of course, it is their business to investigate it?—Quite.

10,400. But you say nothing is done for the patient. What could be done?—You mean if he lodges a complaint?

10,401. Yes. We will assume that he is out, that he has come to you and that he says he should never have been detained; and then suppose you wrote, or he wrote, to the Board of Control stating that fact, complaining that he has been unlawfully detained: What would you suggest the Board of Control should do?—Personally, the view I am driven to over and over again is that nothing but an action will be the slightest good. We have only the patient's statements, which may be very convincing on the face of them; we cannot check them; and time and time again one feels that this thing ought to be investigated, but it means an action, and the patient has no money to carry it out.

10,402. And, of course, litigation has to be avoided always when one can avoid it; but the suggestion is that the Board of Control does nothing. But whatever body was established, supposing it were the local authority, there would be just the same difficulty?—I agree. I think complaints when patients come out may not be very profitable. One would rather have a system where complaints were dealt with when they arose.

10,403. Prevention is better than cure?—Quite.

10,404. Earl Russell: Of course, if a patient complains of detention after the patient is free there is not much the Board of Control can do?—No; it is a matter of opinion.

10,405. I mean supposing he is right, they cannot take up an action for damages against the certifying doctor?—No.

10,406. Chairman: But when one is told of the impotence of an institution, one wants to know in what respect they are failing to perform their duty; but you are more concerned, I take it, with the prevention of the occurrence of cases?—I think that is the real line of advance.

10,407. I think we should sympathise with that aspect, if I may say so. Now may we just pursue the general line of your précis, if you please. You next give us an historical résumé of the law on this subject. Now generally, of course, the law has been progressive, has it not?—Certainly, yes.

10,408. No one at the present day would seek to justify the methods by which insane people were treated in the past, which were both inhuman and unscientific?—Quite.

10,409. And do you recognise that the legislative history of this matter has been progressive?—Undoubtedly, yes.

10,410. May one take it also that the progress has at least been animated by a desire to produce adequate safeguards?—I think so, undoubtedly.

27 January, 1925.]

MR. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,411. The subject, as you point out in your précis, has been the topic of repeated investigations at the public instance from time to time?—Intermittent, yes.

10,412. The subject is one, is it not, which has more than once enlisted, not only the public interest, but the public suspicion?—Very much so.

10,413. As one knows, it has been a topic of literary discussion, as well as scientific discussion?—Yes.

10,414. And consequent upon those successive investigations may we take it that the last effort of the Legislature is what we have now before us in the code of 1890?—Yes.

10,415. Therefore probably the most profitable task to which we can address ourselves is considering with you whether the existing code with its safeguards really adequately achieves its purpose?—Quite. Since this was drafted you have had a lot of information. It is on your notes, I think, but I should like just to emphasise one point. If one takes a wholesale view of this legislation it does seem to me to point to this: a constant difference of opinion, quite a genuine difference of opinion, between the medical authority and the legal authority. I tried to make that clear from the earliest days. The medical people in the early days were the reformers. Then legislation came about which gradually limited their powers; and, of course, as you know, in 1890 the final limitation was made, that there might be no certification without the intervention of a magistrate. That, as it seems to us, is the important point of the legislation of 1890.

10,416. It does emerge from a consideration of this legislation that at first the doctor was in a very autocratic position, was he not?—Well, Sir, I think he was in an autocratic position, but he was a great reformer. I do not think anybody would wish to belittle the work which medicine did for the lunatics, especially under Lord Shaftesbury's guidance all through the early part of last century or the middle of last century.

10,417. But their position was certainly a trusted one, and it was a position which they used to reform the law?—To reform the law?

10,418. If you will select any other phrase?—?—I think they started in a position of absolute autocracy; that is, in the old days, when the physician or even the apothecary was allowed to certify.

10,419. I have seen some of the old certificates, and they are very interesting.—Yes. Then there was a gradual limitation brought about by public agitation, in which the law seems to have re-asserted that side of the question, namely, the liberty of the subject.

10,420. Now, of course, if we had an ideal medical profession (my medical colleagues will pardon me), you would not require any legal control—if you had a profession which was all-wise in the matter?—Yes.

10,421. And you point to this, that there has been in the legislation an increasing introduction of the legal element?—A re-assertion, I should like to put it.

10,422. Would you add, by way of control by the legal element?—A qualifying control, I think one might say.

10,423. Of course, the difficulty of the whole subject is just this, that this particular ailment, unlike other ailments, does require the intervention of the law to justify detention of the patient?—Quite so.

10,424. An ordinary patient is a voluntary co-operator in his treatment; mental patients may not be?—That is so. I have taken that up to 1890. I do not know whether you want any other evidence on that topic.

10,425. Unless you have any particular point you wish to be brought out on the earlier legislation, I do not know that it is necessary to get it on the note?—If you please.

10,426. We have followed you down, then, to the 1890 Act. I think there has been a little misapprehension—I do not know—on this subject of the 1890 Act. It did, did it not, considerably alter the existing law?—I have not quite been able to check it, but I think it was the Lunacy (Amendment) Act of 1889 which altered the law, and the 1890 Act was purely consolidation.

10,427. I think what so often happens in the case of these reforms is that you, first of all, have a reforming measure introduced, and then you have a codifying measure, and the codifying measure codifies the recent reforms. That is what really happened in this case, I think?—Yes. This reform took many years to bring about. In 1877 there was a Select Committee to deal with it, and at that period they did not decide to introduce the magistrate. It may be of interest to the Commission to know (I happened to look it up the other day) that in the report Lord Shaftesbury said: "If a magistrate is introduced you must insist by Act of Parliament that he must act judicially." That is of interest, because that led on, no doubt, ultimately to the legislation which followed, and I think it may interest you to know that even in those days the question of the capacity of the magistrate was very carefully considered. Lord Shaftesbury refers to him as a man of comparative inferiority, and he also makes use of the phrase about a magistrate who runs down in a hurry and looks into a cab; so that the gentleman referred to the other day as having looked into a cab was in existence 50 years ago.

10,428. That is extremely interesting. The point about the Act of 1890 is cleared up by the Fifth Schedule, which is the Schedule of repeal. The Lunacy Act of 1889 was repealed in toto, and re-enacted, and that was the Act which embodied the recommendations of the Committee?—Yes.

10,429. Now, as you say, in 1890 there came into existence the present code, and, as you also point out, the code contains a multiplicity of safeguards. I think you are not satisfied that even this multiplicity of safeguards has really achieved its purpose?—No. We feel that most of the authorities do not function as they ought to. That again is not particularly a new feature in the history of this matter. I am thinking for the moment, perhaps, of visiting committees, which we shall come to later. Even a century ago, when they were first appointed, they did not function, and Commissioners had to be sent down specially from London. That really led to the legislation of 1845—that one point.

10,430. However, we shall come to that. Of course, we shall always have this difficulty, that to whatever body powers are entrusted, the question of the exercise of those powers is a matter for that body. You can only introduce exhortations to them and penalties upon them for not performing their duties?—But in endeavouring to find a suggestion which will persuade them to function, we think that public opinion is the one thing that is always available, and always has, as far as one knows, succeeded in other directions. It is the great goad behind a man which persuades him to do his work.

10,431. It is an excellent stimulus, no doubt?—I think we are all agreed upon that.

10,432. Is your general criticism upon the Act of 1890 that, although it contains many safeguards designed to secure the very object you have at heart, the instruments through which the Act operates are not satisfactory?—The instruments; and I do not feel satisfied that the intention of that legislation is carried out, as we shall try to show.

10,433. It has failed to achieve the object it set out to accomplish?—That is so.

(After a short adjournment.)

27 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,434. Chairman: Mr. Parker, continuing our examination of the progress of legislation, I think you wish to draw our attention to a paragraph in the Report of the Royal Commission of 1908, which, I gather, in your view represents the proper aim in this matter. It is paragraph 815, page 280 of the 8th volume, if you will just read it out?—"Our aim has been to broaden the whole position and outlook of the Lunacy Commission, and to reorganise it as a Board of Control, so that it may be an active and efficient centre, both for the general protection and supervision of the mentally defective, and, also, for the promotion of measures of scientific administration and investigation, which will prevent, as far as may be, the increase of mental disease and defectiveness." That is not, of course, the only reference. That is the conclusion they came to. We thought it might be of interest to stress the point that they wanted a directing supervision. The views of that Commission were that there should be a directing supervision in the central authority.

10,435. Then you draw attention next to the recommendation of that Royal Commission which follows, at page 323: "That there be one central authority for the general protection and supervision of mentally defective persons and for the regulation of the provision made for their accommodation and maintenance, care, treatment, education, training and control"?—That is so, and then they go on in recommendation IV to define what they mean by the mentally defective persons.

10,436. Is it a long definition?—No, it is quite short.

10,437. Then you might give it us?—The first heading in recommendation IV is "'Persons of unsound mind,' i.e., persons who require care and control owing to disorder of the mind and are consequently incapable of managing themselves or their affairs, and are not included in classes (2), (3), (4), (5), (6), (7), (8), and (9), below." Then they pass on to the mentally infirm, idiots, and so on. Then there is a footnote: "The term 'unsound mind' under this recommendation might be said to stand as generally equivalent to the word lunatic."

10,438. Then, as we know, the Board of Control in its present form was reconstituted under the Mental Deficiency Act of 1913?—That is so. But then a very curious position seems to have arisen: while this report of the Commission of 1904—they reported in 1908—had made voluminous recommendations, legislation, when it followed, ignored the whole of those recommendations, I think, practically, and I have not been able to trace out how that came about; but the Mental Deficiency Act, of course, dealt with mental defectives, and left out lunatics. I think I am correct in saying that practically the only recommendation that Act adopted was the term "Board of Control," so that you got a Board of Control established which was, in fact, the old Lunacy Commission under a fresh name, with no more control than they had before. That is our reading of the position which we want to put before you.

10,439. And in that connection, as showing the limited powers of the Board of Control, do you also refer to a passage in what we know as the Cobb Report, at page 12?—Yes; we suggest that that is the most recent, authoritative definition of their powers, and it is as follows: "We are unable to find anything in the Acts, the Commissioners' Rules, or the General Rules made by visiting committees which prescribe or standardise what treatment individual patients shall receive in the matter of classification, clothing, medicine, occupation, exercise, recreation, parole."

10,440. Now the position which you are describing to us just now is a position in which your criticism is that there is not truly a controlling central body?—That is so; that the powers remain what they were, purely advisory, and we give you some further quotations.

10,441. First of all, on that, do you consider it desirable that there should be some central body charged with the appropriate duties?—We think that, with the great growth that has taken place in the number of people under control, you must have a central administration—not necessarily the present one. We should suggest, as we do later on, some supplement in that way.

10,442. But you think some central body, armed with appropriate powers, is essential?—We think so. We feel that if the law deprives a man of his liberty it should, at any rate, lay down some sort of general standard of the treatment he is to get, and we are going to show you that at the present there is none.

10,443. That might be done by directory legislation, but this is on the administrative side. Do you consider that it is essential that there should be some central body charged with the duty of seeing that whatever directions there are shall be fully observed?—We think so. We think the position is developing so much to-day that no legislation could deal with it very far ahead. You must have a central body.

10,444. Earl Russell: You said a central administrative body. Do you mean taking the place of the present local authorities?—Yes. We think they should act in liaison with them; "directly" is the term we use.

10,445. Chairman: I do not know whether the idea has occurred to you of a certain measure of decentralisation, in the sense of having district boards as well as the central body? We are familiar with that in Scotland.—I refer to that later on. This is a recommendation of this very Commission in 1908. They suggest that there should be a sub-division of England and Wales into eight divisions, and that there should be a district commissioner in each, with the full powers of a commissioner.

10,446. There are two points. There is, first of all, what you may call organisation, and then there is definition of duties. The two things are really distinct, although they are related, no doubt, because when you prescribe the duties, it is important to have an organisation to see that the duties are fulfilled.—Quite.

10,447. But is the machinery which commends itself to you the central body coupled with some form of localisation?—That is so, to begin to carry out the administrative duties.

10,448. As to the particular body to be selected, or the particular constitution of the controlling bodies, we shall consider that later.—Quite; we think that that must be done. We do not see, considering the large numbers to be dealt with, how you could carry on a business of this sort in any other way, by pure decentralisation, that is to say.

10,449. The Board of Control themselves have been the first to recognise that with the very large area under their control and the limited numbers they possess, it is not possible to carry out a detailed investigation of every case; and they complain also of the shortness of their staff?—Quite. Yet in spite of that—I do not know whether it is with their consent or not—the proposed legislation suggests a reduction of their staff.

10,450. Earl Russell: Which is that?—That is Lord Onslow's Bill.

10,451. Chairman: I do not think they will share that view.—It is in the draft, is it not?

Chairman: Does it contemplate the reduction of the membership of the Board of Control?

10,452. Earl Russell: What clause is it?—Section 3, sub-section (1). They say there: "Sub-section (1) of Section 22 of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913 (which provides for the constitution of the Board of Control), shall have effect as though it required that not more than eight of the Commissioners should be paid Commissioners, and that of the paid Commissioners two should be legal Commissioners, and two at least should be Medical Commissioners." I believe the present position is that there are actually 12 authorised, though not all are appointed.

27 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,453. Not 12 paid, you know.—Are they not authorised to be paid? I am not quite certain of that.

10,454. Chairman: But is not this limitation coupled with proposals for inspection by inspectors?—That is so, and that is a point we want particularly to draw attention to, because it is a point which the Royal Commission of 1908 reviewed very closely.

10,455. Favourably or unfavourably?—Unfavourably, to this extent, that they thought inspectors would not carry the same weight as Commissioners.

10,456. They would not have so much authority?—And what we feel in dealing with this Bill is that this is really an indirect attempt to meet the position we have tried to show, and to augment the medical representation on the Board of Control, because we trace that out. We find that these inspectors are in fact being appointed. For instance, in the Board of Control Report for 1922 we find there are two inspectors, both doctors; and then when we turn to the Report for 1923 we find that that number has already grown to four, of whom three are doctors and one is a lady.

10,457. Earl Russell: Which do you think more useful in inspecting an asylum with a view to finding out abuses and dealing with treatment—medical men, or lawyers?—I think our view is this, that it has always been maintained by the Legislature that there should be both. We look upon the lawyer, not quite from his legal capacity necessarily, but as representing the public—the views of the man in the street; to some extent he takes the place of the old jury in an inquisition. We look upon the doctor, on the other hand, as holding a quite defined medical view, which may, and often does, differ from that of the man in the street. We carry it through a little further when we consider the judicial authority. We say that should take the place of the old jury in the inquisition. It is a summary way of dealing with the same problem.

10,458. Chairman: Let us follow out the question of the central body a little further. In your view it should have, I gather, not merely supervisory powers over whatever be the local bodies, but it should have, in addition, directory powers?—That is so.

10,459. Then, as to its composition, is your view that it should be composed partly of legal and partly of medical persons?—Partly, and I think we should like to suggest for your consideration that there might be even what one might term a business man on it. They are dealing with very vast sums of money, with the application of upwards of £6,000,000 a year, and we think it is in conformity with the growth of modern boards that there should be that business man, and also a lady, on it, as there is already in the form of an inspector.

10,460. There is a lady commissioner, of course, at present?—Yes, there is.

10,461. There is no doubt about the propriety of that?—Quite.

10,462. One difficulty does arise, that in connection with the question of visitation, of course the Commissioners do not visit in a body; they must go individually, to different institutions. Therefore you might have one institution visited only by a lawyer and another only by a doctor, if you have different qualifications?—I rather think that is provided for in Clause 2 of Lord Onslow's Bill, is it not?

10,463. Earl Russell: The present rule is that it ought to be one of each, is it not?—That is under Section 65 of the Act of 1913, I think. There is this, if I may read Section 65, Sub-section 1, of the Act of 1913, or the first paragraph of the Section, which says: "All the powers and duties of the Commissioners in Lunacy under the Lunacy Acts, 1890 to 1911, shall, as from the commencement of this Act, be transferred to the Board, and His Majesty may, by Order in Council, direct that anything which under those Acts is required or authorised to be done by, to, or in respect of, any one or more Commissioners in Lunacy or any officer of those Commissioners shall be done by, to, or in respect of, one or more Commissioners under this Act, or the corresponding officer of the Board: Provided that nothing in such Order in Council shall authorise anything by those Acts required to be done by two Commissioners, one a medical practitioner and the other a barrister, to be done otherwise than by two Commissioners, one a medical and the other a legal Commissioner."

10,464. Yes, I am aware that certain steps require the intervention of both a legal and a medical man?—That is so; of which visiting, I think, is one.

10,465. Now suppose you introduce the business man; what are we to do with him? Is he to visit?—I think he might be allowed to visit independently, even. I do not think he need make a third, necessarily. I am not suggesting that.

10,466. However, I do not suppose that that is so vital to your present contention as that you should have a body composed of an adequate number of properly qualified persons?—Yes, and representative. We feel that there are very big problems. One that has been often discussed is the question of architecture. I think the old Commission of 1908 suggested that there should be an architect on the then Lunacy Commission. We feel that that is not the work of a doctor or a lawyer.

10,467. You can always employ an architect, you know?—I daresay they do.

10,468. Chairman: They have an architect on the staff?—I am only instancing that as one of the points which ought not to occupy the time of a medical man.

10,469. On the other hand, you might restrict the number of Commissioners at headquarters and not send them all over the country, but rather have the visitation and inspection carried out by district commissioners on the spot, and use the central board more as a central consultative and directing board. I can imagine that, at present, if the members of the Board of Control are being constantly dispersed over the country, as they must be, in the performance of their duty, you may not have what is desirable in a central authority, a permanent board in session dealing with questions which may come up from the country?—I think, generally, we should agree with that, and we think probably this proposed district commissioner would be a connecting link.

10,470. Earl Russell: Yes, but I would like to put this to you on that point. Supposing you have a district commissioner; is there not a danger of his visiting the same asylums all the time and getting, rather, into a rut? Is it not better to have a different man coming in, with a different point of view?—I quite agree, but that would be easily dealt with by changing the Commissioners from time to time.

10,471. Putting him on a "Wesleyan circuit"?—Yes, a "Wesleyan circuit" is just what I had in mind.

10,472. Chairman: We have heard of the multifarious duties of the Board of Control, and they are so frequently en voyage throughout the country that it must be an embarrassment to the conduct of the daily business of the office?—I think they complain of it very seriously themselves.

10,473. I know; but do you think it would afford adequate protection if one had a central authority in London, armed with appropriate powers, which, so to speak, would be in continuous session, receiving and acting upon information and where necessary, of course, going down to visit in particular cases, but not paying what we may call the routine visits which are at present required, those being delegated to district commissioners?—I think it is very difficult to say what your qualification, "going down where necessary," might amount to. If they did not visit occasionally, of course, they would obviously get out of touch with their work. What the middle course would be I do not think it is for us to say; we do not profess to deal with the matter in that detail. We are trying to put some main principles before you.

10,474. If I may say so, it is uncommonly easy to express ideals, but, as you and I know as lawyers, when you come to draft clauses it is so often very, very difficult to give practical effect to your ideals; and what we are welcoming from you is assistance in not merely laying down canons—I think you and I could enunciate half-a-dozen propositions that everybody would applaud?—Quite.

10,475. But when one comes to work these things out—and here one must be practical—it is just there that one wants practical assistance most of all. You will do your best as we go along?—Perhaps when we come to deal with the practical benefits which arise, at any rate to the patients, from these visits, we shall be able to dispose of that side of it.

10,476. Yes. Like every other Government Department, the Board of Control has attracted to itself a very considerable amount of criticism and, I do not hesitate to say, abuse; and they have expressed the disabilities of their position more than once. We are, therefore, concerned at the very apex of the whole system to consider whether we can improve that position in any way?—Quite; that is why we tried to be fair and point out the position in which they are—having no directing power. From that fact we think the position which we criticise has directly arisen.

10,477. There has been a good deal of criticism of this sort: That the Board of Control should be abolished and its functions transferred to some other Department, and so on. I have very much this feeling, if I may be so indiscreet as to express it, that you might be exchanging King Stork for King Log. It is not the body so much as what are the functions of the body?—We quite agree with that. We should not suggest for a moment that they should be entirely abolished. I do not know, if you were setting up a fresh authority, how you would get on without their knowledge. We suggest a half-way house

10,478. If we set up a new body it would become the target for criticism for the next Commission. Therefore, it does not help matters to level abuse upon the central body, but rather to suggest in what way their difficulties may be met?—Quite.

10,479. However, we have your general view on that position. Now let us pass on to the question which is so important, namely, the case of the person who is suffering to some extent from a mental disorder, but has not yet been certified. You have, I think, strong views upon the expediency of introducing some method, some provisional system, whereby cases may be dealt with without certification?—Yes, that is so.

10,480. You have that view, I understand?—Yes, and it has been expressed in the evidence which has been given since the suggestions were made; in some respects I think the memorandum put in by the British Medical Association is on similar lines, as regards the period, at any rate.

10,481. And we have had evidence from a number of medical superintendents to exactly the same effect, that they think some such system would be very desirable?—Quite, and I think you had it from expert doctors yesterday, and to-day also—Sir Maurice Craig especially.

10,482. Yes; there has been remarkable unanimity on that point?—Yes.

10,483. I do not think we need labour it very much, except to ask you what form you think that provisional treatment should take. All being agreed upon the principle, what is the method you would recommend for carrying out that proposal?—The first principle which we advance is that there should be a provisional order for a period of 28 days; that is the same period, I think, as is put forward by the British Medical Association. Within that period it is obvious that there would be two types of cases to consider; the urgency case and the ordinary case. Perhaps it would be convenient to deal with the ordinary case first.

10,484. Earl Russell: You have got your 28 days under Section 6 now, have you not?—Section 6 of the principal Act?

Earl Russell: I think so; I am not quite sure.

Chairman: That is, by the accumulation of periods you can get it.

Earl Russell: You only have 14, I see.

10,485. Chairman: It is in Section 6, subsection (4). (To the Witness): But that, I think, if I may say so, is looking at it from rather a different point of view from that which you are advocating just now, is it not? That is, after the case has been brought before the justice, it may be adjourned?—You want to deal with treatment without certification first?

10,486. Yes; that is, the first time, so to speak, at which the patient is brought into contact with any form of treatment?—Yes. We make the point that there is practically no provision for such treatment, with the exception of the Maudsley Hospital and Bethlem Hospital, and the provision for voluntary boarders in licensed houses.

10,487. We might take the voluntary boarder system first of all, because that seems to come first in logical order. That deals with the person who suffers the least possible interference with his liberty, the patient who subjects himself of his own motion to treatment. Now on this subject of the voluntary patient, again I think we may say there is a consensus of opinion that the system should be extended?—Quite so, extended to established institutions.

10,488. Yes, and extended in particular to county and borough asylums?—That is so, we agree with that.

10,489. Earl Russell: The pauper class is quite unprovided for now under the voluntary system?—Yes, quite uncovered.

10,490. Chairman: There again one is happy to find that your views are in conformity with those of the last Report of the Board of Control which I have in front of me: "We find a general consensus of opinion in favour of allowing early cases of mental disorder to be received for treatment for a period without certification, under proper safeguards, and of extending to public mental hospitals the power to receive voluntary boarders." So that upon that topic we may assume universal agreement?—Yes.

10,491. I do not know whether I am quite following the order of your précis, but I would like to follow out this idea of the voluntary boarder. Let us take the case of a person who, feeling unbalanced and apprehensive of what may supervene, presents himself at a public asylum and asks for admission as a voluntary boarder. Now we shall assume that the county asylum or the mental hospital will have been authorised by legislation to receive such a person. That person would become chargeable to the rates at once, would he not?—Not necessarily. I suppose he could be classed as a private voluntary boarder if he had the means.

10,492. If he had sufficient means he could become a private voluntary boarder?—Yes.

10,493. If he had not sufficient means, what safeguard would you suggest against an imposition upon the rates of unsuitable or unnecessary cases?—I suppose up to a point some of those cases would be in receipt of the "dole" already. One hopes that that would not continue necessarily.

10,494. What one feels is this: notwithstanding the drawbacks of asylums which you are going to tell us about, I can imagine that to quite a number of people, who had no comfortable home at all, it might be rather attractive to represent themselves as voluntary boarders?—I can assure you from the ex-patients we have interviewed that very few would share that opinion at present.

10,495. But you must remember your experience has been of the people who have complained?—As it happens I have had an experience of rather a curious case in the last six months. It was a voluntary case

27 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

in a licensed house—no question of mentality at all. There are a certain number of cases dealt with in the police courts in that way—ex-officers and so on, and I can assure you from his experience that it is not a thing he would very willingly repeat. He was a voluntary boarder under an order of a Chairman of Quarter Sessions conditionally.

10,496. Earl Russell: A condition of a recognisance?—Practically, yes. Mr. Stewart reminds me that our proposal is that it should be voluntary on both sides, that is to say, there should be no right of entry. The superintendent may refuse on due cause if he suspects.

10,497. Surely, apart from malingering, there ought to be a right of entry to a rate-aided institution?—I quite agree.

10,498. Chairman: I should not like to feel we were left in this position, that an unhappy person who felt the coming on of this affliction, should present himself at an asylum and say, "I want to come in for the shelter I shall get here," but be refused, at the mere discretion of the superintendent of the institution?—I quite agree: we could not leave it in that stage, but our proposals go a great deal further of course, that there should be other places open to that voluntary patient.

Chairman: Yes, if you start a new series of institutions of a different type altogether, then, of course, the conditions of entry into those institutions would have to be laid down.

10,499. Earl Russell: I limited my observations to rate-aided institutions, of course?—Quite.

10,500. Chairman: Now take this voluntary patient. You desire that he should be admissible, at any rate, to the public mental hospital. Do you think it is desirable that those voluntary cases should find their way into existing institutions at all, or would you rather that a new class of institution were brought into being?—We would rather a new class of institution should be instituted, as we hope it will be, but we recognise that it must take some time.

10,501. Meantime your view is that the doors of the public institutions should be thrown open to the voluntary boarder?—That is a measure we should support, and we understand a good many superintendents support it too.

10,502. That I think you may take as being a matter of general assent. The next question would be this: Under what conditions would you contemplate the voluntary boarder being received? Would you contemplate that he should be absolutely at liberty to leave as and when he pleases, or that he should be called upon to submit himself to some conditions?—Well, I think we recognise that the ideal condition of absolute freedom probably would not work, any more than it would in workhouses or anywhere else; but we do take strong exception to the idea that it should be extended to 72 hours. We think 24 hours for general convenience, and to prevent a man acting on the spur of the moment, is reasonable. Anything beyond that we consider is dangerous to the individual.

10,503. Earl Russell: Have you considered this, Mr. Parker, that if you had in the country to communicate with the relatives, say, on a Saturday, 24 hours may not give you time to get them there, particularly if they are away from home. If, therefore, you only allow 24 hours, it may be necessary that without the relatives hearing of it an urgency order may be signed; whereas if you have the 72 hours you may get the relatives there within the time and communicate with them as to the disposal of the patient?—That might be a difficulty in some cases, of course.

10,504. You understand that if you have a statutory provision, it must be fixed?—Quite. We are continually, of course, coming across these sort of points, and one can only make recommendations on a sort of balance of advantages. We think that that case would obviously be an exceptional case and must be risked, in the general interests of people who take other views.

10,505. Chairman: That will not quite do. You cannot lay down legislation and then say some people will fall out of it and they must take the consequences. Take the case Lord Russell puts: the case is that of a voluntary patient who says to his superintendent, "I propose to leave at the end of 24 hours." The superintendent says, "Oh, but why are you going away?" He says, "I propose to go and drown myself in the canal; I do not like this institution." The superintendent's duty would be at once to communicate with some responsible person and say that if the patient is going to leave, he must leave in somebody else's hands. Suppose he did not succeed in getting into touch in 24 hours with any of the relatives, what would happen? He could not keep him a moment more than 24 hours?—That case, I thought, had been dealt with already. Am I wrong in saying that Dr. Edwards, of Camberwell House, dealt with it? He said he found the 24 hours ample in practice, if I am right in quoting him, and that in a case, such as you suggest, he would of course communicate with the police and the policeman would take up the trail as the fellow walked out of the door.

Earl Russell: What may be found ample time in practice in London may not be ample in practice in Carmarthenshire.

Chairman: We had some evidence from a rural doctor saying that that would not give him time enough.

10,506. Earl Russell: What can the superintendent do in that case except summon the relieving officer and turn the person into a pauper patient under an urgency order, so as to protect him?—Then he would be no worse off than he is now.

10,507. We want him to be better off, and so do you?—I quite agree there might be that exceptional case.

10,508. It is not exceptional?—It is not Metropolitan, clearly. It is a country case on a Saturday night.

10,509. Mr. Jowitt: Would you be prepared to accept the differentiation between London and the country?—We should if that is considered wise. We look with very grave suspicion on the 72 hours, particularly in view of the evidence which has been given, that it is proposed for the purpose of certification if necessary. We consider that that destroys the whole basis of the voluntary treatment.

10,510. Earl Russell: True, but what else could you have it for, except for the purpose of restraint of some kind or other?—I thought it was also for the purpose of the administration of the place.

10,511. Chairman: No, I do not think so. I really think that the reason for the delay is this: that the patient may want to exercise his right as a voluntary patient to go out when the exercise of that right might be most detrimental to the patient and to the public. Suppose the case goes from bad to worse instead of from bad to better. Now what should be done for such a case? You manifestly cannot say that the person who has come in voluntarily with a comparatively mild attack is to be allowed out when the attack has become severe. It is a real problem?—It is a very real problem, but I think you have to look on the other side of it, and if a patient knows that that may happen, and that he might be certified, I am afraid that will deter a vast number of patients from going in.

10,512. Earl Russell: Of course, you must remember that it may happen to a man walking in the street now?—Quite so. I must say that we agree with what has been laid down in the case of the Maudsley Hospital, a rule that was not lightly arrived at.

10,513. Chairman: That is quite a different point. You wish to avoid the association of certification with voluntary treatment altogether?—Quite.

10,514. For the moment we are assuming that the voluntary patient is admitted to the public mental hospital. We are all agreed as to the advantages of that. He is in there, and then the question arises, what is to be the system or code under which he is

27 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

to be there? He cannot just walk out as and when he pleases; he must submit to some limitation, and 24 hours is advanced by you as being an adequate time. Personally, I am not so very much impressed with the question of whether it is 24, or 48, or 72 hours, because contrasted with the idea of detention for years, such as we have heard of in other cases, the difference between the deprivation of liberty for one or two days is not really a very serious thing, for we must assume that the case will be at least one of some anxiety before a person gets there at all. I do not attach so much importance to the difference between one day and even a week?—On the question of time, no, but on the question of the result—

10,515. If I may say so, we must be logical. That is a different question. The question of the time is, how long ought the man to be detained; or ought there to be any power to detain him against his will although he came in as a voluntary patient?—May I put this suggestion? In our view the 24 hours is not only to deal with those cases. We look upon it as a provision to prevent a man acting hastily and to allow people in authority to talk to him and speak for him. I believe in practice these cases do arise. A man says, "I am going to-morrow," and the doctor sends for him and has a talk to him. That is what the 24 hours is partly for.

10,516. Earl Russell: True. There are a variety of cases. There may be cases at Maudsley or Bethlem where a patient says, "I am going out," and the doctor says, "It will be very bad for your health, but I do not feel bound to stop you." There are other cases which he cannot let out; and if you were to give him such short notice and there was a patient who was growing worse, might it not lead to him certifying the patient a month earlier than he otherwise would do, for fear of that very risk?—That is so, and that is the difficulty in considering these voluntary cases. We have considered it, and we think that it has a preventive effect.

10,517. Sir David Drummond: Does the Witness not recognise that in practice a very large proportion of these cases will not take advantage of the system, and therefore we cannot be very much further on?—I think I do recognise that, and I ventured to say just now that our proposals were much wider than extending the proposal to public institutions.

10,518. Chairman: It is only one of the mitigating proposals, but at the same time you understand that if we make recommendations as the recommendations of a Royal Commission, it does not do merely to state general aspirations. One has to think the thing out in its detail. Here we have a gentleman who has thought the thing out, and it is our duty as well as our pleasure to explore these questions with you. We are putting to you the different aspects of the questions as they seem to strike us as men of the world.—Quite. I must repeat that our view is this: that the interests of the small minority may be prejudiced by that of bigger interests; the interest of the number of people who are likely to avail themselves of this voluntary treatment is the one which should prevail, and the others must take their chance. We are continually cropping up against that difficulty. You cannot legislate for the lot.

10,519. Mr. Jowitt: Do you think if a man says before he goes in as a voluntary boarder, "I may be kept 72 hours," it may have a considerable influence upon his willingness to go into that institution?—We think so.

10,520. On the balance of convenience you think it is better to have 24 hours?—The balance of convenience is making voluntary treatment merely voluntary. 24 hours, I am afraid, we must accept. It is current in the workhouses, I believe. It will not alarm the public quite so much, perhaps.

10,521. You do not think we could meet the difficulty by having 24 hours for London and 72 hours for the country?—I am bound to say as an opinion I think not.

10,522. Chairman: There is a very practical case that one might put on that. A patient unfortunately, on a Sunday morning, develops very acute symptoms, maniacal symptoms, if you please. Up to that time he has been a well-behaved and exemplary voluntary patient; something has occurred to upset him. On the Sunday morning the medical superintendent is informed that the patient has become exceedingly ill, and he finds the case almost in extremis. It is Sunday morning; he cannot get into communication with anybody until the next day. Twenty-four hours afterwards, the next morning at breakfast, this patient is an absolutely free man, although he may be in a state of mind in which we all recognise he ought to be restrained. If that doctor kept him a minute longer than the 24 hours on his premises, he would of course have committed a serious offence.—Would he have given notice if he were in that condition? I think the case you mean is perhaps after a man has given notice.

10,523. I think your criticism is sound. If he is in a state of mania, he will not give notice at all. But suppose, on the other hand, he is in a suicidal condition, which is often accompanied by considerable intelligence; he might say, "I know my rights, and I give you notice that to-morrow morning I am leaving this institution, and I am going to drown myself in the canal," what does he do in that case?—I am bound to say my personal opinion is this: he is no worse off than if that attack had taken him outside, and I do not think you can make him better off except at the expense of a great number of other individuals who would be prejudiced.

10,524. One quite understands that. I agree he would be no better off either?—No, and there is always this: surely evidence has been given that, under those circumstances, whether it is legal or not, just as in a hospital, a good deal of restraint would in fact be exercised, or if it came to a point, the police could be communicated with.

10,525. You must not ask us to wink at such a thing?—No, but evidence has been given that it is done.

10,526. In fact, one of the things we have heard is that often in the interests of a patient it has been necessary to stretch the law a bit. One would far rather make the law cover the case than make the practice exceed the law?—Quite.

10,527. The point on voluntary treatment which seems to me to arise is this. You want to do everything to encourage people to take advantage of voluntary treatment?—Certainly.

10,528. Therefore, the first thing you say is: "You will still be a free agent while you are there, subject only to this, that you will have to give a day's notice"?—That is so.

10,529. Then you want next, as I understand, to dissociate the voluntary treatment as far as possible, from the consequence or risk of certification?—Yes, to avoid what has been described here as the stigma, and the risk.

10,530. Let us follow that out. Is your view this: that if it is seen that a voluntary patient in a mental hospital is unhappily deteriorating and has become certifiable, the certification should not take place in the institution which he has entered as a voluntary patient?—That is our view, yes.

10,531. And is the object of that that persons may not be deterred from going in as voluntary patients by the apprehension that they may find themselves becoming, whether they like it or not, involuntary patients?—Exactly.

10,532. It does seem to me, however, a little in the nature of a mere subterfuge to suggest that the patient in the case I have figured should be taken out of the mental hospital, and, if I may put it quite colloquially, put through the mill of certification in some other institution. It seems to me rather a cruel idea?—I think it is, and I wish we could suggest some way of dealing with that very difficult case; but again we feel, though we quite see the difficulty of that case, that the feelings of the individual must give way to the interests of the majority.

27 January, 1925.]

MR. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,533. Earl Russell: Exactly the same objection?—Yes, Mr. Stewart points out to me that, in the event of that sort of case arising, they could proceed, as we propose elsewhere, by the usual sworn information, and so forth.

10,534. Chairman: In the asylum?—And would keep him there, I take it.

10,535. The whole question we are on just now is the association of the place. One does not want to have inscribed over the portal, "Come in as a voluntary patient, and remain in as an involuntary one"?—No, that is what we wish to avoid.

10,536. The suggestion is this, as I understand, that if the patient enters as a voluntary patient, he should never be certified inside the portals of that institution, lest it should attract to itself an unhappy association?—We think that is the only safe rule to make, and we quite recognise that it will work hardship in a few individual cases.

10,537. Perhaps it is a matter of personal temperament, but the case that always appeals to my imagination is the case of the individual sufferer. One wants to figure out the real thing as it happens in human life, and one knows that people in this unhappy condition are often upset, distressed, frightened, and miserable, and one has the feeling that one wants, as far as possible, to avoid elaborate machinery, and so on, which even to people of complete sanity is often found, as you and I know, to be exceedingly distressing and worrying?—Quite.

10,538. It seems to me that it would be an extraordinarily harsh thing to take a patient out of a place where he is receiving care, a patient who has suddenly become very bad, and say to him, "We cannot keep you here any longer and you must be taken away," under the present system, as far as I can see, "to a workhouse"?—Does not this point arise—What type of institution are you considering? Are you considering an institution where you shall have nothing but voluntary and free people, or are you considering an institution with mixed patients—voluntary and certified?

10,539. True. If we got this ideal intermediate institution, which was not a mental hospital in the sense of being an asylum at all, but was a place of observation and care, and you had your voluntary patients there, that might be the solution; and yet, even there, you might have to have some of the cases certified?—We have discussed those types at very great length, and we are quite unanimous in feeling this, that once you get certified patients kept in voluntary institutions, that is to say, institutions which are purely voluntary, you will be half way to associating those institutions with the present asylums and getting the stigma attached to them. Therefore, we say, that the voluntary institutions must be purely voluntary, and once a person is certifiable he must go out, and if he goes out it does not matter very much where he goes.

10,540. Earl Russell: Then you would not approve of our existing county asylums establishing cottage hospitals, and so on?—That is a different point. I think we should welcome that.

10,541. Chairman: We are on existing institutions for the moment, because we have got to take things as we find them?—Quite.

10,542. We are fully alive to the point that you do not want the voluntary patient to be deterred from resorting to an institution by any apprehensions of the sort you indicate. Now, it is just a question whether the fact that some other friends of his had gone there as voluntary patients, and had been certified, would be a real deterrent to him in going in turn. That is the real point?—Yes.

10,543. You think it would be a deterrent?—We think it would, undoubtedly.

10,544. Would it be any more deterrent that his friend should have gone there, had stayed for a while, had been sent away to some other place, had there been certified and brought back and put into the certified ward?—You are speaking of the existing institution?

10,545. Yes.—I think in the existing institution, which has already fully certified people, it does not matter very much.

10,546. That is an important distinction?—It is.

10,547. Because I can quite see that if you are contemplating a new sort of institution, you wish to keep it as free as possible from the idea of compulsory detention?—Quite.

10,548. And so you instance the Maudsley experiment?—Even if to-morrow you got legislation admitting voluntary patients to existing institutions, we only look upon that as a step.

10,549. Earl Russell: They do, in fact, go to Claybury and these private licensed houses as voluntary patients, though there are certified cases there?—Quite, and I think they will, until they can get something better.

10,550. But you think there are a larger number deterred who do not go?—We thought so, and I thought that was the medical evidence you have had.

10,551. Chairman: Then I understand that, so far as the existing public mental hospitals are concerned, they should be open to voluntary patients, but in their case you do not insist, as one of the terms of your reform, that there should be no certification of a voluntary patient in that hospital?—I do not think we can press that in view of what you have said. It will no doubt be very carefully considered.

10,552. You must not take it that these are considered views at all. They are just the kind of views that occur to anyone who is exploring this, I hope, carefully; and one is so anxious in advancing any ideas for reform to see that they are practicable?—I quite agree, if I may say so, that if the institution is already tainted by the stigma, it would be foolish to take the patient out and bring him back again.

10,553. You also suggest, however, that the ideal would be to have a new class of institution for those cases?—That is so.

10,554. While we are on the existing régime, that is to say, before we get institutions such as you desire, what is your objection to the Board of Control, with its existing or such additional powers as it may receive in consequence of recommendations from us, having control of those voluntary patients?—Of course I am putting before you now the views of different members of our Society; and from their experience, which is much greater than mine, they do think that the connection of a Board in daily touch with lunacy matters, also administering these places, will cause what we have decided to call the stigma to attach to them in time; and they also believe that those sort of places will be much better run by local authorities—that is on the question of decentralisation which we were discussing—and they really do not concern a central body. I think they do not like to feel that even the names will go on the records of the central body.

10,555. That would be so, if you were able to obtain your ideal of having institutions dissociated from the present administration of lunacy altogether; but taking it on the makeshift of allowing voluntary patients to enter public mental hospitals, of course, there you could not dissociate them from the Board of Control?—No.

10,556. Earl Russell: But do you think that even in your new places the patient would require no protection in that sense?—I do not see why, if he is free to walk out.

10,557. The reason why the Board of Control is notified is to make sure that a person, whose judgment and will are not quite sound, is not having anything done to him that he should not have done.

10,558. Chairman: I see possibilities of abuse in the voluntary system which might be very grave. The trouble is that whenever you introduce into our law a new system, you at once bring with it a train of new abuses?—Quite.

10,559. Is not the trouble just this, that if you have not some kind of authoritative control, you might have a case, which was, on the pretext of being voluntary, in point of fact not voluntary at all, a weak-minded case, let us say, simply controlled and unfairly treated?—And he would be lost sight of.

27 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Earl Russell: He would be remaining there and with no public authority to protect him.

10,560. Chairman: Yes, and possibly paying for himself as well?—I am bound to say that my view is that that case would not be in a very different position from that which cases find themselves in to-day, that is to say, we do not feel that the central authority is such a protection as is suggested.

10,561. No, but one of your reforms which we certainly are going to consider is the improvement of this control, possibly, by some decentralisation also. But I cannot figure with comfort to myself the idea of voluntary establishments in which persons in this state of mind are to be housed, and who are so peculiarly exposed to possible ill-treatment or abuse, unless there is some real and effective control over them?—Do not you think the local health authority would be an effective control in that case?

10,562. You do not, perhaps rightly, attach a great deal of importance to the way in which justices of the peace or visiting committees perform their duties. It is just the same people over again who compose the authorities in these places?—Quite. I am afraid there we should come down ultimately to the interest which the public take in these places. The public at present do take an interest in hospitals. Many of our Committee feel sure, and I must say I agree, that there will be members of the public who will take an interest in these places. Of course, that is not an absolute safeguard, but it is a very great help.

10,563. Earl Russell: If you take the case of some feeble-minded person who is bullied into a sort of consent to remaining there, no visiting member of the public would get anything out of that place by going there, whereas if you had a central authority to whom the patient had to be reported, at least it would be known and some official would see him?—Could it not be dealt with in this way, that, after a fixed time of residence, notification to a central authority was insisted on? Would not that cover the point?

Chairman: That is rather the question of the way in which the central authority is to be invoked. Your present proposal is the dissociation altogether of such places from the central authority. Once it is assumed that some measure of control is appropriate, the question of extent is a mere matter of machinery.

10,564. Sir David Drummond: Is it your idea that these voluntary hospitals should be run on the lines of general hospitals?—That is what we hope to see.

10,565. In those cases, we know, the patients are safeguarded by the Committees?—Quite. I do not think we contemplate long periods of residence in these voluntary hostels. The whole object of them is to deal with the temporary cases. Therefore I do not think there would be any objection at all to legislating that a case which had been in fact in residence over two or three months must be notified. I think that would be quite a reasonable thing.

10,566. Chairman: I think you must not assume that voluntary patients are only short-term patients. Personally I have been visiting a few institutions myself, and I hope to visit a great many more. I have seen patients who have been there for years as voluntary patients.—That is so. I am reminded that Dr. Lewis gave a lot of evidence on this point, and he said that even control by the county councils would be better.

10,567. Whatever be the controlling body it will inevitably attract abuse one way or another. I am not so much impressed with that. I do not quite see why the county council is a better body than any other central body may be. It is local, of course?—Of course, we have proposed that the Ministry of Health might be an ultimate sort of Court.

10,568. After all the Ministry of Health would be just another Board of Control?—That is just the difficulty.

10,569. Anybody who knows how a Government Department is run knows that there would simply be a Department in the Ministry of Health, by whatever name you call it. That is rather playing with it, if I may say so?—I agree.

10,570. The other proposal, though, is substantial, namely, that it should be in the charge of the local authority—the borough council, or the county council?—Yes.

10,571. Then, again, I suppose you have had some knowledge of local administration?—Not very much.

10,572. Some of us have. Again, if you take the case of a county council or a town council, at the present moment these bodies are simply overburdened with work. No one who knows the course of modern legislation—I am sure my friend, the late Lord Provost of Edinburgh, would bear me out in this—is not aware that the burdens that have been put upon local authorities in recent years are almost inconceivable. Do you think you could ask these bodies in turn to give the measure of real supervision which we want, or would we not again get the same kind of thing as having a committee which just goes and lunches there once a month? Would we be getting any nearer the heart of the problem?—The way we visualise it is that it must develop gradually, that is to say, the large centres will start the hostels of this sort, and we do feel that outside the actual authority appointed there will be honorary members interested in the work.

10,573. I am more attracted by the view of a reorganisation of the Board of Control. I am not concerned with the name; I am concerned with the substance. A reorganisation of the Board of Control, coupled with a system of district commissioners throughout the country who would be persons whose business it would be to do this; rather than confide it to persons who are already immersed in a great deal of public business, and who, with the best will in the world, would be liable to regard it as part of their routine work instead of being their professional duty?—Subject to that reorganisation, I think that course would have a great deal to recommend it.

10,574. I am merely throwing out ideas as they occur to me. Let us picture a central body in continual session to which all difficulties could be referred by really responsible district commissioners, who would have under their charge, not the whole country but reasonable areas, in which they would be constantly moving about and supervising and reporting difficulties and suggesting inquiries, and so on; so far as you can get an effective machine (all machines are imperfect) that would go a very long way?—I think we should quite agree with that, subject to the reorganisation of the central body.

10,574A. Just link that up with what Lord Russell put to you. If the central body were so reorganised, and you had a system of distribution of work amongst district commissioners, would you still think it desirable that these voluntary hostels should be entirely dissociated from such a body?—No, for this reason, that they would really be associated with something fresh, that is to say, the district commissioners.

10,575. Very good; that meets one's point there. Then you say what is very important, that you would wish to see more public interest taken in these places, and that you regard an increased interest on the part of the public as a very valuable safeguard?—We do, yes.

10,576. I think you will remember that one medical superintendent who gave evidence before us said that he wished he could get the public to come more to his place, and treat it more as a general hospital is treated. Now is there not just a difficulty about that? The atmosphere, after all, however much one may try to improve it, of any place where a large number of persons mentally afflicted are gathered together, can never be the same as that of a general hospital?—Never.

10,577. One feels oneself in visiting an institution of that sort that a brave show may be made by the best people, but at the same time you can never get the same atmosphere as you will get in a general hospital?—I do not think you can, subject to this,

27 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

that as you put your permanent cases aside you probably will not get such a bad atmosphere as you get at present.

10,578. Improved classification would largely assist in that, I agree.—I thought we were talking still of the voluntary patients.

10,579. I am talking for the moment of the general point. Publicity means that the public will go to them as they go to a general hospital just now. You go to a general hospital, and no doubt see a great many people who are suffering there, but there is a different atmosphere about it, is there not?—I do not think we expect that you will get the public to visit these big asylums very much.

10,580. I do not think a great many members of the general public could stand it, putting it quite frankly?—No, as one witness said, you require very robust mentality.

10,581. Earl Russell: If it were known that it were encouraged, do you think that you would get more visitors of the kind mentioned at Claybury—the voluntary visitor?—I do not think I can express an individual opinion upon that.

10,582. I think probably the public imagine now that they are not wanted in asylums, and that their presence would be resented?—I think that is the feeling very distinctly.

10,583. Chairman: You see, what one may call the normal suffering of the human body is a thing which everybody knows about, and which, after all, most people can stand; but this particular form of suffering has got concomitants of a peculiarly distressing type?—It has.

10,584. And I do not mind saying that when you have seen even a very few cases you may find yourself haunted for days afterwards, even though the cases are getting every possible advantage?—Yes.

10,585. You are not haunted with a case of a sick person who is suffering from any of the ordinary diseases. You may be very sorry for, and very distressed about him, but it does not haunt you in the same way as the case of a person who is distraught mentally.—Quite.

10,586. Now the difficulty that I feel about encouraging the public to go to these places is just that: the sights and sounds which are inevitable in such a place, even in the best conducted place, may be very distressing, and are not really a fit subject for people to see or hear. What do you say with regard to that?—For people generally, perhaps not, just as you might say, people will not go into the slums, but there have been people who, in the past, have met all sorts of conditions there, and I think would do so in this case.

10,587. No doubt many people of a philanthropic turn of mind would go on that errand of mercy, but it is a little different from the coming and going that you have in a general hospital.—You have fewer people, certainly.

10,588. Sir David Drummond: Is it your view that that class of patient would be with the others?—Not at all.

10,589. Chairman: The voluntary patient would not be in that class?—No.

10,590. Earl Russell: You could find a certain number of voluntary workers from people who had been on asylum committees, but who were no longer on them?—I think so. I think the Report of 1908 somewhere suggests that the visiting committees should be enlarged by honorary appointments.

10,591. I was not thinking of that, because that at once makes them official. I am thinking of the sort of person we were told of at Claybury—an outside worker entirely.

10,592. Chairman: I think that is a delightful idea, if you can get people of the right sort, to go about the place and be friendly with the patients and make the patients feel they are still members of society and not outcasts from society. In a general hospital, as one knows, there are people who go and conduct services, sing hymns, take flowers and do all sorts of things.—We touch upon that point a little later in the proof by suggesting that something analogous to the prison visitors might be considered.

10,593. I again agree with Lord Russell on this point, that this is a great sphere for voluntary effort, rather than to get it into the atmosphere of officialism.—Possible criticism, you mean.

Chairman: Yes.

10,594. Earl Russell: I think possibly the prison visitors you have referred to are the permitted persons who are not paid.—It is voluntary work, and they go in when they like. If we deal with that now, it will cover two points—visiting and inspection from outside—to which we attach great importance.

10,595. Chairman: Contact with the outer world?—Yes.

10,596. Now the only other point on this branch of your case is whether the existing general hospitals throughout the country could not be made to play a role in this matter of treatment without certification. Of course, if you could get the general hospitals to deal with the mental cases, incipient mental cases, in wards, you would have practically solved your problem, because there you would of course have no association of insanity?—Quite.

10,597. You would only have the association of treatment and care?—Quite.

10,598. Suffering, no doubt; but a different outlook?—Yes.

10,599. And there also opportunities would be afforded for observation of cases, and, if unhappily it proved to be necessary, their ultimate removal; just as a patient may be removed from a general hospital now to a place for epileptics, they possibly would have to go to an asylum. But is not the difficulty this, that the general hospitals at the present moment are overtaxed—the accommodation is overtaxed?—Yes. It has occurred to us that that might be met; I do not know about the accommodation, but the expense might be met in part by a subsidy from the State. We are all anxious that that should be brought about, but what inducement you can give to the hospitals to do it, I do not know.

10,600. There is a Committee sitting at this moment in Scotland which is considering this very question, and I have no doubt similar inquiries are being pursued in England; but I do not know that the idea of converting the existing voluntary hospitals into rate-aided institutions or grant-aided institutions finds universal approval?—I was not quite meaning that. I was suggesting paying patients. A person going in in that way as a mildly mental case might possibly carry rate aid, or be a part-paying patient in some form.

10,601. This is a very large subject, and I did not want it to be missed, namely, that you might get those cases dealt with in the special wards of general hospitals, if that could be brought about?—We should favour that very strongly, but we could not suggest details with regard to it.

Sir Thomas Hutchison: Many general hospitals at present are grant-aided. All the hospitals which are carrying out the treatment of venereal disease receive 75 per cent. of the cost from the State through the local authorities.

10,602. Earl Russell: And you might perfectly well make these patients rate-aided if they were patients who would have been rate-aided in an asylum?—Yes, quite.

Sir Ernest Hiley: Is there not a danger of the particular ward in the hospital which deals with these mental cases being stigmatised in the same way?

10,603. Chairman: I suppose that is so, Sir Ernest. I suppose Mr. Parker would not disguise the fact. If a ward be a ward in which mental cases are dealt with, it will be called the mental ward?—I suppose it will.

Earl Russell: It will be called, as Mr. Stewart called it in his cross-examination this morning, “the mad-house” by the other patients.

10,604. Chairman: After all, that is just the trouble. We cannot disguise the facts of human nature by giving them different names. That effort

27 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

is being made a good deal in legislation nowadays by periphrases.—I do not think it matters much what it is called.

Chairman: It is a question of what is going on there.

Earl Russell: And what the public thinks of it.
10,605. Chairman: Yes. That the public should feel that their relatives are liable to ill-treatment is, of course, intolerable?—Yes.

10,606. We are happy to find that there is a very large measure of agreement, the only possible points of divergence being on the detail of carrying it out?—That is so.

10,607. Now comes the next matter, which is the first thing to which our attention is directed in our remit, namely, “the law and administrative machinery in connection with the certification, detention, and care of persons who are, or are alleged to be, of unsound mind.” I gather from the cross-examination of the last two days that there is evidently in the mind of your Society considerable dissatisfaction with the existing methods of certification. Now you may take it that we know the existing methods pretty well, because we have been well indoctrinated by the evidence we have heard upon the subject?—Quite.

10,608. A number of suggestions have already been made to us. With one of them, I gather, you are in complete agreement, and that is that there should be no difference in the methods of certification, whatever they are, as between the private patient on the one hand and what has hitherto been called the pauper patient on the other?—That is so.

10,609. Now, if I may say so, it is superfluous for you to dwell upon that point, because every person who has sat in that chair has told us the same thing. Therefore, whatever be your recommendations with regard to the improvement of the safeguards of certification, I take it you would wish the same safeguards applied to all classes of patients?—That is so. We look upon that distinction as almost an historical survival.

10,610. I ventured myself to put it that there should be no difference in matters of this sort, because in this connection class and mass are quite irrelevant considerations?—Quite.

10,611. Having got that length, that we should have a uniformity of system if it is possible, let us see what the system should be. There is a great variety of procedure set out in the Act of 1890. I have no doubt you have studied it?—Yes, I have.

10,612. Have you felt, as I confess I have felt, some little difficulty in understanding the different circumstances under which different sections of the Act should be brought into play?—I have felt great difficulty. If one had had more time, I think it might have been possible to trace out where they came from, but I think in substance it is the result of the amalgamation of the various Acts, starting with the Vagrancy Acts and coming right up to modern times.

10,613. You think some of them are vestiges of earlier codes of law?—Certainly, the last century, and, I think, the century before.

Chairman: We have had officials who have said to us that they do not find the existing code in this matter comfortable to administer, that is to say, they have not found the programme laid out for them to be sufficiently clear.

Earl Russell: Or elastic.

10,614. Chairman: Or elastic. Again, I suppose, we may have your concurrence in that view?—I think it is extremely complex.

10,614A. Now let us think for a moment what are the cases in real life which have to be met. There is the patient, a well-to-do person with ample means and ample accommodation, who can call for the services of nurses and first-class medical attendance, and so on; and from that stage at one end, through varying gradations, we pass through the stage of the small, but quite comfortable, home of a respectable working man and his family, down to the class of person who is to be seen occasionally in the streets of our cities, ragged and insane, with no one to look after him at all, and no home. You have that gradation of persons and all these different types. I wonder if it would be possible to devise one system of certification for all those classes, or must we still recognise some differentiation?—I think our view is, that the system should be one, but the differentiation would come about from the way in which it was put into force, that is to say, that the man with money and means must, obviously, and would always be in a different position from the man without.

10,615. Of course, one has to remember that possibly, even, the susceptibilities of the parties would differ to some extent, because if you take a person from surroundings with which he is familiar and put him into other surroundings of a totally different type it may produce unhappy results in an unstable mind?—We quite agree with that, and, if we may say so, that is one of the arguments we shall advance presently as an objection to these urgency orders, that the upset to the patient's mentality, of course, is much greater in some cases than it is in others.

10,616. For instance, if you take the different classes I was figuring a moment ago, you must have some place of immediate disposal for the person who is in the street, possibly in rags, shouting and gesticulating, surrounded by a crowd. Now that person, in my humble opinion, is entitled to just the same consideration as any other person?—I quite agree.

10,617. He is there, one of the unhappy waifs of civilisation, if you please, but how are you to deal with his case? What would naturally happen? Let us think of facts again. A policeman comes upon the scene, of course, and he says, “What's this?”; then somebody says, “There is a looney there, making a row,” or something of that sort. The policeman goes up—and one is glad to know that our police are very humane people, as a rule—and would say, “Come along, now,” and he would possibly send for an ambulance or, if the person is not very bad, just ask him to walk along, and the man may have the good sense to do so. Where is that person to be taken?—We think he must go to the infirmary ward of a workhouse, but we hope it will be a very different infirmary ward from what it is at present.

10,618. Do you think the workhouse is the only place we can relegate him to?—I think yes, for that particular type. It may be that in years to come we shall have voluntary institutions willing to deal with that type of case.

10,619. Earl Russell: He has got to be disinfected and clothed, among other things?—Yes, he is the true genus pauper.

10,620. Chairman: But suppose the case is not that which we have figured—which, as you have said, is the true genus pauper, and it is no more degradation for him to be taken to the workhouse, because he has probably come from a workhouse: suppose the case of a person who is obviously a most respectable working man or a professional man, apparently well-to-do, but who had just become afflicted in the same way. Is he to be taken off to the workhouse also?—No. We say he is to be taken to his home, be it an artisan's cottage or a bigger establishment.

Earl Russell: While still violent?

10,621. Chairman: Is not that an appalling idea? Supposing the unhappy wife was at home, and the policeman had taken this person, do you suggest he should be brought in an ambulance to his own private home, and the door opened by the maid or the wife, and the first thing that happens is that the lunatic is thrust into the house?—If you are dealing with an ambulance case, he must unquestionably go to the infirmary.

10,622. I think it would be better, would it not, to get him taken to an observation ward of an asylum at once—one of those provisional wards we are contemplating?

27 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Earl Russell: We can do that equally with the pauper, because the asylum is a rate-aided place, and it could supply the necessary clothes and so on.

10,623. Chairman: Yes.—Mr. Stewart points out to me that under the common law right of arrest he may be taken to any place suitable to his means, not necessarily to the asylum; there are other places; and then the process we shall come to presently would be set in motion by the sworn information of the man who arrests him.

10,624. Earl Russell: Do you mean a licensed house?—No, I did not contemplate a licensed house. It is a question of keeping him somewhere until the process of the law can be set in operation. I think the practical difficulties of a case of that sort are rather disposed of by the facility of communication nowadays. You can get in touch with his people pretty quickly. You might keep him at the police station.

10,625. He might go to the infirmary ward of a workhouse for twenty-four hours, if it were properly run?—Yes, that was my suggestion.

10,626. Chairman: Incidental to any system, your most perfect system involves interference, and an unauthorised interference, with the liberty of the subject, at least for some time. Is not that so?—I agree; for some time.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Not unauthorised, Sir. Common law right, if disorderly. The common law of England provides for that.

Chairman: I doubt if it does, because the only remedy there is the Habeas corpus.

Earl Russell: Anyhow, the two things are quite different. In the one case you take him to a police cell.

10,627. Chairman: What I am thinking of is this: before you can get any protective machinery in operation, the very nature of the disease involves that you may have to exercise a kind of control over one of your fellow beings, that you would have no right whatever to exercise in the case of a person not so afflicted?—I agree—a temporary control.

10,628. Of course, that is an infringement of the liberty of the subject?—It is an infringement which takes place every day in the case of an accident or anything else.

10,629. Exactly; with this difference, probably, that the person whose leg is broken in the street says, "Take me to a hospital," whereas the person who is insane says, "I am not going to one of your asylums"?—Then there is the case of the person who is drunk.

10,630. But he is a criminal, and he is taken up as being drunk and disorderly. It does seem as if, whatever be the scheme devised, there must be, in some cases at least, no time available for those deliberate protective measures which one would seek to devise?—No; we recognise that from the nature of the disease it must be so.

10,631. But one wants that as little of what one may call unauthorised detention should be permitted as possible?—That emergency action of that sort should be limited as closely as possible.

10,632. Yes. Of course, on the other hand, that does bring one back to this, that you may have to have some form of emergency order?—I think so, unquestionably.

10,633. To secure time for more deliberate consideration?—Unquestionably, but if I may say so, we hope in a much less number of cases than at present. I was rather surprised to see 60 per cent., I think it was, mentioned in the evidence of the British Medical Association.

10,634. Earl Russell: Might I take you back to the very case we have been listening to for the last two days? Assuming it to be a fact that if Mr. H. had been left alone at Croydon he would have run into the street with a shaved head and created a disturbance, would it not have been kinder to the patient to certify him under an urgency order then, than to give him that chance?—I must say that with a man of his means the kinder thing would have been to have sent him to his flat with a couple of male attendants.

Earl Russell: But you have no right to do that.

10,635. Chairman: You could not do it unless he is willing?—The evidence as I have followed it —

10,636. Earl Russell: The evidence was that he was not willing to submit to any restraint, and that he might run out into the street and be taken up by the police. If that were the true case, was it not kinder to have an urgency order than to have let that happen?—I think I should have let him run out. I do not think that an urgency order was fully justified on that hypothesis.

10,637. I think if he were my brother, I should not?—I would rather not express an opinion. Putting this particular patient out of the question, I am not at all sure I could assent to that—namely, that because you think a man is going to do something, you are justified in signing an urgency order. We are raising a big question here. It is a matter of opinion, I think.

Chairman: Of course, we find many of the things under discussion here are matters of opinion. There is, in every system a point at which the discretion of some individual must operate. The whole question is within what limits that discretion is to be allowed to operate.

10,638. Earl Russell: Supposing a workman has taken a chopper and has said to his wife on two occasions that he is going to chop the children's heads off: Is she to wait until he has done it, before she signs the urgency order?—Is certification a proper remedy there?

10,639. Ought he not to be dealt with at once? I am assuming he is of unsound mind, and is not the kind thing to do, to take him to a police cell?—Threats are made by lots of people who are not of unsound mind. If he is of unsound mind, I agree that is a case for an urgency order.

10,640. Chairman: I do not think Mr. Parker suggests there should be no urgency orders. The question he is concerned with is that the urgency order should not be resorted to except in cases which justify it?—That is the point I was trying to make.

10,641. The urgency order is one which is designed to meet an emergency?—Yes, that is the point I was trying to make.

Chairman: I think we have reached a stage at which we might conveniently adjourn.

(The Witness withdrew.)

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER, recalled.

10,642. (Chairman): Mr. Parker, yesterday afternoon we had discussed with you the suggestions of your Society with regard to the treatment of voluntary patients, and you had favoured us with various suggestions as to how that might be worked out?—Yes.

10,643. I think we all recognise that the provision of some such system of treatment may well have an effect on the whole administration of the Lunacy Law, because it seems at various points to meet the difficulties which are experienced in the administration of the existing code, by providing periods of observation, and in that way possibly obviating formal certification in many cases that are at present certified. That is an important aspect of it?—Yes, subject to this, that in the case of existing mental institutions it would only be a transitory step.

10,644. We all recognise at the moment that while the ideal would be the provision of quite separate establishments, either in association with general hospitals, or possibly quite independent, taking matters as they stand at present, some improvement could be achieved by permitting voluntary patients to be received on a carefully adjusted basis in existing public institutions?—Yes; and there are, as you know, existing private philanthropic institutions; there is one for ex-service men, recently opened at Beckenham.

10,645. I think we have the general view of your Society on that aspect of the case, and I propose this morning that we should pass to the topic which you deal with next, namely, the actual process of certification as at present carried on, and the amendments which you advocate upon that system. Might we take that up now?—Yes. Might I just make this suggestion? Later on in my proof there is an attempt to get at the legal definition of "sanity." I do not know whether it would help you if you took that now, and then trace its application.

10,646. Whichever way you think is more convenient?—It is in its wrong place there.

10,647. Let us take it now if you think right. Where do you deal with it?—Page 41.

10,648. Let us just take up that before we go into the procedure of certification. Now I gather that you have views upon the question of the definition of insanity which you wish to put before us?—Yes. I have endeavoured to extract from the Act, as we read it, three standards, as I call them, of insanity which seem to be set up under the Act. There is, first of all, the standard under inquisition, or its survival from inquisition, where a person is of unsound mind, and is incapable of managing himself and his affairs.

10,649. We will just take the references; it will be useful to have a note?—Section 90, sub-section (1); Section 94, sub-section (1); Section 95; and Section 98, sub-section (1); with the reservation in Section 98 (2), which perhaps I had better read.

10,650. Yes?—"If upon such inquisition it appears that the alleged lunatic is of unsound mind, so as to be incapable of managing his affairs, but that he is capable of managing himself, and is not dangerous to himself or to others, it may be so specially found and certified."

10,651. Now that is one of the statutory standards. There are others, are there not?—There are others which seem to be set up under the proceedings by petition, and other proceedings which are called summary proceedings which do not require the intervention of urgency orders.

10,652. I think it will be quite useful if we collect together the various phrases which have been used?—The general standard (I have not attempted to quote it with all its limitations) is that a person is "a lunatic," which is defined as "of unsound mind"—that is Section 4, sub-section (1). Then the next reference is Section 13—that is the summary reception order—sub-section (1). The next reference is Section 14, sub-section (1)—that is the notice to be given of a pauper lunatic who ought to be sent to an asylum by a relieving officer. The next is Section 15, sub-section (1), a lunatic wandering at large. Then for the purposes of the reception order you seem to get an additional standard introduced, viz.:—that he is not only a lunatic but that he is a proper person to be detained.

10,653. Yes. The words "a proper person to be detained" are contained in certain of the sections also?—Section 13, sub-section (3), Section 16 and

28 January, 1925.]

MR. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Section 23 (2). That is the reception order by two Commissioners. What I would like to emphasise there is this, that apparently the judicial authority finds something a little different to what the doctor finds, he finds he is a proper person to be detained. Those sections I have quoted are all sections in which the judicial authority is operating.

Earl Russell: Do the words "a proper person to be detained" not come in the form of the medical certificate?

10,654. Chairman: They do, I think. The phrase there is, "proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment." That is the phrase used in Form 8?—Yes, I see that. So that it comes to this, that the form does take us a little further than the terms of the Statute.

10,655. And again a slightly varying phraseology; it is not "a proper person to be detained," but "a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment." We might add that to your collection of phrases used in the Statute?—Yes. Then we pass to the third standard, which is, broadly speaking, "the welfare of the person, or the public safety," and that is primarily set up to justify summary detention. You will find that in Section 11 (1), which is the ordinary form of urgency order, and you find it again in Section 20, and again in Section 21, sub-section (1). Now, Sir, those sections provide periods respectively of seven, three and 14 days. It is perhaps convenient to note that, and then when those periods have been in operation, the other process comes into operation. In fact, this welfare of the person and public safety is operated to justify the urgency detention, and seems to stop, having served its purpose. The magistrate then comes in if he is invoked, and applies the other standards, presumably. Then that limitation (though it is not very clear, it is, perhaps, worth mentioning) seems to be set up again by the Statute when it is considering the discharge of patients.

10,656. The other end of the history?—Yes. It is not quite so clear there, but I think, perhaps, it is worth referring to Section 49—that is, the two medical men, "Any person may apply to have the patient examined."

10,657. The standard there is, "without risk of injury to himself or the public"?—Yes. It is slightly different in phraseology, but I suggest it is rather the same in substance. Then Section 74 is the next. That is the medical superintendent's veto on discharge, and he may exercise that veto if he certifies in writing that the patient "is dangerous and unfit to be at large." Then the last one that I have noted is Section 79, the discharge of a patient on the application of his relatives or friends. There the necessary conditions are much wider, but it is in this form that he shall be properly taken care of and "prevented from doing injury to himself or others." It is the same in substance, but rather different in phraseology.

10,658. Have you any observation on that diversity of terminology?—We cannot help suggesting that it is a most confusing terminology, and, as far as one can see, unnecessary; and that the standard required for reception should also be that required for discharge. It is a logical conclusion. I might say that where the magistrate interferes and sets up a standard of unsound mind which justifies him in committing, we are not at all satisfied that the medical superintendent exercises anything like the same standard in discharging. We think that the medical view of what constitutes sanity is infinitely stricter than that of a magistrate, or what I might call the jury, and we think that that is hardly logical.

10,659. There is a difficulty there which some of the medical witnesses have emphasised. Let us assume the case is one proper for detention: everything is in order, and everyone would agree that the patient is a proper subject for a detention order. He is an inmate of an institution for some time, and fortunately his case is improving. Now there is a practical difficulty there, which seems rather to differentiate, from one point of view at least, the discharge process from the admission process, because the exact moment of convalescence is a very difficult thing to define. The man is for the moment ex hypothesi in the hands of a doctor, and the doctor may think: "Well, this patient is on the high road to recovery; I really could not say at this moment, if I were asked de novo to consider the case, whether it was a case proper for detention. On the other hand, I could say, looking at the case medically, that to send the patient away at this stage of his convalescence might be very detrimental to him." It is a very difficult question?—It is; and we think that that is a question which a medical man ought not to be asked to decide. The risk of deciding it is so great that one has to recognise that he must defer his decision until he is certain; just as it is difficult to decide, it is equally difficult to be certain. Somebody has got to take the risk.

10,660. It seems to me that the process of recovery is not a process in which you can say that at one moment the man has completely recovered and the previous moment he was detainable. Then one feels there is this: that the only person who can really pronounce that the convalescence has reached a stage when the patient can go back to the world and face it again is the doctor; it is so eminently a medical question. I cannot quite imagine a magistrate deciding the moment when one is convalescent from any ailment?—There is the alternative which the statute provides under Section 55. When we come to deal with that, we shall have to make some comments upon it. The statute did contemplate that very practical test: let him out and see.

10,661. That is a very useful point. I am only putting this criticism to you: whether one can say that the convalescent stage, which is really what you have in mind here, is precisely the same and should be judged in precisely the same way as the admission stage. I see the logical point. You may say: If for his admission he requires a magistrate's intervention, equally you may say that the person discharging should be the magistrate. I see the logical force of that, but I am thinking of it a little more practically for the moment, and I do see a medical difficulty there.

10,662. Earl Russell: He is, in practice, in rate-aided institutions; there is a public authority there—namely, the visiting committee, they are the discharging authority. You do have the public intervening, or somebody representing them?—Yes, and I am reminded that Dr. Lewis dealt with this point. It is in Mr. Stewart's note. "I do not think that the onus of detention should be put upon the medical superintendent. I welcome the intervention of the legal or judicial element. My view is that the cases should be passed in review by the judicial authority which originally certified."

Sir David Drummond: Would the medical superintendent not be bound to take notice of what he would conceive as the prognosis of the case; that would enter into it very forcibly? That is to say, he would not discharge the patient, though he might think him at the time practically recovered, if he thought there was the liability of a relapse at an early period.

10,663. Chairman: Yes, I have always felt this to be a very difficult part of our investigation, because again thinking of the patient's welfare, which is what one ought to think of, the doctor and indeed the visiting committee, are both faced with this dilemma: they have no legal right to detain a man a moment beyond the time at which he is mentally sane. That is the technical position?—Quite.

10,664. And if these matters were susceptible of precise definition and ascertainment there would be no difficulty. The real difficulty in this chapter of the law is that that moment at which (in the interest of the patient) his discharge can be effected is a very difficult moment to define. I mean even if you are to try it out with all the apparatus of a Judge and a jury. I can imagine Judges or any tribunals

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

taking very different views as to the propriety of discharging a particular case. One wants a safeguard there, but I commend to your consideration the practical difficulty of the case, having regard to this: suppose we all agreed that he was sane; we saw the gentleman as a jury and said, "Now this person is in our opinion sane; he has recovered, but we are equally satisfied that although recovered, and therefore no longer detainable, the worst possible thing for him at this stage of his recovery would be to send him out." In every other illness there is a period in which people say: "He has quite recovered, but he requires another month's rest before he can get back to his ordinary life." There is that difficulty there. If you were to restore the person at once to ordinary life you might defeat the whole purpose of his treatment?—I quite realise that, but if I may say so, that seems to me a very dangerous theory to admit, that though a patient is sane, because it is to his general advantage that he should have another month's restriction, therefore he should be kept there.

10,665. I should agree with you at once; in fact it would be illegal at the present moment?—It would, and that is what in fact is continually happening.

10,666. I say that would be illegal, and is illegal at the present moment; but I am envisaging the practical difficulties that arise, and wondering what the solution is. One solution put forward was, that the patient at that stage should become a voluntary boarder, that is to say, a patient who may leave if he wishes, and should pass out of the category of a legally detainable patient into that of a voluntary patient. That would be one way?—Quite.

10,667. The other one you were suggesting just now, the utilisation of Section 55, the parole system, is excellent; but then again remember, would not even that involve an infringement of the law, because the patient when on parole is still legally detained and subject to a legal nexus which, in your view, and I rather think in my view also, would be illegal. If he were sent out on parole really recovered, the nexus should disappear there?—Yes.

10,668. The parole system does not quite meet this difficulty. How are we to deal with the case of a patient in process of recovery, who has not reached the state of health in which it would be fair to restore him to the strain of ordinary life? He must have an intervening period of complete convalescence. What are we to do with that case, in your view?—We submit this that, first of all, we quite recognise that the logical test is not the only one; there must be a practical test behind it, and we say the first practical test is that you should reintroduce the civil element to confer with the doctor and reach a conclusion. Though I quite appreciate the difficulty of what you are going to do. One possibility would be an extension of these After Care Associations—that seems a distinct line of advance.

10,669. Earl Russell: You have all the difficulty there, of course, of losing the rate-aided contribution, unless you change the system?—Would you, under Section 55?

10,670. Not while he is on trial?—I did touch on this in my proof. If it ever comes about that people who serve long periods in asylums and work there, are allowed to be paid for it, which is one of the suggestions we are going to make, I think you might get an accumulating fund there in an individual case, which would be applicable to the cost of some after-care treatment.

10,671. Chairman: That would only deal with some cases, of course?—I quite appreciate that.

10,672. Earl Russell: I want to ask you what would you do about it yourself if you were the honest and well-meaning superintendent of an asylum who, after a great deal of difficulty, had a rather bad case practically recovered, but you knew perfectly well as a doctor if you sent him home it would do him great harm and possibly cause a relapse. What would you feel about it yourself?—I should feel this that, first of all, I should certainly give the patient freedom, as the Chairman suggested, make him a voluntary boarder. That would be a mental tonic to him, I should think. Secondly, I recognise that before you could send him out on trial you have to ascertain what his home conditions are, and they may be quite unsuitable.

10,673. And if they were, of course, it would be bad for the patient?—And if they were, the only proper step there is to send him back to the infirmary, if he is a pauper or dependent upon the rates.

10,674. Where he would be probably less well treated than in the asylum?—We hope that state of things will not continue.

10,675. Less well fed?—I am not even sure about that.

10,676. Chairman: Another great drawback would arise there—we are taking Lord Russell's case: imagine transferring the patient from the care of the very medical attendant who has achieved the cure to the care of a workhouse doctor who has not known the case at all, and placing him in surroundings which were, we shall assume, less suitable, with possibly the cessation of the treatment, whatever it was he was receiving, and the change into a new environment just at the critical stage of recovery—would not that be rather a menace to your patient? Supposing one were recovering and feeling restored, feeling a new outlook on life and feeling that one is getting better, then to be told: "Now we cannot keep you any longer." Let us assume you have confidence in the doctor, that you have been getting on very well, you liked your surroundings, and all the rest of it, and you were at the moment in a condition when you could no longer be a certifiable patient, and yet, undoubtedly, for your own welfare, a fortnight, or a month, or two months, might be necessary to complete your convalescence so as to enable you to return to ordinary life; I do not look with pleasure at the idea of this patient being sent to a workhouse infirmary?—In that case, if he has confidence in his doctor, it is completely covered if you provide that he may become a voluntary boarder.

10,677. Earl Russell: We know perfectly well that many working men, after illness, have to go back to work much sooner than a doctor would like them to. It is not impossible that they should go back to work, it does not kill them, but, in fact, it is a bad thing for them to do. In the patient's interests you do not want to send him out into an unfriendly world?—When the patient has reached that stage of cure, I think the patient will recognise that, and, as far as one reads the proofs, they do recognise it in certain cases. The medical superintendents have said so; and they do not seem to raise any objection to staying another month.

10,678. Chairman: In the case we are putting, the patient is sane?—Quite; he is able to judge, and a sympathetic medical superintendent will point all that out to him.

10,679. Earl Russell: You mean you would like the medical superintendent to say to him: "You are free, but if you take my advice you will stop here another month"?—Yes.

Chairman: Yes, that seems very much to the purpose.

Sir David Drummond: Are we to understand that Mr. Parker wishes the process of discharge to be set in motion from the time the medical superintendent regards him as no longer certifiable?

Chairman: I think not. He does not wish the medical superintendent to be the person who says he has now recovered—and we are assuming that, whether by the medical superintendent or some other machinery, it has been decided that he has recovered; then this other point arises.

Witness: Yes.

10,680. Sir David Drummond: A long time before the patient has recovered he may be in the position that he is not any longer certifiable—if he were starting de novo?—I recognise there is that period, and we say the responsibility or the difficulty in

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

arriving at a decision is so great that we think that the outside authority, the judicial authority or visiting committee, should come in and collaborate with the doctor in that decision, to relieve him of the onus of reaching such an important decision.

10,681. From the moment that he is regarded as no longer certifiable?—That seems to us to be a very difficult question of fact. We suggest that the statute does, in fact, lay down that that decision shall be arrived at partly by the visiting committee, undoubtedly.

10,682. Chairman: You are not content, I take it, for the visiting committee as a body to adjudicate upon this matter, partly because, in experience, you find that the visiting committee take their cue from the medical superintendent?—Quite. I think the great bulk of our patients are very definite on that point—that the details of their case are never gone into with the visiting committee. Sometimes they are called before the visiting committee, but only for the purpose of discharge.

10,683. And also a point arises in this way: I gather you say, and, indeed, there must be some foundation for it, that the cases appropriate for discharge are brought to the cognisance of the visiting committee by the medical superintendent, and therefore the burden is upon the medical superintendent to initiate the proceedings?—Yes. We are not at all sure really that, in a great many cases, the visiting committee does function in that respect. In fact, I could show you returns taken from the Board of Control Report where they have not met.

10,684. That is the trouble I mentioned yesterday, that when you delegate things to an authority, you may not have an efficient authority?—We say there is only one proper controlling authority to introduce, and that is public opinion.

Earl Russell: Even if efficient, a visiting committee could hardly know enough to initiate discharges in going round the asylums.

Chairman: Yes. I think we might defer this a little, because Mr. Parker deals with this on the question of detention. It only applies at this point because Mr. Parker assimilated the stage of discharge to the stage of admission, and suggested that what was appropriate at the stage of admission would be equally appropriate at the stage of discharge; and I was only putting to Mr. Parker some considerations which seemed to make the stage of discharge different in character from the stage of admission.

Witness: Yes. Mr. Stewart points out to me that, in the case of a private patient, Section 72 says this: "A private patient detained in an institution for lunatics or under care as a single patient, shall be discharged if the person on whose petition the reception order was made by writing under his hand so directs."

10,685. Unless there is a barring certificate?—Yes. That is in very general terms. That is a different class of case.

10,686. But again the whole matter is open to us including Section 72, whether that is appropriate?—Quite.

10,687. Earl Russell: It looks rather there as if the private patient was regarded as the prisoner of the petitioner rather than as the prisoner of the institution. Surely, the visiting committee stands in the same position as the petitioner. They can also discharge them?—Yes, in the next section, Section 73.

Chairman: Just take another class of case which is difficult. We know there are cases of what is called "recurrent mania," that is to say, you have a person who is very bad, and then has intervals in which you and I will agree the man is perfectly sane—not a certifiable person at all. Then you have a recurrence of it again. I have no doubt that there are cases in our institutions of persons who are the unhappy victims of that most distressing malady, recurrent mania, of whom on a particular day you and I would say, "That man is perfectly sane—what is he doing here?" The answer is, "Three days ago he was in a complete frenzy," and probably in three weeks to come he would be in the same condition. How are we to deal with that? Because at the moment, in my opinion, he really would not be a certifiable person, but, of course, to let him out would be a most dangerous thing, because he is a person of unsound mind. He is suffering from a disease, namely, recurrent mania.

10,688. Earl Russell: Of course a doctor would not say he was a sane person?—No. I have another case in mind. It is the case of a gentleman now who has been in seven asylums off and on, sometimes at intervals of two or three years, sometimes at intervals of six months, but he is doing perfectly useful work in between. We could call him, but perhaps you would take the evidence from me. He is at present in employment. In that case it is rather curious. One of the asylums he was in recently he could not get out of; but quite deliberately he arranged for a transfer to another institution, where he was told the conditions would be much easier, so he got himself transferred with the object of being discharged, and in due course he was discharged. His view is, if he had stopped in the first institution, I will not say he would never have got out, but it would have been much more difficult, and that is not an isolated case. The patients know that the standard of discharge varies very much in different institutions; so in practice it must depend upon the medical superintendent.

10,689. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I just want to make the point which perhaps Mr. Parker rather anticipated, that the real desire is to protect the individual against any lapse of efficiency on the part of the medical superintendent. Is it not better to have an outside person who will consult with the medical superintendent, and, so to speak, be the friend of the individual?—We consider it is a point that requires two or even more brains on it.

10,690. Where is he going to get his information from?—From the patient primarily; from the patient's friends, who, we are told, and it is so, I think, have numerous chances of observation; from the case book; from the doctor, and I think very often from other patients, though you might not look upon that as reliable evidence. Still there is plenty of it available—people who have really had this man under much more close observation from hour to hour than the doctor certainly.

10,691. Then with regard to the case of recurrent mania, where would he get his information as to the recurrence of these attacks?—From the case book and the Board of Control files.

10,692. It would be from the medical superintendent?—And the Board of Control, if the recurrence was over a period of years.

10,693. So that he really has to depend very largely for his evidence upon what the medical superintendent can provide?—Up to a point; we quite recognise that.

10,694. Chairman: I do not think Mr. Parker would suggest that the medical superintendent, if he is doing his duty, and has the case under observation, would not be the proper person to state the history of the case to this independent authority?—Not at all.

10,695. Let us follow that a little further. You have spoken on a point which I have not the least doubt is perfectly sound, namely, that the discharge process may vary in different institutions. What you are concerned with is this, that you may have a case in which the medical superintendent is over cautious, having regard to the consequences, which of course are very serious to him, if a patient is discharged and then goes and commits suicide. There might be very serious reflections on the medical superintendent for having advised the visiting committee that this case was proper for discharge. The newspapers would comment very adversely on that medical superintendent for having allowed this person out. Your suggestion is that the medical superintendent should not have the sole responsibility in such a case, but that some independent judgment should be brought to bear upon it?—We think in cases of extreme difficulty that the intervention of a judicial authority would help. It would disarm just that type of criticism which you suggest.

10,696. I am not so much impressed, at least under the present system, with the value of the justice's intervention as perhaps I should be?—As we go through perhaps we shall have other points at which the justice may be of use.

10,697. Earl Russell: Might I ask you if you know much about the actual practice in rate-aided asylums now?—No, not individually.

10,698. Does this in fact happen: the visiting committee frequently go through the wards and quite often patients say they are wrongfully detained and ask to get out, and it does happen that, if they produce any impression of apparent sanity, the member of the visiting committee who has been spoken to does look up the case book and talk to the medical superintendent about it, and he serves to some extent the watch-dog purpose you are suggesting?—We know that that happens, but we should like to know how often it happens.

Earl Russell: That is, I think, a sound comment.

10,699. Chairman: One of the real difficulties that surrounds this is that the worst cases are the cases which are most insistent on their release?—Quite.

10,700. And I think any of us who have visited these institutions and have spoken to patients ourselves have found that the most insistent case is generally a case in which you can have no possible doubt—which even we could certify and could appreciate was a case proper for detention. Do not think one is the least critical of your points. It is just of the essence of the points that your Society is so interested in?—Quite. Of course we feel we are trying to put the patient's point of view.

10,701. I confess that that is in my mind the whole time, as you can see from the trend of my examination.

Earl Russell: That is the very point we are looking at.

10,702. Chairman: Yes. In that we are entirely at one, I hope?—I hope so.

10,704. Now that definition you have a comment upon, have you not?—Yes. The comment is on page 42.

10,705. I think your comment is that it is too vague?—Yes, our comment is that it is too vague a term by itself, and in the hands of a newly qualified practitioner of course it leaves room for all sorts of interpretations. We submit in that connection that conduct really is the test, and that it is the test applied in this definition, or one of the tests. Perhaps I might just draw your attention in this connection to the definition proposed by the British Medical Association.

10,706. Please do?—That, I think, is in paragraph 16, and reads as follows: "Persons of unsound mind means persons who by reason of mental disorder may properly be taken charge of and detained for care and treatment." We do suggest that that word "properly" is rather begging the question; it seems to us it might cover almost anything.

10,707. Mr. Micklem: What would you insert?—The other definition is "consequently incapable of managing himself and his affairs." It does set up a definite standard. That is the one recommended by the Report of 1908.

10,708. Earl Russell: Does it not occur to you that a man who commits a murder may be described as quite capable of managing himself?—And his affairs.

Earl Russell: Certainly.

10,709. Chairman: The British Medical Association's suggested definition is "'Persons of unsound mind' means persons who by reason of mental disorder may properly be taken charge of and detained for care and treatment." One notices as a feature of all these attempted definitions, that they define the person by the steps which are necessary to deal with him, they define him by the consequences of his condition rather than by the attributes of his condition which entail those consequences. I think all are agreed that for the purposes of legislation a pathological definition would be impossible and undesirable, therefore the criterion must be some criterion which is based upon his suitability for treatment. It must be a criterion based, if you please, upon his conduct or his ability, which requires that he should be subjected to this particular form of treatment involving detention?—Quite.

10,710. It must be, I am afraid, defined by its consequences, rather than by its attributes. I do not see how we can do it otherwise?—We only want to submit generally that the second definition I have read is really very vague.

10,711. Earl Russell: But then the courts would have to interpret the word "properly" or some similar word?—Yes, I know.

10,712. What a jury would think proper?—We should like to lay down some guide to juries as to what was the standard to be applied.

10,713. Chairman: Of course implicit in any of these phrases there is a standard, because when you say "capable of managing his own affairs" that must mean capable of managing his affairs as a reasonable man manages his affairs. A reasonable man is a familiar figure in the Law Courts, but he is not always recognisable as the same person. There is that implication obviously in all these attempts to define a standard?—We are suggesting they should be explicit up to a point, if possible, but how far you can carry that, of course, it is not for us to say, but the Commission of 1908 tried to make it more explicit, I submit, and that is the general view we put before you.

10,714. Certainly the avoidance of varying terms to describe the condition of the patient seems desirable. A uniform terminology would be more appropriate. One knows that as a principle of legislation it is undesirable to pass from one formula to another formula in the course of the same Act, because that leads to a suggestion that something different is meant at the different stages, whereas you point to the desirability that whatever be the formula adopted it should be uniform and consistently applied throughout the statute?—Uniform; and we say there that the statute made very useful standards—the "capacity to manage himself" and "safety to the public."

10,715. Would you add "patient's welfare"?—Yes, if it is adjudicated on. The difficulty we feel is that the medical view of the patient's welfare is often and must be quite different from that of the man in the street, and also, I think, of the Law Courts.

10,716. Earl Russell: Not always, I hope?—I say it not in a sense of criticism. I think they are going for an ideal of perfection or of cure which is not attainable. We think it is a very serious thing to interfere with the liberty of the subject just because you think you can turn him out to a standard.

10,717. Chairman: The doctor might think it well for the patient to be detained, but the law might say it is well for him, but it is not legal for him to be detained?—Quite. In physical illnesses doctors often give one advice which is absolutely sound, but it does not follow one takes it. You take a risk with your eyes open.

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,718. Of course the risks here are rather of a graver character than the risk one takes when one goes out with a bad cold?—Quite.

10,719. Mr. Micklem: Is not your definition practically the description which the 1890 Act takes?—It is. We say that that gives you two very useful descriptions, but we are not satisfied that they are at present applied. They are scattered about through all the sections, and we think it would be valuable to extract them and put them together as a definite definition of "unsound mind."

10,720. Chairman: I take Mr. Parker's point perfectly. He examines a statute and finds in different sections different criteria are set up, and his suggestion is that it would be desirable to have a uniform criterion by which cases shall be judged, not only on admission, but also for the purposes of discharge.—That covers the whole point.

10,721. Now, Mr. Parker, we will turn from that matter to the question of the methods of certification. I think you had already told us yesterday that your Society advocate the unification of the methods, that is to say, that all cases should be dealt with by one and the same form of procedure?—Yes, that is so.

10,722. And that a recommendation should be made that the existing diversity of procedure should be abolished?—As far as possible.

10,723. And in particular you advocate that the existing distinction of procedure in the case of the private patient, on the one hand, and the pauper patient, on the other hand, should be done away with?—We think they are out of date.

10,724. There was a proposal, was there not, to that effect in the Report of 1908?—There was. It is section 720—shall I read that section?

10,725. If you please, yes.—"Generally in the procedure of certification we adopt the lines of the Lunacy Act of 1890, but in the case of reception orders on petition, we recommend the following changes: The principle of these alterations is to adopt the system in force under the Lunacy Act and extend it to all classes of mentally defective persons as defined in Recommendation IV without regard to the question whether they are 'paupers' or not." That is the point.

10,726. That recommendation has, of course, not been given effect to in the legislation since; we are still under the Act of 1890, which is the subject of comment in that paragraph.—That is so.

10,727. Now you set out the existing methods of procedure which you have classified under six heads?—Yes. I think they have been very fully dealt with in evidence.

10,728. You very conveniently group them all, but I think we have had evidence upon them all from the persons who administer the Act. I hardly think we need put that in, but your comment is that at present putting aside reception after inquisition, there appear to be no less than eight methods by which a lunatic may be certified?—Quite, and apart from the obvious comment we feel that most patients really do not know, and never will know quite, how they have been certified. It is so complicated that it requires rather a highly trained mind to follow it.

10,729. And I think historically you point to this, that this diversity of method is probably an inheritance from the various attempts that were made in the earlier Acts to deal with different cases?—As I say, "probably." I have not had time to trace it out, but I think it is so.

10,730. It is very likely so?—Yes.

10,731. Then, coming to a large matter of principle, I understand the view of your Society is that the certifying authority—I do not mean the medical certifying authority, but the legal certifying authority—should exercise a judicial function in contradistinction to an administrative function?—That is so. We think it was clearly intended in the case of petition, and that it is not so clear (I believe it is a matter of great discussion in the Law Courts), as to what was intended in the other cases, and what the law is at the moment.

10,732. The distinction which exists at present between the ordinary justice who is invoked in the pauper case, and the justice who is clothed with the name of a judicial authority strikes one as rather remarkable. In the one case a selection is made among the justices, and certain of them, it may be all of them, are described as the "judicial authority," which is a much more impressive phrase than the ordinary "justice of the peace." The justice of the peace, pure and simple, if I may so describe him, is regarded as adequate to certify the pauper or rate-aided patient, but for the purpose of certifying the private patient you must have a justice of the peace who has the more grandiloquent designation of a "judicial authority."—Quite.

10,733. After all he is just a justice of the peace, whatever you call him.—That is all in many cases.

10,734. Of course, he may be a selected justice of the peace, and there may be a point there that a certain gentleman who may be interested in this work, or desirous of engaging in it, or has special attributes for it, might be selected. At least there is an opening to the justices of the peace to select persons suitable to the task?—Yes. There is the converse to that which I might put. We have a very distinct feeling that in some institutions there is a justice, often of considerable age, who comes in quite regularly and gets very used to certifying. Obviously that may be an advantage, or it may be a disadvantage.

10,735. It would certainly only be a great disadvantage if the justice came to regard the matter as a mere piece of routine?—That is the danger, we think.

10,736. On the other hand, if he were a person more alive to his duty, his experience might be an asset. Those are the two considerations?—Yes, but we do comment on the very old justices coming in. Evidence will be given before you in one particular case, and they are not isolated comments. It is a line of inquiry we cannot follow up, but I think we ought to bring it before you.

10,737. It hardly requires evidence; we can see that at once.—Quite.

10,738. Now this part of the case is one which we must obviously discuss at some considerable length, because it is very critical. I think you refer, first of all, to our predecessors' recommendations in the Report of 1908, section 726. We may just take the effect of it. Their recommendation was that the magistrate should act judicially and should see the patient?—That is so, "accords best with English feeling," is the way they phrase it. They considered it very carefully.

10,739. They evidently did. Now, in the next place, you point to the provisions of the Act of 1890, in which under Section 9 (2), the judicial authority in the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred on him, is to have the same jurisdiction and power as regards the summoning and examination of witnesses, the administration of oaths and otherwise, as if he were acting in the exercise of his ordinary jurisdiction. I take it your inference from that is that he should act judicially?—That is so. Not only was full provision made in that section, but I also came across another allusion to it which may be of interest. Section 338, sub-section (4). There is a provision there in the case of pressure of work on any one court that "the Lord Chancellor and a Secretary of State respectively may make rules to provide for preventing interference or delay in the exercise of the ordinary jurisdiction of the judges of county courts, and magistrates respectively by the transfer of petitions and notices, or otherwise as such rules may direct."

10,740. Now here we come into an interesting contact between your Society and the British Medical Association. The British Medical Association, in their evidence before us in Appendix A, have collected (but for a different purpose) the various sections of the Act in which the justice of the peace or judicial authority is referred to as being clothed with judicial powers. You remember the passage?—Quite.

10,741. Their purpose, of course, was a different one from what you have in view. Their purpose was to emphasise the judicial character of it in order that all persons taking part in the proceedings should enjoy the protection which everyone enjoys in judicial proceedings. You are looking at it from the patient's point of view?—Quite. They wish, as I understand, to pass on the responsibility, and to cover themselves against any liability for signing a certificate.

10,742. They wish to have the status of witnesses in a law court?—Quite, and we have very strong views on that, of course, antagonistic.

Chairman: You must be consistent, you know, Mr. Parker.

10,743. Earl Russell: Even if it is a judicial enquiry on oath, in public?—We feel this, that the signing of a certificate is such a serious thing, owing to the purpose for which it is going to be used, that it is a condition precedent, quite a separate action; and we think it would be deplorable if the liability to take reasonable care was removed from the medical man, particularly so when, I understand, that is to be coupled with the provision that any medical man may exercise that power fresh from his Varsity; having gone through his 24 lectures, he is to be allowed to go and exercise this power without any limitation on his liability, as we understand the proposal.

10,744. Chairman: That is another topic, but for the moment I was pointing to this, that if we are to go the whole length, and if the proceedings are to be judicial and the doctor is to be relegated to the position of a witness rather than a certifier, then of course, he would have to have the same immunity as any other witness has?—We do not quite suggest that; we suggest that he shall make a report, which is the important document, and so set the law in motion.

10,745. We have already had a collection of the sections of the statute pointing to the judicial character of the procedure as contemplated in the Act, though for a different purpose. Now your comment, I take it, generally upon the existing procedure, is that the intervention of the judicial authority or justice, as the case may be, is not as at present administered an adequate safeguard?—That is so.

10,746. And that for the reason, I take it, that the justices' duties are at least liable to be interpreted as purely administrative and tend to become perfunctory or routine?—In practice; and we further submit that in law there is some want of knowledge as to what the position is. I do not know whether you would like me to refer to the Everett case, just to have it on the note?

10,747. Certainly.—The Everett case is reported in 1920, 3 King's Bench Division, at page 203.

10,748. Then it went also to the House of Lords?—(Mr. Walter Stewart): Yes. This is the dissentient judgment of Lord Justice Atkin we are referring to. He was in a minority in the Court of Appeal.

10,749. What happened in the House of Lords?—(Mr. Parker): I have not looked it up, but I understand in the House of Lords the points raised in the Court of Appeal were not dealt with. Lords Justices Bankes, Scrutton and Atkin were sitting in that case, and I can refer you to the passages if you like, but the first two would not decide the point at all whether the magistrate in that particular case acted in a judicial or administrative capacity. Then Lord Justice Atkin gave a considered judgment of very great interest in which he gave it as his view that the magistrate was acting in an administrative capacity.

10,750. Mr. Micklem: Do you mean in that particular case, or under the Act?—That was the particular case in which these questions cropped up.

10,751. Chairman: On this matter is the decision of Lord Justice Atkin this, that the law prescribed that the justice shall act in an administrative capacity, on his reading of the law, or did he merely say that this particular justice who functioned in this particular case chose to act in an administrative capacity, whatever be his duty?—Perhaps I had better read you the passage, because it was a very involved judgment.

10,752. Just read the passage from Lord Justice Atkin?—The passage is: "I come to the conclusion that the justice of the peace, acting under Section 16 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, is acting as an administrator and not as a judge."

10,753. That is a general pronouncement?—Yes. (Mr. Walter Stewart): The other judges took the other view. (Mr. Parker): He was in a minority, and that is the position of the law to-day, I believe. (Mr. Walter Stewart): That page 203 is his criticism in which he argues that the justice must be acting in an administrative capacity.

10,754. Mr. Micklem: Did the other Lords Justices agree?—(Mr. Walter Stewart): No, they did not; they held that he was acting judicially.

10,755. Earl Russell: As far as I understand they did not deal with the point?—(Mr. Parker): They would not deal with it. Lord Justice Bankes dealt with it in this way: "It becomes unnecessary therefore to express any opinion whether the respondent Griffiths when acting under Section 16 was acting in a judicial or in an administrative capacity."

10,756. Earl Russell: Do I understand that this point was not raised in the House of Lords?—I understand not—not decided.

Mr. Micklem: They do not seem to differ; they simply said they would not express an opinion.

Chairman: That is quite a different point from saying that Lords Justices Bankes and Scrutton differed from Lord Justice Atkin.

Witness: I do not think I said they differed.

10,757. Chairman: Now that is a comment upon the existing machinery. The justice of the peace, or the judicial authority at any rate, according to the view of one eminent Judge is acting in an administrative capacity and not in a judicial capacity. Whether that is sound or not, of course one cannot say, but the view expressed there is entitled of course to great weight. It is at that point, I understand, that you join issue with the existing legislation, because if Lord Justice Atkin's view is correct, your opinion is that the functionary should not act in an administrative capacity, but should act in a judicial capacity and that should be made plain to him on the face of the Act?—Yes.

10,758. That it should be expressly so enacted?—So enacted.

10,759. Now follow that a little further. At the moment the justice of the peace or judicial authority has, in the ordinary case, two means of forming an opinion, whether he forms it administratively or judicially. He has the means of examining two medical certificates or one?—Yes.

10,760. And he has the duty in the one case, and the right in the other, of seeing the actual person?—Or not seeing him.

10,761. I put it in that way: the option in the one case, and the duty in the other, of actually seeing the patient?—Yes.

10,762. He is furnished by the statute with further powers of investigation if he chooses to utilise them; but may we take it that the great majority of cases (this is the tenor of the evidence we have had) are disposed of on the medical certificate or certificates presented to the justice, with the personal presence of the patient in the one case, and with the option of the patient's presence in the other case?—Quite.

10,763. And that represents the extent of the material that in the ordinary case is before the justice, unless he chooses to avail himself of the further powers that are open to him?—Quite.

10,764. That leaves it to the discretion of the justice as to whether or not he will resort to those further powers of enquiry?—Absolutely, at present.

10,765. Surely he must or ought to exercise some judicial mind on the matter, if he is even to consider the question whether he ought or ought not to resort to those further powers of investigation. That involves a certain judicial appraisalment of the

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

situation?—Quite. I must say we think it is almost amazing to hear the evidence which has been given as to the way in which many justices do function; and further than that we are continually getting cases in which prima facie one would have thought a justice would have investigated, but he has elected not to see the patient.

10,766. Now what are the main recommendations which you have to make to us on this very important branch of the law?—On the basis that there is to be a judicial procedure, we suggest that it must follow the procedure in other similar cases. We suggest that it should start at any rate with a sworn information.

10,767. Earl Russell: By the petitioner, or by some person representing the petitioner?—By whoever is seeking to set the law in motion, as a necessary step precedent to setting the law in motion.

10,768. Chairman: It is curious again that in certain cases there must be sworn information by the relieving officer?—That is so. I tried to emphasise that.

10,769. You point to this that there already exists provision in a certain class of cases for the initiation of the proceedings to be upon a sworn statement?—That is so, in Section 13. But in Section 14 no oath is necessary.

10,770. Now on that do you attach great importance to an oath. I am not asking you that question in any personal sense, and you are not on oath at this moment, as you know; but I am asking you rather from the point of view of a sanction: do you think that a person would realise more fully the solemnity of the occasion if the information setting this procedure in motion were required to be on oath?—I think undoubtedly so; it is the most serious form of allegation you could make almost that anybody is insane, and if one is entitled to go and make that statement lightly and set the law in motion, I think it would be a deplorable state of things.

10,771. Of course, we are taking just now the documents at the very inception of the case which emanate from a relative or a relieving officer; these are not sworn statements that the person is of unsound mind, because the relative, of course, is not capable of forming a judgment upon that, nor is the relieving officer a competent person to do that. You rather mean that the facts upon which they think the case is proper to be dealt with should be stated on oath?—That is so.

10,772. The relative can only say that upon the facts he desires the case to be dealt with, and he puts forward certain facts. It is these facts you wish attested on oath?—That is so.

10,773. It really comes to this—take a concrete case, a case of a husband or wife, you would desiderate that the statement should be: "I swear that the condition of my wife is such that it ought to be considered with a view to possible detention of the case," or something of that sort?—Yes, as enabling the magistrate to judge whether it was justifiable to call in a doctor.

10,774. Of course, in all forms of procedure, whether administrative or judicial, there must be some one to initiate the proceedings?—That is so.

Earl Russell: Before you have any medical certificate at all, I understand?

10,775. Chairman: We are at the stage just now before the doctor has officially intervened?—That is so, and Mr. Stewart asks me to point out that it may be a constable, a relieving officer, or a health officer, but the health officer is a new suggestion, I think.

10,776. Yes, the health officer has not been suggested before, I think. But this is the stage of initiating the proceedings; and whether the proceedings be administrative or judicial, someone must set the proceedings in motion. You suggest that the person who sets the proceedings in motion, be he a relative, or be he an official, ought to do so on some form of affidavit?—That is so.

10,777. Because, in your view, that would impress upon such a person the importance of the step which he was taking?—Render it less likely to abuse.

10,778. Earl Russell: You mean it should go a little beyond just having a paper put before him and being told to sign at the bottom?—As Mr. Macmillan says, it would invest it with a certain solemnity.

10,779. And, of course, he has to go before some proper person to swear?—Exactly.

10,780. Chairman: We appreciate that, but that is only on the threshold of the proceedings?—Quite.

10,781. Suppose there is an affidavit by a person, a relative or an official who desires to initiate the proceedings: to whom, in your view, should that application be presented?—To any justice.

10,782. Any justice?—In the first instance. One is trying to cover emergency cases as well.

10,783. Let us pause there and examine it, because we must watch each step very closely. Do you favour the discontinuance of the distinction between justices who are judicial authorities, and ordinary justices?—We hope that they will all be judicial authorities.

10,784. Yes, but in the technical sense of the Act, a selected justice or any justice?—I think for this purpose of initiating proceedings it would have to be any justice.

10,785. Have you any comment, if I may ask at this stage, to make upon the suitability of the ordinary justice to discharge this function?—At this moment you are assuming that the justice who receives this information will become the adjudicating justice. That does not follow, does it?

10,786. In your view, do you think that the justice is the proper person to be the judicial authority in these matters at all? I am raising a very large point there, you see?—You are, but I am not quite clear whether you mean for the initial setting of the law in motion, or for adjudicating upon the facts later. For the first purpose I think any justice would do.

10,787. You are contemplating now the urgency order?—I am trying to cover that as well.

10,788. Of course, there is a larger question as to whether the justice of the peace, who, no doubt, ever since this form of procedure has been brought into being, has been the selected person to do it, is the most appropriate person. Perhaps I am for the moment thinking of another part of the British Isles where we do not do it by a justice of the peace at all?—The sheriff?

10,789. Yes. We have heard, and we have been rather struck by some evidence we have had, of the way in which some justices of the peace do discharge this duty at present?—Quite.

10,790. And, without in the least seeking to detract from the great services of what are commonly called the great unpaid, one must recognise that in a very large body of men you will inevitably have some less suited to the responsibilities of the duties than others?—Of course, it is a very difficult question. There is this point of view, later, when we come to consider appeals to Quarter Sessions, which we shall have to deal with—you get a check there.

10,791. Your view is, that the justice of the peace should be still the central figure in this matter, but you suggest certain safeguards which might restrict his jurisdiction?—We think any justice of the peace might function, but when we go on to the hearing, we take an opposite view.

10,792. Earl Russell: You do not regard this first justice as doing more than seeing that the proceedings are in order?—Seeing that there is a prima facie case. Purely administrative action.

10,793. Chairman: Now, having got that length, there has been presented to this justice of the peace an affidavit or sworn application setting the law in motion. What do you contemplate would be the next step?—That he should at once communicate with a medical practitioner to make an investigation and report.

28 January, 1925.]

MR. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,794. Sir David Drummond: Any medical practitioner or one he selects himself?—We suggest that there should be a panel. If you get a full judicial proceeding afterwards in open court, I think any medical practitioner.

10,795. In all probability the doctor who is attending the patient?—Quite.

10,796. And to that doctor the magistrate would refer the matter?—I think, on the whole, we should say any medical practitioner. We have put here a qualified practitioner, but on further information we have got we have no reason to limit it in that way at this stage.

10,797. Earl Russell: Anyway, you would be satisfied to leave it to the justice to do the choosing?—Certainly.

10,798. Chairman: The justice would, in effect, be remitting to a doctor to give him a report upon the case?—Quite.

10,799. And, presumably, he would in the ordinary case preferably select the patient's medical attendant, if he had one?—Obviously.

10,800. Now such a report having been received, if such a report was negative as to the necessity for the pronouncement of any order, in that case the proceedings will come to an end, I take it?—Yes.

10,801. Mr. Micklem: Would they come to an end if you are going to have a judicial enquiry into all these cases?—The only action the justice has taken up to this point is to get a medical report, and if he finds that the medical report discloses no serious facts, I take it the proceedings do not go any further.

10,802. Is that so? Where you have a sworn information that there is a case of insanity, and the first report is negative, the parties who have made the sworn information, if you are going to have a trial in each case, might like to go on?—Yes. I suppose in those circumstances they might, and you would have to proceed to a hearing.

10,803. Is not that a grave difficulty if you are going to have these proceedings in every case?—No graver than in the present case.

Earl Russell: Except that you have definitely initiated a litigation.

10,804. Chairman: I do not know that the case will be likely to arise frequently, because friends, who would be the applicants in the ordinary case no doubt, would have been advised by their medical attendant to take action, and the medical attendant would then give a report, and would say that the case was one in his opinion of unsound mind which should be dealt with under the Act?—Quite.

10,805. There is just that point of view that Mr. Micklem puts as one of the many difficulties. The relatives are satisfied that the case is one proper for detention—I mean they feel they cannot have the person at home any longer, family life has become impossible, and so on, and one knows how trying these cases may be. They make their perfectly bona fide application; the justice selects, shall we say, a very inexperienced doctor who happens to be a friend of his own—such things are not unknown?—Quite.

10,806. This young doctor says, "I think there is nothing wrong with this case; the person is not of unsound mind, at any rate." The justice receives that and dismisses the application, and the relatives are left with this patient on their hands entirely in consequence of what may be a quite inadequate medical report. What about that case?

10,807. Mr. Micklem: I put it a little higher than that. If you are to have a trial, in each case it must be open to both sides?—I think we are bound to agree with that, that it must proceed a step further to a hearing, and the only way I see of providing for that is to provide for a second doctor where desired; but that might be a negative one.

10,808. Chairman: Just pause there a moment. In the meantime while these steps are being taken, all of which take time, what is to be done with the patient? Are you contemplating that at once some form of restraint shall be available if a case requires it?—Not necessarily any more than at present under petition. Of course there may be circumstances which justify urgency.

10,809. At present you get your restraint at once under an urgency order?—If you have an urgency order, and of course one knows the tendency is to work under that more and more. Of private patients I think the British Medical Association gave you evidence that 60 per cent. were dealt with under urgency orders.

10,810. I am not sure we are satisfied that resort to the urgency order was intended in so many cases?—We mean, of course, later on to raise that point.

10,811. Yes, I am thinking now of the patient. All this procedure is going on outside his knowledge?—Up to this point.

10,812. Naturally and necessarily so. The last thing you can do is to go to persons who are distraught and ask them what proceedings they would like taken. In this case the unhappy patient may require to be under some form of authorised restraint. With regard to the presentation of the affidavit to the justice, would that, in your opinion, justify a magistrate in at once pronouncing an order for the interim detention of the patient, before he receives a medical certificate at all?—No, surely not, except in emergency cases. We are contemplating procedure analogous to the procedure laid down in the Act by petition.

10,813. Earl Russell: A three-day petition?—That is urgency again.

10,814. Chairman: In other cases the thing can take its time?—Yes.

10,815. When I speak of the case of a person who requires restraint I am thinking of an emergency case. In an emergency case the preparation of an affidavit, the swearing of it, the presentation of it to a justice, the pronouncement of a justice's order, obtaining a remit to a medical man, obtaining the medical man's report, all that takes time, and meantime what is to happen to the patient?—Does that take more time than at present? Where is the order got from now?

10,816. The order is got now by the relatives filling up a form and a medical man giving a certificate, and you go to a justice and get your order at once?—Is not that the same procedure in rather a different way? It does not seem that the procedure in our suggestion is any more cumbersome than the present one.

Earl Russell: You do not have to do that in the case of an urgency order.

Chairman: Yes, I am wrong about that.

10,817. Mr. Micklem: You are going to suggest an urgency order in necessary cases to take the place of the present emergency order?—Yes, quite; we are really dealing here with the general procedure in ordinary cases.

Chairman: Let me correct myself. All that you require for an urgency order is a statement by a relative and one medical certificate. Upon that the patient may be detained.

Earl Russell: Yes, and much less than that in pauper cases: only the relieving officer's or constable's signature.

Chairman: Strictly speaking, there is not an urgency order for paupers, is there—it is another sort of order.

Earl Russell: There is an urgency detention.

Chairman: Yes, Section 20, I think. Under Section 20 the relieving officer, as Lord Russell has pointed out, can remove the patient to a workhouse, and he is kept for three days, so that at present there is some machinery whereby a person can on very short notice be put under restraint. That is where I was wrong: the magistrate need not be brought in.

Earl Russell: The constable, relieving officer, or overseer.

Chairman: Yes.

Witness: I see on Form 8, which is the usual form, there is this note, "If an urgency certificate is required, it must be added here." The urgency certificate is in Form 9.

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,818. Mr. Mickleth: I doubt whether we need trouble very much about the emergency order, because you assent to the view that in necessary cases an emergency order must be made?—Absolutely.

10,819. And the matter you are concerned with is the ultimate decision after the urgency order is made in urgency cases, and the ordinary decision in ordinary cases?—That is so. We are really contemplating the majority of cases which we say are ordinary. There will have to be an emergency procedure, as now, that procedure will at a point drop into the ordinary procedure.

Earl Russell: But I wanted to know whether your urgency order is to be upon the petition alone, or is it not to require the intervention of the justice, because that would be a change.

10,820. Chairman: It does not now; I misled you?—I feel great diffidence in suggesting it must require the intervention of the justice, because urgency is urgency however you deal with it. I think one must leave for real cases of emergency a very free procedure.

10,821. You do, however, suggest an alteration in the law to this extent, that the person who is using an urgency order should have attested what he states in it on oath?—Exactly, that is the alteration. He should take a definite step which will bring home to him the responsibility of his act.

10,822. Even at present the urgency order expires unless the formal order is pronounced?—Quite.

10,823. Your suggestion on the temporary expedient, that is to say, on the urgency order is, that it should proceed in solemn form supported by a sworn statement?—In that form; by introducing the justice, whatever his capacity, you do get a fresh view on the question of urgency.

10,824. Earl Russell: Necessarily, that sworn statement would be either before or after the arrest of the patient?—Of course one can conceive cases. You instance the man with a hatchet where the local police step in.

10,825. Chairman: There seems to be a kind of fringe, a margin in these cases of emergency where people must just act as they think right; use common sense, and then use law, if there is any difference between the two. Now come to where you become more critical, if I may say so. Whether an urgency order has been pronounced or not the ultimate matter, of course, is the pronouncement of the formal order?—Quite.

10,826. The urgency order may lapse because it may be recognised on all hands that nothing more need be done, and then the patient is free; but if, on the other hand, the case is one for further procedure, let us examine that further procedure now. What do you contemplate should be the next step?—We contemplate that at this point the alleged lunatic as he is, shall, either through himself, if capable, or through a representative if not capable, begin to be acquainted with the danger he is in, that is to say, the loss of his liberty and so forth.

10,827. Earl Russell: That is at the bottom of page 11. No. 9?—No. No. 3. "An authorised representative be available to assist the alleged lunatic, and that he be selected from a panel."

10,828. Chairman: Now here we are approaching the heart of the question where we wish you to help us. This authorised representative whom you contemplate is manifestly, I take it, somebody other than the relative or official who has presented the application?—Certainly—the same independent person, as we think is contemplated under petition under the present Act.

10,829. The next friend, if you please?—The next friend, yes.

10,830. Now just see there what we come against. This person, if he is one of the relatives but not the applying relative, may be just in the same interest as the applying relative, may he not?—Quite. I do not think that we necessarily contemplate a relative. We contemplate, when we talk of a panel, people who are acquainted with the law, which is so intricate, who would be able to advise the alleged lunatic. May I deal with the panel? The suggestion is that "it shall be the duty of the Registrar of each County Court in England and Wales to keep a panel of such members of the bar and solicitors admitted to practise in their respective districts as may be willing to act as 'authorised representatives' of any alleged lunatic requiring legal aid when appearing before the judicial authority, either on the occasion of the inquiry as to whether the alleged lunatic is a proper person to be certified, or, on the inquiry hereinafter provided for, to determine whether a certified lunatic is a person fit to receive his discharge."

10,831. Now, first of all, the word "authorised" attracts my attention. Who is to authorise this representative?—The justice—the magistrate. Of course these proposals are based upon the accumulated evidence we have had, which we shall be putting before you later, that the alleged lunatic so often does not know in the very least what is happening, and never knows.

10,832. I think we know that, but the question is whether he should know?—That is the point we want to put before you, that in many cases he should know, and in other cases an independent person should act for him, because the relations are not always dependable.

10,833. Earl Russell: It will be the justice to whom the sworn affidavit is made, in the first instance?—Yes.

10,834. Sir David Drummond: Who is to determine whether the patient is to be told about this or not?—I should think this accredited representative would use his judgment.

10,835. But it is a medical question, purely a medical question, whether it would be advisable to tell the patient what these proceedings meant?—I quite realise that in certain cases it may be, but is it so in any great number of cases?

Sir David Drummond: It would be so in a very large number.

10,836. Chairman: I will tell you a difficulty which I have felt throughout the whole of this chapter of your case. It proceeds not unnaturally on the hypothesis that all these persons are sane persons, and that therefore they must have all the facilities for protecting their liberty that an ordinary sane person would have. The real difficulty at the root of the matter is this, that we are dealing with a person who at least may not be sane, and therefore who is not like an ordinary person, and is not in the position of giving instructions, and so on, and taking his own course. The hypothesis seems to underlie a great number of your suggestions; that one is dealing with sane persons whose rights are to be protected as ordinary sane persons' rights are protected. For such a case the code you suggest would be excellent, one sees that; but to my mind it rather loses sight of the circumstance that we are dealing here with a pathological case, with a patient, and that therefore these ordinary considerations are out of place. The point that Sir David put just now is a very striking one. Of course, if you or I were going to have a sane person put away, that person would be entitled to take all possible steps, and would do so; but when the person is not in a condition to give instructions, and is really a patient, the situation seems to me to alter completely?—Of course, we are putting forward these suggestions to try and cover the cases coming before us, and in which, whatever the mentality of the person may be, they are perfectly capable at the time of following the facts and arguing very closely. That class of case we say we must provide for. We realise there is the other class of case. In that case we try and cover the difficulty by suggesting that there should be an authorised representative, because there are many cases which are purely temporary, cases of high fever, and that sort of thing, where it may suit the relatives to get rid of the incumbrance; but where at the stage

28 January, 1925.]

MR. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

of certification we feel that other influences should be set to work.

10,837. We are on the question of whether the party most intimately concerned, the party to be confined, should in all cases himself be apprised of what may happen to him. It was put very emphatically several times in the last few days, and it is quite worth consideration. What should you say upon that, because I have great difficulty there. Of course, if a sane person were going to be detained, he must be apprised of what is to happen to him in order that he may have every opportunity of resisting possible detention?—May I perhaps suggest an analogy? It is the law still to read the Riot Act, not that it has in many cases any influence, and not that there would be any attention paid to it. Would there be an insuperable objection to taking the same formality in these cases?

10,838. I will suggest one to you for your consideration. We have been exhorted to bear the patient always in mind, and that is our desire. I could imagine nothing more distressing to a patient who is suffering acutely, with a distraught mind, unhappy, and suffering every form of mental discomfort, that some person, possibly a stranger, this authorised representative, should approach that person and say, "I have to inform you that your liberty is at stake, and that certain proceedings are about to take place in which the issue will be whether you are of unsound mind or not." Honestly that strikes me as a most inhuman proposal, if I may say so?—But what is the present procedure in so many cases? That same person is approached. They are asked whether they would not like to go for a drive. They are taken for a drive; they are shown in by a door; they hear the doors closing behind them. At one stroke you have torn up and destroyed the whole of the home connection of that person; and it seems to me quite idle, if that is the alternative, to suggest you would be exposing this person to a shock if you tell him beforehand you are going to do it.

10,839. One knows quite well that you are not always apprised, even as a sane patient, by your doctor of the issues attending the particular malady you have, and that it would be from a clinical point of view one of the most dangerous things to do it. You often try to persuade a person to come away by agreeable fictions, because those are part of the palliatives of the condition; people who are in a pathological condition are unable to bear the harshness of the facts of life. I am not so appalled at the idea that a person should say to a lunatic, "You come along with us and it will be all right for you." That might be the kindest thing to do instead of saying, "Now you are going to be taken to an asylum under section so-and-so of the Act"?—I should be content to agree, if you were going to take that patient to a place where he would go into really good surroundings.

10,840. This is the stage of procedure, and the suggestion is that there is to be some authorised third party who is now to intervene. The person is to be appointed by a justice, or some other authority, from a panel. Now is he to be brought into any personal contact with the patient?—That must depend, I agree, upon circumstances, and in a great many cases emphatically yes.

10,841. Earl Russell: At any rate, he must once see the patient in order to satisfy himself that a sane person is not put away?—Yes.

10,842. Mr. Snell: Would he advise the relatives as well as the patient that he was watching the interests of the patient?—I suppose the relatives would know.

10,843. Suppose you have a family of very poor people not very well educated; they may be as much in need of a representative as the patient himself as to the best thing to do with their stricken relative. I gather that the representative is to be appointed by the magistrate in much the same way as a Court appoints a counsel to defend an undefended person?—Exactly.

10,844. Would his intervention be limited to the patient himself, or would it include the interests of the family?—We have not contemplated that it would include the interests of the family, because we look upon them as articulate people whose sanity is not in question, and who could advance their point of view before the magistrate.

10,845. Chairman: Then really only one side is to have the advantage of defence in this matter. As Mr. Snell points out, the family who are interested in the other side of the case must just do the best they can for themselves without assistance?—That seems to me unquestionable. On the one side you have the person whose intellectual capacity is impugned; he requires assistance.

10,846. However, at this stage some official is brought in. It is just there that I have considerable doubt, and I think you may remove it?—Quite.

10,847. Earl Russell: Do not you think the patients would be at least as much upset if there is a proceeding going on, in which they are present and take part, and they hear this thing discussed; and they have hanging over them for a week or a fortnight the prospect of an asylum?—We feel they need not be present; that is the point of the authorised representative.

10,848. Chairman: The whole point is this, that your criticism of the existing system is that so much is done behind the back of the patient?—That is so.

10,849. What I suggest to you is this, that in dealing with all kinds of illness a very great deal is done and must necessarily be done, as you put it, behind the back of the patient?—Quite.

10,850. Personally, I should not like to be present at a consultation on my case which took place between a consultant and my own private doctor. It might be interesting from a curiosity point of view, but if I were ill it would be extremely bad for me, I am sure?—We do not propose that that need be so.

10,851. We see the value of such a person, but I want to see what he is to do. The authorised representative is to see the patient. He must, of course, if he is to discharge his duties to any effect. I am rather anxious about this side of it. Surely it is difficult to bring in a person who ex hypothesi is a complete stranger, and introduce him to a person who again, on our hypothesis, whether sane or insane, is at least very ill (because the proceedings will not start unless there is some justification for them)—to introduce a complete stranger to a person who is in this state of mind, and to accompany his introduction, as you would need to do, with an explanation of why he is there. Suppose a patient is in bed and says, "I cannot see anybody just now," and you say he must see him; this person must thrust himself into the presence of this suffering human being and say, "Will you kindly listen to me; I am appointed to see that your liberty is not going to be infringed, and I want your instructions," while the only interest of the unhappy patient is to say, "Please go away, please leave me." I see a very difficult situation there?—But how does the medical practitioner act under those identical circumstances?

10,852. The doctor comes in, but then he comes in as a professional man. A doctor, after all, notwithstanding some of the criticisms we have heard of him, is a person who is invoked by the relatives to see the case, and who is accustomed to handle these cases; but a barrister or a solicitor does not necessarily have a good bedside manner?—Very bad, I should think.

10,853. We are talking of real life just now, as you know?—Quite. My answer is this, that in that case, if the authorised representative got to the door and heard that "Please go away," he would be satisfied that it was not a case of the person being fit to deal with the matter.

Earl Russell: That is a very small observation on which to decide that the patient is not fit to understand his liberty is in danger.

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Chairman: It seems to me, on a limited experience of life, that that is the sort of thing that must happen pretty often.

Witness: We are, of course, advancing these views naturally on the type of evidence we have had before us.

10,854. But we have to consider all cases. We are on a very large issue at the moment, and again I am sure you pay us the tribute of recognising that we are most anxious to sound this thing really to the bottom; and the danger in all these matters is that one is apt to take a theoretical view which is rather remote from real life?—Quite; I quite realise that.

10,855. Often it has been a painful experience of reformers that the very effort to reform sometimes results in worse consequences than even the evils that you have. I do not say in this case we shall not be able to assist in reforming the procedure, because I hope we shall; but when one is putting forward reform one must be careful to see that one is not doing harm in one's very effort to reform?—Quite. This is a question of degree. On which side of the balance does the majority lie, and I think I am right in saying that evidence has been given here that these violent and extreme cases amount to about 3 per cent.

10,856. Violent and extreme cases are quite few, fortunately; but, on the other hand, we have had evidence that a great number of the cases are cases which are sunk in stupor, depressed and melancholic.

Sir David Drummond: And suicidal.

10,857. Chairman: Yes, suicidal. You know the exciting effect upon a person who is suffering even from an ordinary illness of a stranger being introduced?—Well, we can only repeat that in our humble view it is nothing like the exciting effect that occurs when the same individual is plunged into a ward of an infirmary or the receiving ward of a mental hospital.

10,858. Earl Russell: The moment he is put there he is calmed with a sedative, while all this time he is subject to litigation?—Not necessarily so. We do not suggest he should not have sedatives in his home.

10,859. Chairman: All these subjects are correlated. Mr. Parker says quite truly that if you are to plunge a person into the asylum, of course, that may be a great shock, but it may be mitigated, may it not, if one of your other suggestions, namely, observational treatment in a ward attached to a general hospital or a special institution, were carried out at the intermediate stage?—Once you get that, this procedure would not arise, because that would be voluntary treatment.

10,860. Not necessarily, I think?—That is our suggestion, that that type of treatment should be voluntary.

10,861. I was hoping that we should be able to deal with cases which, although they manifestly required restraint and, therefore, some legal sanction for their detention, might nevertheless be transitory cases, which would never reach the stage of certification. I hope you are not going to rule out that very important case in your suggestions. We want to avoid certification, with its stigma, in as many cases as possible; and if you are going to rule out the class of case which is a transitory case and would pass off under a short term of provisional detention and say that all these people must be voluntary patients, I am afraid you are rather going to spoil the reform?—Do I understand there is to be an intermediate stage really certified, for a provisional period?

10,862. Yes, that has been suggested, for the reason that we would in that way avoid the final certification, and would in the meantime be in the position to exercise the necessary control over a case during the short period of the duration of the disease?—You are on the 28 days' period?

10,863. Under observation, but also under control, though not certified?—I think we certainly support that.

10,864. For the moment you were suggesting that you must only have two classes, voluntary and certified. We think there is another class, persons who require a measure of control for a time.

10,865. Earl Russell: In the hope that they never may be certified?—Yes, we agree with that.

10,866. You are trying to persuade us to do something which we do not like very much. Assuming we have this provisional period, and assuming we have the voluntary boarder system, will you tell me in the view of your Committee in what percentage of cases this elaborate procedure will do any good at all?—I quite see that on your assumptions this procedure might become unnecessary. I am afraid it is going to be some years before these assumptions come about.

Earl Russell: Royal Commissions have no control over their report after they have reported.

10,867. Chairman: We can only recommend, you know, and we want to recommend what will be best, if we can. For the moment I do not think any of us round this table are convinced that the intervention of this defender of the liberty of the patient in the way that you contemplate here would necessarily be an advantage. I mean we are impressed with the difficulties which I am putting to you in the most human way I can?—Quite.

10,868. Earl Russell: And we should, I think, be prepared to consider whether anything of the sort could be done, if there was a large percentage of cases in which this would lead to the prevention of injustice?—Quite.

Chairman: Exactly. Mr. Parker might make this point and say, "Well, at whatever cost of suffering if an injustice is liable to be perpetrated you must take the responsibility for it."

10,869. Sir David Drummond: Has Mr. Parker any idea as to who would pay for this?—I think we look upon these duties like the poor prisoner's friend, as largely voluntary. There would be professional men quite willing to act, as there are in the Courts. There is great difficulty in one's ascertaining what sort of percentage of cases we are dealing with. All we can say is that in the cases brought before us there is a heavy percentage where this procedure would be of an inestimable advantage.

Earl Russell: Could you tell us exactly what it would have done? Take four or five typical cases that you have in mind and tell us what this procedure would have done in those cases.

10,870. Chairman: Yes. I am going to assume that you have established to our satisfaction that you have received a number of cases in which you are satisfied the patient ought never to have been detained; and that if that patient had had some such protection as you contemplate here, he would never have been certified at all. You tell us you are satisfied yourself that such cases have existed. That is enough for the purposes of our discussion. Let us assume that. In the cases that you have in your mind what would have been the result of the patient being told by such a third party that his liberty was at stake, what would he have done?—Take the case of a petitioner—I have a special case in mind here.

10,871. Please just take one?—The petitioner was the father, and there was undoubtedly want of sympathy between him and his daughter of a certain age. She became mentally ill in hot weather, and lack of sleep and so on. The story is this. He came to the conclusion that she could very suitably be treated in the local mental asylum. He got two doctors in to certify, on what seem to us very slender grounds.

10,872. Earl Russell: Can you tell us what overt acts she committed?—She is supposed to have gone to church once without having been dressed properly, and in a state of collapse was brought home by a friend; and I think on one occasion she tried to get out of her room at night into the corridor, though the certificates are conflicting on that point.

10,873. That was all?—Perhaps I had better read the certificates.

10,874. No, we will take your version of it.

10,875. Sir David Drummond: Have you got the certificates?—Yes. However, she admits that for three or four days she wanted attention of some sort. She went to the asylum, where she speaks very highly of her treatment, but she was kept there for six months, and one cannot but feel in reading her comments, firstly, that she need never have gone, of course, if her parents had been more sympathetic, and if there had been somebody to interfere they would have deferred the thing for a day or two.

28 January, 1925.]

10,876. Earl Russell: Was this a private case?—Yes.

10,877. Chairman: Now let us see what would have happened there if your procedure had been in operation. She would have been seen by a legal person, a barrister or solicitor appointed for the purpose, and he would have conferred with her, and this was a case of a person who still had certainly a considerable degree of intelligence, obviously. Do you think it would have been right that she should have been told that proceedings were being taken by her father which might result in the deprivation of her liberty, and that she should have appeared before the justices and criticised the adequacy of the certificates upon which she was about to be detained?—No, I am not satisfied in that case that she herself was in a fit condition at the moment, but I do feel that some pressure might have been brought upon the parents not to expose her to it.

10,878. This is putting a very different duty upon the member of the panel?—Our view is that he would have examined the conditions on behalf of this person, and the knowledge that an outsider was interested in the case would have carried some weight; it might not have prevented this taking place.

10,879. I rather gather that this is a case in which you are satisfied that the person was a certifiable patient?—Strictly speaking, yes.

10,880. But can you give us an illustration rather of a case where there has been really a miscarriage of justice, that is to say, where a person really sane has, through the absence of such protection as you contemplate, been improperly detained. That is really the case that we are concerned with at the moment?—Of course, we have cases of that sort. We cannot test them, as I have pointed out to you.

10,881. It is not a question of testing them really. Whether they are true or not, they are criticisms upon the Act, and they illustrate what people are feeling about it?—We are calling one case before you of a person who certainly holds the view, and I think we hold it, that he was not certifiable.

10,882. Frankly, I attach much more importance to the views that you express to us as the result of your experience and the stories people have told you and of the result of those many cases, than to what an individual person may tell us here and now?—If I may say so, that puts me in a very difficult position, because we realise fully that we are here only hearing one side of the story. We say that we do get certain cumulative ideas.

10,883. The weak spots in the existing legislation are brought to your knowledge in that way by complaints, whether ill or well founded?—We do say we have a lot of cases in which the criticism is this:—"If we had had any friend to turn to, we feel that our case would have received quite different consideration." Obviously, those are cases in which the family were completely ignorant of this Act—and I do not suppose one family in a thousand knows anything about it.

10,884. Take the case of the unhappy lady you spoke of. Of course, if she had had a friend in this sense, an intimate friend who had influence in the household, your suggestion there would be that he might have gone to the father and said, "Your daughter may recover shortly, there is nothing illegal in having your daughter in your house for the time being." But then that person's function is quite a different function from that contemplated in this procedure. That is the kind friend of the family, and there are many things one would escape in life if one had a good friend at hand. What is contemplated here is that the person is a person in the interests of the patient, but a stranger to the patient, and certainly not a person who could go and reason with the father in such a case?—Unless he had got a legal position, appointed by a magistrate.

Earl Russell: He would have no legal position to give the father good advice.

Chairman: I think his only legal position would be to see the patient; tell the patient what was at stake, and ask her to give him what we may call instructions for the defence.

10,885. Earl Russell: Have you got cases in which you think if you had had this tribunal set up the verdict would have been one of acquittal, so to speak?—Of course, that is rather a difficult question to answer. Yes, I think we have, but it turns on the question of fact whether the case was certifiable or not. We are not going to say that we are necessarily better judges of that than the people who dealt with it.

10,886. There are comparatively few, I take it, of such cases?—Yes, I suppose so.

10,887. Sir David Drummond: Are you going to put forward any case in which the person was not certifiable?—Yes, we are.

10,888. Chairman: And never was certifiable?—In our judgment, apparently not.

10,889. And in the patient's own judgment?—And in the patient's own judgment.

10,890. Miss Madeleine Symons: I am still not quite clear about the function you would assign to this representative. Are you thinking of him really as an advocate, as somebody whose duty it would be to resist certification in all cases, as you would try to get a man off if he had been accused of murder, or are you thinking of something more advisory?—We think it would be an advantage if he could exercise both functions. Perhaps I may point out this: we do say at present that in many cases a person gets no sort of notice of the proceedings contemplated; they get no notice of the allegations made against them, they do not know what is going to be said because they are not there when it is said, and they are very often tempted to make statements which they certainly would not have made, if they knew they were going to be used as they are used. I am raising a very big point there, of course, whether it is legitimate to misrepresent the position to a patient to get him to make statements.

10,891. Chairman: I am a little appalled at the idea of a doctor who makes the examination saying to the patient: "Now it is my duty to tell you that anything you say to me may be used as evidence against you." I cannot imagine that that is likely to induce confidence at the onset of the trouble?—We have to contemplate the opposite, where a man or woman does not know he or she is talking to a doctor.

10,892. Why should a person be less likely to tell a doctor the truth than anybody else? If the whole object is self-revelation, why is it necessary it should be a doctor? The warning seems to me to deprive the interview of a large part of its value. You want to see how the person behaves at the time, and the less you get the idea that they must brace themselves up and pretend to be better than they are, the more satisfactory it will be?—That, I am afraid, in our view, might raise a very serious issue, whether you are entitled to go to a person and persuade him to unburden himself. I quite see you may get a greater insight into their characteristics, but it does not seem to me as fair or desirable.

10,893. You are always importing the idea, if I may say so, of a quasi-trial of some sort into this thing—that is the fundamental difference of view. It would be most unfair to go and see a prisoner on trial for crime and try and worm your way into his confidence and get him to tell you things. On the other hand, exactly the opposite considerations may obtain in the case of a patient. One thing desirable may be to put the patient at his ease so that the patient may just disburden himself of the very things which, if it were a criminal trial, would be shocking things to obtain from him. The object is the benefit of the patient?—I am trying to put before you cases where people say they have been trapped into making statements which they would not have made; and without being a doctor, it seems to me that this is a sound proposition,—that a patient, if he is trying to cure himself, should be able to direct his mind to what I call the weak spot in his mentality. We think that that issue should be raised with him early on, and we think all the more that it should be raised with him while he is under examination. I cannot conceive how I should set about to cure a weak spot in my mentality if I had no conception what it was. That is the sort of case we have month after month—they do not know. When we come to consider the sort of treatment which we say they get, we do not know how they can begin to help themselves. The point goes a great deal further. We may be proposing a procedure which is unnecessarily cumbersome, to cover the number of cases we have in mind; but there are all these border-line cases, and they go a good long way, who are perfectly capable of discussing reasonably.

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,894. Yes, but again we have reached the discretion stage. It would be manifestly improper in many cases for a stranger to be introduced at all. It would be manifestly improper for a stranger to intervene in the sense of talking to the unhappy subject, and then you reach this: Who is to be the judge of whether the patient is one who can be seen and talked to, whether he is a borderland case or not a borderland case—whether it would injure the prospect of his recovery? Again the medical profession must be the arbiters of that. Supposing the doctor said to this defender at the door: "Really, you must not go in and see that patient just now. To bring in anybody, a stranger, at the present moment will bring on an access; the patient will jump out of bed and fly at you." "Oh," says the defender, "This is one of the cases where the medical profession are trying to hush up the proceedings. I hold a warrant to see the patient, and I insist upon my right." He goes in, and the immediate result is an access of frenzy on the part of the patient. He has the satisfaction that he has performed his duty, but the patient dies. That is not a satisfactory outcome?—I quite agree, but is the strange doctor who goes in under similar circumstances any less likely to cause an access?

10,895. Very much less, because he is thoroughly accustomed to that class of case. He knows how to handle it. He probably would be able to use different means altogether from a man who goes in equipped merely with legal knowledge. If you are to select the person, I have no doubt the person accustomed to seeing such cases would be the better person?—Of course, we realise in that type of case that this procedure would not be suitable.

10,896. Somebody is to judge which are to be the cases and which are not, and you may have the same grievance about them. The patient may say, "The doctor kept away this person whom I ought to have seen"?—That person would still be operating under the appointment of the justice. He would only satisfy himself that it was not wise for him to intrude any further, and that is the case we contemplate, and there must be a great number of them, of course.

10,897. Earl Russell: But he would only be doing the duty of the judicial authority anyhow, enquiring into the validity and competence of the certificates?—I quite agree. This does hang on the method in which the justice is going to carry out his work.

10,898. Yes. I think if you make the justice's duty much more solemn than it is now, and have that understood, that would help a great deal?—Yes.

10,899. Chairman: I really feel, Mr. Parker, that a solution which might be more effective, consistently with the patient's welfare, would be the bracing up of the justice of the peace in the performance of his duty. He has a discretion at the present moment, but it is quite within our competence to recommend that there should be certain directions as to the procedure he is to pursue, which might achieve your purpose, and ensure that more adequate safeguards were interposed between the patient and detention. What is rather repugnant to one's mind is the idea of the introduction of the instructed advocate into the proceedings, because I can see that that personage in the drama might be anything but an advantage. There is no one who has had to do with advocacy but knows that, while it is an excellent instrument for certain purposes, it is not an excellent instrument for others?—I quite agree, if I may say so.

10,900. The controversial element which arises in the conflicts of advocacy is of great public value for the elucidation of certain topics, and notably, of course, in the administration of the civil law and criminal law, but it seems to be entirely dissociated from the realm in which we are moving at the moment, where we are not dealing with rights at all, but with something which is more subtle than rights?—Of course, the object is the same, that the judicial authority shall address his mind to the real points, and shall have the evidence before him.

10,901. And shall have sufficient authority to enable him to get the material he ought to have before passing judgment?—Quite, and we are not quite satisfied that if left to himself he will in fact get that material. Who is to produce it? That is our difficulty, and that is why we suggest the other thing. I quite see the criticism.

10,902. I think these criticisms are rather difficult to get over, but it may be we can achieve the same object through the medium of remedies at other stages rather than at this. We have been told that the intervention of the third party in the present procedure has turned out quite nugatory. I asked a number of question about that, and as far as I can gather it really had not been of much use. Whether the persons always knew they had a right to bring in a third party or not is a different matter, but apparently that safeguard, devised in 1890, has turned out to be rather a dead letter, as far as I can see. Of course, it had not the sanctions which you propose to attach in this case?—That is so.

(After a short adjournment.)

10,903. Chairman: Mr. Parker, we were at page 11 of your précis, and discussing the provisions which your Society has suggested in connection with certification, and we had reviewed at considerable length the question of the suggested authorised representative. Would you pass on to the fourth head, now, in your summary, in which you recommend that the medical opinion and the evidence of other informants should be disclosed to the alleged lunatic or his representative? You have to some extent anticipated that question in what we have been discussing previously?—Quite.

10,904. Very much the same considerations seem to arise there. Again you recognise, I am sure, that there may at least be some cases in which it would be inexpedient to disclose the medical opinion to the patient?—Quite, and that proposal is subject to the decision we arrived at before lunch, that if the judicial authority is functioning more freely, naturally our proposals would be modified to that extent; that covers this point, too.

10,905. Yes. Then the suggestion is, if not disclosed to the alleged lunatic it might be disclosed to this authorised representative. Now on that there is one point which occurs to us. This particular affliction, of course, is one which people do not like published about themselves more than is necessary, as one knows, and indeed the Statute contemplates secrecy, at any rate in the case of the private patient, as an essential requisite. Do you not think another drawback that might arise might be this, that either the patient himself or the relatives might rather object

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

to a third party, a solicitor or barrister outside, being told of what had befallen the family?—I may say frankly that our view is this, that a question of lunacy is no more serious than any other family secrets, such as divorce or other matters which have to be disclosed, and in the case of lunacy the facts have to be disclosed later, because it is known that the patient has been to an asylum in the great majority of cases; and we find great difficulty in taking the view that the relatives should be protected, at the expense of the man who is unfortunately in this position.

10,906. But it is the man himself, for the moment. We are assuming a lunatic who is quite intelligent up to a point and able to take an interest in the proceedings. Might he not say, "I do not want this barrister or solicitor butting into my affairs. I have got my doctor, and I do not want this fellow to come along"?—Absolutely. If you have a case of that sort, capable of defending himself, all we say is that the issue should be brought to his notice. May I remind you that in Mr. H.'s case there was just that point on the disputed property. One cannot help feeling, if he had known that that was one of the grounds, he could have satisfied an independent person that at least he had a claim.

10,907. Earl Russell: You mean that things are put down as delusions which are not delusions, but which at any rate have some foundation in fact?—I tried to follow the evidence, and I think it came to this, that they are put down in the certificate, and the damage is done.

10,908. Chairman: And besides, on questions of that sort, where the allegation may not be a delusion at all, and yet may be assumed to be a delusion, one can quite see how fallacious that information may be. It depends upon the quality of the delusion?—Quite.

10,909. Of course, if the patient says that he sees St. Paul sitting on the top of the tower there, well, of course, the doctor is entitled to assume that St. Paul is not sitting there, and therefore he need not proceed to get an opinion as to whether St. Paul is sitting on the top of the tower or not. He may decide that case there and then?—Quite.

10,910. But take the typical case of a man saying that his wife has been unfaithful to him—unhappily that may be the case?—And often is.

10,911. Earl Russell: I have seen that put down as a delusion.—There are cases on it, and they have been before the Courts afterwards.

10,912. Chairman: It may be a delusion, and, on the other hand, it may be a perfectly well-founded fact.—You may have in mind the case that went through all the Courts and ultimately the man was able to bring proceedings for divorce and he established all his delusions.

10,913. You can assume that we have been furnished with a considerable amount of literature for our instruction, and that was one of the cases brought to our notice. It is important, therefore, that if a particular statement of fact is made by a patient which is susceptible of a perfectly rational explanation, that should not be put down as a delusion, until it is ascertained whether it is or is not a delusion, by some inquiry?—And also the converse—if a particular fact is communicated by third parties or communicated to them by other parties, the least that should be done is that it should be brought to the attention of the alleged lunatic, and the issue should be looked into. I think we go so far as to say this, that this is about the only procedure which is said to be legal where double hearsay evidence of that sort carries weight. I do not know of any other.

10,914. Just for the reason that it is quite outside ordinary procedure. Facts communicated by others are not facts at all in a Law Court; but they may be very material facts in connection with the certification of a patient, and it is all the more important that they should be well-vouched facts.—Tested.

10,915. Tested in some shape or form. On the other hand, you cannot test them in the sense of having them proved. You can only make such inquiries as are available to you.—It seems to me reasonable that the person against whom they are alleged should have an opportunity of denying them.

10,916. Earl Russell: But unfortunately you cannot necessarily accept his denial if he is of unsound mind?—That is so; but if there is an issue it does seem reasonable that there should be some delay before that issue is acted upon.

10,917. Chairman: Take the very simple case of a person who alleges that his wife has been unfaithful to him. Now, as you know, it may often take, through proceedings in a Court of Law, a couple of years before that issue of fact is decided. He would have alleged that his wife was unfaithful. Therefore, for the moment, that would be taken as his assertion. Then the question is: Was that a delusion or was it justified? Whom could the doctor ask? He could ask the wife, but that would not be much use, because the wife would very probably deny it at once. Is he to proceed to investigate whether the wife's conduct justifies it?—If he likes to take the risk of acting upon that opinion he can, but we submit that is just the class of case that ought to be dealt with judicially.

10,918. Earl Russell: That may involve a jury and two days before a Judge?—Quite. Recognising that, surely it ought not to be accepted as a delusion. I quite recognise that the justice cannot try it, but it is much more unfair that it should be accepted as a delusion simply because somebody says it is.

Chairman: I agree. I think it is ridiculous to say it is evidence of a delusion on a man's part to say that he asserted his wife had been unfaithful to him. These are assertions made by perfectly sane people, constantly.

Earl Russell: And they are sometimes made by sane people without their being true.

10,919. Chairman: Certainly. That of itself, I think, you would recognise was a quite inadequate ground for holding that the person was suffering from delusions. It could only be an element taken into account with something else; it might be of importance, even although not proved, in association with other facts?—Certainly.

10,920. Supposing the man was making allegations all round, and among other things accused his wife of unfaithfulness, it would not be necessary to thresh out each of those controversies, if the conclusion was that this was a man who made random accusations all round.

10,921. Earl Russell: If he said, "My father tried to drown me and my sister tried to poison me."—That is so, of course.

10,922. Chairman: Taken by itself it is no ground for saying that a person is unsound?—No, but it is, I am afraid, not a frequent cause of certification, but a contributory cause.

10,923. Earl Russell: I have quoted a case in which it was the only fact on the certificate?—Quite. I have a certificate here before me of interest in this connection. Here is a certificate on a lady who lost her husband. Then I think she had nursed her father-in-law, and had been through a very trying time indeed. This is the certificate: "She is melancholic and has delusions of moral unworthiness and of extreme poverty for which there is no ground." Then there is another matter I need not refer to. She writes a very sensible letter to say that as regards "extreme poverty for which there is no ground." "My income at that time was less than £250. In 1920, when the £1 was not worth 10s., this represented an income of £125, and may fairly be considered poverty." The other thing she makes a very sensible comment upon: "What I really wanted was the attention of a really good clergyman, who would have discussed the religious aspects of the case." She was probably depressed after these experiences, and one knows that at that time those sort of questions do crop up.

Earl Russell: After all, a feeling of moral unworthiness is considered to be a necessary religious experience.

28 January, 1925.]

MR. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,924. Chairman: I always thought it was a virtue.—Exactly; and there you are touching a very difficult point.

10,925. Of course one must recognise in dealing with these certificates that the power of expression and description of what one has observed varies very greatly in different persons. You may have a most accomplished doctor, on whose judgment we should all place implicit reliance, who might in point of fact be the worst possible witness, or incapable of describing exactly what had carried conviction to his mind in the appropriate language that would carry conviction to another person's mind. For example, in other cases, engineering and so on, you get a man who is the best possible craftsman, and you ask him to build a bridge for you, but you may have to say of him, to put it colloquially, "He can't make a report for nuts." One cannot say he is incapable in his art, but he has not the added art of being able to describe in convincing language the things which have influenced him?—Still, on that case I want to suggest that the issue of poverty was a misrepresentation, because that amount of money is comparative poverty.

10,926. I would say that the data there were very imperfect?—That part of it should not be in the certificate, obviously.

10,927. And of course it would much depend upon what the doctor had actually meant by his words. For example, "a sense of moral unworthiness" is one thing, and, indeed, may be a virtue. On the other hand, she may have meant this "I have committed the unpardonable sin," which would show at once a pathological state of mind.

Earl Russell: A very common case in asylums.

10,928. Chairman: Yes; it is very difficult to get a standard of descriptive power?—Quite. I think I ought to read the other medical certificate, which is: "She is melancholic, and divulged to me delusions of spiritual and physical unworthiness. She considers herself a moral degenerate, and that she should be destroyed."

10,929. Earl Russell: That is a great deal stronger, is it not?—That is stronger, but now listen to the explanation. She says: "I was in a most depressed condition, feeling there was little left to live for, and that my ill-health, inability to sleep, and financial position made it impossible for me to take up any work. When I tried, I could do nothing. I had also lived for years a life of religious apathy, and this came home to me very deeply. I was overcome by a knowledge of my sins of omission. I remember saying that I felt myself a moral degenerate, only fit to be destroyed. I needed a priest accustomed to hear confession. Had I seen one, I should have been immeasurably helped."

10,930. Chairman: That is a letter written, of course, after recovery?—That is written afterwards.

10,931. Earl Russell: About how long afterwards?—Well, Sir, it is not dated.

10,932. Is it a month or a year?—It is longer than that ago, I think. The date of this was after the war, 15th July, 1920. Then her general comment, which I think is worth reading, is this: "I consider, therefore, that while the statements are made in good faith, wrong inferences were drawn. I was certainly not normal, and think that I was a typical case of neurasthenia, requiring early treatment, and especially needing spiritual help and comfort. I think the medical practitioners cannot have had much experience in such cases, and they were certainly unnecessarily nervous." That is her opinion, of course.

10,933. Sir David Drummond: You told us that you had one case in which the patient should not have been certified. Is this the one case?—No, this is not the case I had in mind. She goes on: "I was not a case that should have been certified; I made no objection to entering a mental hospital, and I consider that the magistrate should have seen me before signing the reception order." It is a very reasonable criticism.

10,934. Earl Russell: An admission as a voluntary boarder, I suppose, with spiritual assistance, would probably have met her case?—Quite; it was a reaction to the loss of her husband.

10,935. Chairman: I do not think that the complaint is so much that under the existing law her case had not been dealt with as the existing law provides, but she is one of those people who would wish some reform of the existing law so as to meet her case. Do not you think that is her attitude?—Of course, she has some very strong comments to make on her experiences. She does not object to being certified. She objects very, very strongly to what happened when she was. I think the statement has been put before you.

10,936. That is a different topic altogether. What we are concerned with now is the entrance into these asylums, and to see that the portals of the institutions are sufficiently safeguarded. Now may we go on. How, in your view, is a more satisfactory form of judicial procedure to be ensured than is at present in operation? What are the measures to be taken?—My first comment is that the judicial authority must see the patient, except in those emergency cases.

10,937. May I say that you need not labour that to us, because we have heard so much upon it, and I think I am right in saying there has been a complete consensus of testimony before us on that point, so that we have been much impressed with that suggested reform. That, of course, is an important element of evidence, provided that the seeing of the patient is a reality, and not merely a perfunctory step?—Quite.

10,938. Seeing a person may cover a great many things. It may cover a mere glance at a person in a motor cab, which does not seem to me to be of any very great value. Seeing a person may mean interviewing him, examining him, and really attending to his case?—Quite. Then the next point we feel is that publicity, if desired by the patient (I quite recognise there are many cases in which it could not take place) would ensure that the case was fully considered.

10,939. Before we come to the publicity of the proceedings, I think you might just take up the question of whether the evidence which the justice is to have before him, in addition to his own seeing of the patient should in all cases include two medical certificates. I want to get the material, so to speak, before we get the case stated. What is to be the material put before the tribunal whatever it is to be? Have you any view as to whether the medical certification should in all cases be doubled?—Frankly, it seems to us to depend upon the efficiency of the judicial authority's investigation. If that is efficient—of course, we submit it is not at present—then I do not know that two medical certificates are necessary, and certainly not if they are made in consultation.

10,940. Earl Russell: Before we deal with consultation, do I understand that you would be satisfied with the power on the part of the judicial authority to call in a second doctor, if he really exercised his functions properly?—Quite. We recognise that the calling in of two medical men at that stage is probably cumbersome.

Earl Russell: I am glad to hear that.

10,941. Chairman: Yes. We have put that to quite a number of witnesses and, curiously enough, you, who are so zealous a student of reform, put that view before us; whereas all the medical superintendents have said that there should be two certificates. It is rather curious, if one may say so?—I couple it, of course, with the question of the efficiency of the judicial authority.

10,942. The things all hang together?—They interlock.

10,943. I am not sure, if one looks at the matter from the public point of view, that a recommendation from us would be welcomed which would involve the diminution of this particular form of safeguard; because if we are to have a uniform system, then as

28 January, 1925.]

MR. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

you think one certificate would be sufficient in the ordinary case with the proper judicial procedure, so one would have to be sufficient for the private patient, and we should actually be recommending then a diminution of one of the existing statutory safeguards. I do not know what would be said of us if we recommended that?—One does feel that there should be provision to call in additional medical assistance if wanted, and I take it that that would be in the discretion of the judicial authority.

10,944. Earl Russell: He is the proper person clearly?—He is the proper person to do it.

10,945. Chairman: Take one of those certificates you have just read to us—the first one of the two. The properly constituted judicial authority would say to the doctor—he would probably send for him—"I have read the certificate; I am not satisfied upon it; I have seen the patient, and I am not clear about the case; I want to have another opinion," and then might have followed the second certificate you have there. He might then say, "The first and second together coupled with my inspection of the case are sufficient for me." On the other hand, an out-and-out first certificate, I gather, would be in your view sufficient evidence coupled with a seeing of the patient?—We think so.

10,946. Of course, you are placing upon the single medical practitioner, who might be inexperienced, very considerable responsibility in that case?—One realises that, and one hopes that it might be a deterrent to the inexperienced man from acting. There again in that connection one does feel that the medical practitioner should appear before the judicial authority. As you rightly pointed out, Sir, it is very difficult to reduce to writing the impressions that he gathers, as we have seen from these certificates, and if that be so, it seems doubly important that he should appear.

10,947. He certainly at present is available in the sense that he may be summoned by the judicial authority.

Earl Russell: But never is.

10,948. Chairman: He apparently never is. Also there is this odd feature, that while the justice of the peace in the pauper case is told he is to call in a medical man, as far as I can gather the medical man has generally been called in before the medical certificate is put before the justice, and the medical man is not of the justice's own selection?—That is so, and then of course there is that present provision in the statute that his certificate shall have value as if made on oath.

10,949. Earl Russell: In the pauper case it would mean that the doctor would have to attend on a different day from that on which he had seen the patient. From his point of view it means two visits?—I suppose he would be paid for that, and considering the issue, I do not think the extra guinea is prohibitive.

10,950. I agree he would be paid for it, but then the guardians come in.—But still when one thinks what is paid for out of public funds in the case of criminals—

Earl Russell: I am not differing from you at all.

10,951. Chairman: It would be, I think, very much more satisfactory for the justice to see the doctor, not only in order that he might discuss with him the terms of the report, but also that he might be able to form an opinion of his competency?—Quite.

Earl Russell: And if that were so, it is much better that the doctor should be directed to attend by statute instead of its being discretionary, because a justice may hesitate to put the guardians to an expense, whereas if the doctor has to attend anyhow, he has nothing to do with it.

Chairman: And, moreover, if the doctor were present with his certificate, it would have a tendency to make the justice attend to the case, because the doctor was present. If a justice had the least interest in his work, he would naturally want to ask the medical man who had seen the patient all about him. Even human curiosity would lead him to ask about the case, and he would have the advantage of getting a much fuller explanation of the case.

10,952. Earl Russell: And also of course it would make the doctor more careful, because he would know that if he had put down any ambiguous sentences in his report, he would have to explain what he had meant?—Quite. We think that is really a very important provision.

10,953. Chairman: I do not think you have gone the whole length of this provision in your case?—No. Of course one would like to deal here with the doctor's liability. As we said earlier, we think that that certificate or report which is made early, whatever it be, should be a condition precedent to all that is happening; and that there should undoubtedly rest on anyone making that report the duty of taking reasonable care. As to the evidence he gives on oath, of course he would have on that the natural protection of a witness.

10,954. You contemplate, then, that if we have the patient brought to the justice or the justice going to the patient and interviewing him, the justice should not only have the doctor's certificate, but also see the doctor?—Have the doctor before him.

10,955. Sir David Drummond: Is this the first justice you are dealing with now?—No, this is the judicial authority.

Chairman: This is the real inquiry which is to issue in a certificate.

10,956. Earl Russell: You do not suggest that the doctor should be bound by the rules of evidence at this inquiry? You would allow him to give testimony of hearsay, would you not?—Yes, I suppose so. I think you would have to do that probably, because one recognises that you cannot have a technically strict procedure which might entail bringing witnesses from all over England.

10,957. And, more than that, you cannot form a medical opinion without having the history, to some extent, for what it is worth?—Quite.

Chairman: The ordinary medical certificate produced in a Court of Law includes the phrase, "on soul and conscience," which is supposed to be a formula of much solemnity. The Court will not accept a certificate unless it has those words in it.

Earl Russell: Is it not really the pledge of his professional honour?

10,958. Chairman: Yes, a Court will disregard a certificate which has not those words on it. You want the same kind of solemnity to be attached in this Act?—We do not see how these alleged facts can be tested in any other way. We simply say that they should be put through a sieve, as we believe the statute intended originally.

10,959. Then you contemplate that the doctor when he attends should bring with him a certificate which would be a certificate "on soul and conscience" or sworn, as you please, and you would then expect him to be put on oath before a justice?—Unquestionably. We suppose all the evidence will be taken on oath. Is not that one of the essentials of a judicial inquiry?

Chairman: It is.

10,960. Earl Russell: It depends what importance you attach to it. You may have arbitrations which are in the nature of a judicial inquiry but the evidence is not on oath?—Quite.

10,961. Chairman: But if the doctor were then put on oath, the justice would examine him on any points that arose. Of course, he probably would not examine him if the case were too clear for argument?—It would be quite a formal inquiry then.

10,962. If, on the other hand, it were a case in which he had some doubt, he would examine the doctor on oath, you suggest, and elicit from him additional information. Would you contemplate that deposition being taken down?—I suppose it would be. I am not as familiar with the procedure in the Law Courts as perhaps you are, Sir.

Chairman: We are getting on in the way of procedure and records, if this has to be taken down by a shorthand writer.

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

10,963. Earl Russell: He would be attended by his clerk, I suppose?—One feels that one is dealing with a decision which may involve many years of detention, and that it is at least as important as many minor criminal decisions in which an immense amount of money is spent.

10,964. Earl Russell: It is at least as important as a prosecution for trespass?—Exactly.

10,965. Chairman: I do not mind saying that I think it is probably one of the most important duties that can be performed, in my view?—Quite.

10,966. Earl Russell: Of course, I suppose the doctor being there might also be of some use in advising what institution the patient should be sent to, if he is going to be certified and if you are going to have some choice of institution to which he could be sent?—I should think undoubtedly they would confer on that.

10,967. The justice is the person who directs where a patient shall be confined?—Quite, and we contemplate on that point that the justice might wish to hear relatives and would hear them.

Earl Russell: Naturally, he would, I hope.

10,968. Chairman: The medical man, if in attendance, might say to the justice, "Sir, there is no doubt about this case whatever. I have been the medical attendant of this case for some time. I am sorry to say it is a very bad breakdown, and in amplification of what I say in my certificate I will tell you some other things which you ought to know. You have seen the patient for yourself," and the case then concludes, and that would be a case where the patient would be sent at once to an appropriate place—certified and sent to an asylum. There would be no doubt about that case, I take it?—Then there is that other provision as to not making a final certificate if it is likely to be a temporary case.

10,969. But I am putting the kind of case where that intermediate stage would really be superfluous. I am thinking whether the doctor's intervention at that stage in his interview with the justice might not be of value as indicating what type of case we are dealing with. He might say, "This is a case which is a border-line case or is a recoverable case. It is one of those cases where the state is transitory. If I might suggest it, this case might be appropriately dealt with by being sent to an observation ward and the prognosis of the case is that in a fortnight this state may pass away, and it may not be necessary to certify at all." He would therefore be useful in advising the judicial authority in the immediate destination of the patient?—I quite agree with that.

10,970. I do not know that we would contemplate that every case would pass through these observation wards which we have in view?—No, there must be a large number of cases in which a final decision could be taken at this point.

10,971. In every region it is always the borderland cases which are the difficult cases, and it is those cases which need protection?—Quite.

10,972. I am impressed, and my colleagues are too, with the suggestion that in addition to seeing the patient, which we all as at present advised are agreed upon, it might be well worth considering whether the justice should not also see the medical man; and if we were to recommend a single medical certificate as adequate, that that should be accompanied by the attendance of the medical certifier before the justice?—Yes, and then there is this additional point: we feel that the medical man is not in a position to compel the attendance of relatives. He may, and in certain cases no doubt has, interested relatives who will tell him a lot of stories which may not be strictly true, but the magistrate is in a position to compel the attendance of a relative. If the lunatic says, "My sister-in-law can explain that to you," the magistrate would say, "I am not going to come to a decision until I get that explanation."

10,973. Do you contemplate that the patient himself is to be a participant in this inquiry?—We think there must be a certain run of cases—what their number is I do not know—in which the patients are quite competent to be present. We think the statute itself contemplates that in proceedings under petition they should be present themselves. We know it is not observed, but the sections are quite clear on the point, that they may not only be present at the discretion of the magistrate but they may have a representative present.

10,974. Earl Russell: The statute, as I read it, was thinking nearly all the time of the personal liberty, and this is 35 years ago. Now we are thinking rather more of treatment?—Some of us are. We are putting our case on personal liberty.

Earl Russell: This provision did proceed on the assumption that this was a person who could carry on a litigation.

10,975. Chairman: But the point is this, that while the procedure at which the patient was to be present under the existing code has been described by Mr. Parker and others as more or less a perfunctory thing, Mr. Parker is now contemplating that we should have something much more formal and something in every case, or in practically every case of any difficulty, which would be of the nature of a judicial investigation of the patient's mind in his presence?—We are rather urging that, in the case of a petition proper, the petitions are now or should be of a judicial character, and when you approximate the pauper to the private patient, as it is suggested you shall do, then that the whole proceedings should be of a judicial character; and just as the statute contemplates in that case the presence of the alleged lunatic, in the new procedure the person is just as capable of being present.

10,976. Earl Russell: Or as incapable?—Or as incapable, in the case of serious illness.

10,977. Chairman: If we are overhauling the whole system in this respect, and, in particular, if we are introducing some new safeguards in the way of insisting upon more investigation, that will make the inquiry of a fuller type, and may possibly render it a type of inquiry at which the presence of the person involved may be undesirable. Altogether apart from what the present code is, if we were going to establish a system under which the justice should see the doctor and examine him on the details, I should think there would be very few cases in which it could be said to be beneficial to the patient to hear his case discussed between a doctor and a justice of the peace?—Of course, it has always been the practice in cases under inquiry, and it would perhaps seem wrong to expose a person day after day to those proceedings.

10,978. The exposure would be shocking, I think. Suppose a case in which the doctor in giving his evidence to the justice has to say, "This is an undoubted case of general paralysis with very little hope," that is a dreadful thing to say in the presence of the patient?—Of course, I agree, and that points to somebody having a discretion as to what shall be done.

10,979. But the justice cannot have a discretion when he does not know what is going to be said, can he?—I think the medical man, as he is there, would say, "Now there is something I do not want to say in public."

10,980. That would just involve again the suggestion that things were being done behind the patient's back. He would say, "I was never told what passed between the justice and the doctor. If I had been told, I could have explained it completely, and have shown that it was all wrong."

10,981. Earl Russell: And do you realise that suspicion is very often an incident of unsound mind—rather a common incident?—That is another reason why we are urging our general proposition that it should be at the option of the patient, if he is capable of exercising an option, to hear this. If he exposes himself in certain cases to hearing something which will be upsetting, we think that has to be faced. The only alternative is, as you suggest, to leave the decision to the magistrate.

10,982. But do not you see that to ride off in that easy way by saying, "if he exposes himself,"

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

is precisely as if you were to say, "If a patient with a temperature of 104 chooses to run about on a frosty lawn, he exposes himself to dying," but you do not let him do it?—That brings us back to our original position—that he should have a representative.

10,983. Chairman: But think it out, Mr. Parker. Take the case of the unhappy person being present, what happens then is that this person who is the protector of his destiny will, no doubt, examine the doctor upon the certificate he has given, and I think we can imagine what would happen in that case. He would feel himself to be an advocate of the liberty of the person and therefore bound to take every point that an advocate would take. Advocates do not always take wise points. You might therefore have a long contest with the doctor, who may well warm up to his task under the stimulus of Counsel's cross-examination, while the unhappy patient is sitting there all the time until the doctor at last comes out with: "Well, if you will have the facts plainly, I will tell you: the man will die in three months' time," whereupon the patient faints. That is not a very happy thing to see?—I quite agree.

10,984. One must think of these things as they will happen, not as they will be on paper?—You must think of extreme cases on both sides.

10,985. These are test cases, I suppose?—Yes.

10,986. Sir David Drummond: You have attended. I think, throughout most of the Commission's meetings, Mr. Parker?—A good deal.

10,987. And you have heard superintendent after superintendent say that the safeguards, in their opinion, are adequate, that is to say, they suggest that two medical certificates might be given, but, taking things generally, the safeguards are adequate?—The safeguards covering admission?

10,988. Yes, to prevent wrongful certification the safeguards are adequate; we have heard that again and again. You are suggesting a change of a judicial character, but you have not brought before us a single case in which you could show that a person has been wrongfully certified?—May I qualify that expression of opinion by this, that while under the present law there may have been a period of time when the certificate was properly given, it was of such a short duration that we suggest that case should not have been dealt with in that way.

10,989. Chairman: That is quite a legitimate point, but a different point. You are dealing there with illegal detention—not illegal certification?—It seems to me that we come back inevitably to the question of what constitutes insanity and all the definitions we have been discussing earlier in the day.

10,990. Could you say with your large experience of cases good, bad, and indifferent, have you had any case in which you have been satisfied that there has been illegal certification as distinguished from illegal detention after certification?—I think we have got cases where the abnormality of mind seems to us on our evidence to have been so very slight as not to justify certification, but then that is a question of opinion obviously.

10,991. Earl Russell: You do not put it higher than saying that you think it was unnecessary?—Unnecessary.

10,992. Chairman: These are cases which under a more enlightened system would never have required certification?—That is another point.

10,993. What I would like to know is this, because you have had an exceptional experience of the people who think the present system is wrong, whether any of them have satisfied you that they have been illegally certified as distinguished from retained unduly long?—Of course, it is a difficult question to answer, for this reason, that we never have access to all the facts; we are listening to ex parte statements.

10,994. Sir David Drummond: But you have the certificates?—We have the certificates, and they are not always very informative.

10,995. Might we see a certificate of one case in which you contend a person was wrongfully certified?—Certainly, we will get those out for you.

10,996. Chairman: That would be helpful?—It would. I am afraid I have not many certificates.

10,997. We will get any certificate you like. We will preserve secrecy about this absolutely, but if there are any cases which have come under your cognisance in which, with such imperfect means of investigation as you have got, you have thought an illegal certification had arisen, we would be rather glad to have that, and we can of course call for the certificates and see them. We will assist you in every way in that respect, because one must bear in mind that they are two different things. Illegal certification is one thing; unduly prolonged detention is another thing altogether?—Quite. Do you consider that these pneumonia cases we have heard of are properly certified legally?

10,998. I do not know.—That is our difficulty.

Earl Russell: I should be prepared to say they might be properly certified legally, but it was a ridiculous thing to do.

Sir David Drummond: They were within their rights to certify them according to the present law, but it was a foolish thing to do.

10,999. Chairman: That is an important suggestion of Sir David's, showing that you do not want the law to compel you to do inexpedient things. Therefore I should hold personally that a mere incident of delirium occurring in an illness is an improper ground for certification?—I mentioned that because there are all that class of case of temporary toxic poisoning, with a temperature.

11,000. Earl Russell: I regard some of the cases we were told about as ludicrous?—Quite. We cannot say what the law is upon that. We do not profess to do that.

11,001. Chairman: As Sir David puts it, it may be that a person at that moment could legally be certified who presents two qualifications: first of all, that he is of unsound mind at that moment; secondly, that he is a person who requires to be detained; but whether such cases should be certified, is a very different question?—Yes.

11,002. Now we have got the procedure this length, a single certificate would in your opinion be sufficient, especially if the doctor were in attendance also. The patient has been seen, and the justice is in a position. I suppose, then to make his order, is he?—To make an order of some sort.

11,003. Now there is one other matter on the proceedings—a general question. You rather recommend, I take it, that the proceedings should be public at the option of the patient?—To cover that class of case. We feel that the patient really is capable of, I was going to say, pleading, but of making rational statements to the Court.

11,004. Earl Russell: You have got his relatives and the doctor; do you want the reporter of the local newspaper?—We think that is a matter for the individual. We are dealing with the case where the relatives are interested against the patient, as I am afraid will happen.

11,005. But any future employer will look at the fact that he was charged with insanity?—The alternative is that he goes to an asylum without that chance.

11,006. No. You can have your inquiry. I want to know whom else you want there besides the people we have mentioned.

11,007. Chairman: That is contrary to the protection given to private patients. The private patients' procedure is that everybody is sworn to secrecy?—Quite. Of course, one point on that is trying to make the judicial authority function, and we felt that if the public were admitted he would carry out his duties, perhaps, much more fully than he does at present.

11,008. Earl Russell: The only public that will go there will be the local reporter. Do you want a report in the "Local Herald" that John Jones, after

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

having a great deal of family trouble, was accused of being insane, and the doctor showed he was insane? Do you want all that in the public Press?—I can see there are strong objections to it. It is a question of degree. Of course there is this aspect, that so many people, apparently, who suffer in this way think they have not had a chance of clearing their own characters. Is that necessarily insane? That is the point.

11,009. Chairman: We are fully sensible of that point, but we are not satisfied that publicity is the remedy, because another thing about publicity is that it is to be at the option of the patient in this case?—That is our suggestion.

11,010. A fallacy is the hypothesis that the patient is capable of exercising an option which will be in his own interests. Just remember this: there is a class of patient whose very delusion, delusion of exaltation, courts publicity; he wants to have a scene, and wants to talk about himself in public?—Quite.

11,011. That patient, in whose case publicity would probably be most unfortunate, is the very man who would say, "Certainly I want to go before the justice, and if I could get the Lord Chief Justice I would get him," and with a reporter taking down the sensational parts of his evidence, if I may so put it, you would just be putting him in the environment which would tend to exacerbate his complaint.

11,012. Earl Russell: It would be almost going back to the barbarity of the Middle Ages?—Of course, it is his last public performance, but I do not think it would damage him very seriously. There have been cases of that sort. There was a case where a man stood on the steps of the Royal Exchange and got into trouble with the police. He did it a second time; when he did it a third time it was considered a condition of mental instability.

11,013. How do you know what the medical evidence would have been at the trial, what history of disease it might have shown, that he would not care to have had published?

11,014. Miss Madeleine Symons: Is it not conceivable that that kind of patient might regret it very much on recovery?—In this particular case I do not think he would have regretted it. We must take general cases, of course.

11,015. Sir David Drummond: What about his reputation after he had recovered and went back to his office, and lived in terror of cuttings from the newspapers?—You think he is less prejudiced if it is merely known that he has been away, without knowing the cause of it?

11,016. Chairman: Surely, I think so. Let me put this case: the man has delusions of exaltation, but they are not very pronounced, and he says: "I want to be examined in public, and I am going to put up my case there and establish my case for my liberty"; the doctor appears; and the patient himself, or this person who has been appointed to be his representative, cross-examines the doctor in his presence, and the doctor says, "Well, it is a very unpleasant matter I have got to go into. I ought to say that this is a case where, although I cannot be certain of my diagnosis of the case, I am afraid that this patient is suffering from the initial stages of general paralysis of the insane, but as it is not possible at this stage to pronounce definitely on the subject I would not like to say so, but I must tell you conscientiously what I think. I hope I am wrong, but I think it is so." Think what damage would be done to that man if in point of fact the reading of the symptoms was wrong, and he never had general paralysis. His wife and family would read this in the newspapers, and the man suffers. I should consider it would be a very grievous injury to the man. Now in the ordinary case of a doctor consulting in a case outside the room, he might quite well say to his consultant, "What do you think of this case? I do not like the symptoms he shows; they look like G.P.I." The other doctor says, "I have seen a lot of these cases. I am not at all convinced, but it does look like it," and they would say,

"We must not say anything to the people involved until the thing is clear." And one must remember how the scientific mind looks at these things. Now if all that had to come out, I can conceive irreparable injury done to a patient in public?—Need it necessarily come out, if the doctor's opinion is that? I do not think we contemplated a long cross-examination as to the reasons for his opinion. I may say that, of course, one does see at both ends of the extreme a great number of cases in which it would do damage, and we suggest that there shall be a discretion, which might reside in the magistrate, that if the patient demands publicity he shall consider it.

11,017. Earl Russell: What are you going to gain by publicity? I could understand if you said you wanted other justices to be there to see fair play, but otherwise what are you going to gain by publicity?—I think we have nothing much to gain by publicity, once we can be satisfied that the judicial authority is really functioning; that is what we expect to gain by publicity—that he will be forced to function.

11,018. Mr. H. Snell: Do you not want the patient to know anything that is charged against him? And, if so how can it be in the discretion of someone to withhold information from him?—I was conceding that, in the interests of those patients who might be damaged.

11,019. Yes, but he would still have the grievance that he was condemned to be detained without having the fact of what was wrong with him disclosed?—I do not think you can settle the point at one end.

11,020. No; it is a difficulty?—There is the patient who will be damaged and the patient who will be prejudiced, and our experience does not extend to so large a number of cases that we can attempt to say what those proportions work out at.

11,021. Would you admit that there may possibly be cases in which it would be inadvisable that the full medical trouble should be disclosed?—That is obvious; we must admit that.

11,022. Chairman: Then the result of these proceedings would be either that the justice decided that the case for detention was not made out, whereupon the subject of the application would be discharged; or (and this would be a new procedure) that the justice should direct that the patient be sent to some intermediate institution, some observation ward or some such place, in order that the case might be further studied and observed and a judgment come to after fuller information; or he might take the last step of saying, "Well, it is perfectly clear in this case. There is no need to carry the matter further, unfortunately, and I shall here and now pronounce the order."—Quite. And is not there a fourth case, where he might permit voluntary treatment without any order, if he were satisfied?

11,023. It would be then for the patient to be advised to volunteer?—Yes, but we had contemplated that would be open to the patients.

11,024. Earl Russell: True, but in form it would mean that the justice made no order?—We are suggesting that, except in the case which is really settled and beyond discussion, the order shall not be made for twenty-eight days.

11,025. If he is going into voluntary treatment, that does mean that the justice, as far as he is concerned, makes no order. What he notes in his book is, "No order"?—Yes.

11,026. Sir David Drummond: What length of time do you suppose all these proceedings would take, from first to last?—I suppose they would be almost as quick as the present proceedings, would they not? There might be cases in which evidence is more fully gone into than it is now. Our suggestion rather is that the evidence which we presume now is taken by somebody should be given before the judicial authority.

Chairman: I think what Mr. Parker contemplates could be embraced within the same time.

Earl Russell: I should think it could be done in three days, in normal cases.

28 January, 1925.]

MR. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,027. Chairman: Now you pass in your précis to detention, but we have not finished with certification. What further suggestions have you to make on the safeguards relating to certification?—We do suggest that there should be an appeal to Quarter Sessions, as I think there is.

Mr. Walter Stewart: It is Section 327—"Appeals."

Witness: There is that provision, and we compare that with the proceeding under the Mental Deficiency Act of 1913, where these rights are given. The section there is Section 8, sub-section (5).

11,028. Earl Russell: I am very much interested in this: it is quite new to me. Can you tell me what Act this is taken from and put into this Consolidation Act?—I am afraid I cannot.

11,029. Chairman: I am afraid this is a mare's nest, if I may say so. Section 327 refers to "an order of the justices under this Act"; that is a special thing; it is not a reception order?—It did cross my mind whether that might be so.

11,030. I think there is no right of appeal at present?—Is there not in the Mental Deficiency Act? I think the relative section is Section 8, sub-section (5).

11,031. Earl Russell: That is notice of intention to charge a defective with an offence?—That is notice given, yes. It is Section 61 of the Act.

11,032. Chairman: "Any person aggrieved by the conviction or sentence of a court of summary jurisdiction under this Act may appeal to quarter sessions." That is a person who has been found guilty of a misdemeanour under the Act? In that case he receives warning that he is going to be treated as a mental deficient.

Chairman: No. This is a person who has committed an offence against the Act.

Earl Russell: This is an ordinary appeal.

11,033. Chairman: Yes, it is exactly the same thing as in Section 327 of the 1890 Act. However, the point is not important, whether it is there or not. What is important is whether it should be there.—I think our view again is that if you get the judicial authority really to function it is not so important. We were anxious to preserve in the procedure anything that was there already.

11,034. Earl Russell: You were under the impression that it was there already?—Yes.

11,035. Chairman: I am afraid upon that, though it is no part of my duty to express opinions, it does not apply?—I am not familiar with that part of the law.

11,036. Then the centre of your whole contention is that you want a strengthening of the judicial element in the initial stages of certification; you wish the safeguards strengthened?—Yes, for two reasons: firstly, because it is the procedure which we think legislation has adopted from time to time and, secondly, because one cannot help feeling that the public point of view, the point of view of a jury, or even of the Courts, is quite different from the medical point of view, and we feel very strongly that both those elements should act together in reaching a decision.

11,037. Now I think we have explored that topic very fully with you. May we pass next to the question of detention. This is on page 12 of your précis. Here you draw attention at the outset to the multiplicity of provisions intended for the protection of the certified lunatic, after certification, in contrast with what you describe as the paucity of statutory safeguards prior to certification?—That is so.

11,038. There is no doubt, of course, that the Act appears to be full of precautionary measures of one sort or another designed to protect the inmate of the institution?—Quite.

11,039. Now, first of all, you submit as a criticism of those safeguards that they are for the most part illusory?—That they do not function as they were intended to.

11,040. The effort in the statute is plain, of course?—Quite.

11,041. How are we to ensure that people will do their duty, Mr. Parker?—I think that is impossible, Sir.

11,042. We can, of course, visit them with punishments if they do not, and we can address admonitions to them to do their duty, but it is more difficult to secure that it will be done in the fashion in which we wish it done? We feel that there are really only two ways of doing it: one is to put in a supervisory organisation, which seems to be effective, and to depend upon public opinion to make that organisation effective. We cannot suggest any other way. Of course, we realise there are difficulties in introducing public opinion into this particular question, but at the same time there are very big risks on the other side.

11,043. Now let us just look at one or two of the points to which you draw attention here—the various forms of existing safeguards. You have dealt with them in series. I am rather struck with this: you do not draw attention to the present system under which a private patient who has not been seen by the judicial authority is to have the right to be told that he may be seen by the judicial authority. That, of course, would disappear if the judicial authority had in every case to see him?—Yes.

11,044. That is why you do not deal with it?—Yes.

11,045. Then you advert first of all, I think, to Section 22?—Yes.

11,046. Which relates to a power to allow a relative or friend to take charge of a lunatic?—The comment we want to make on that is that, of course, so often in these cases it is a question of emergency, and people do not know of these rights; indeed, we have one case in mind where the authorities themselves did not know of the Act, and said there was no such right; and that observation applies to a good many of these sections. People do not travel with the Lunacy Act in their bag, and one does not know where one can get it in an emergency. I am speaking from my personal knowledge. Prior to this inquiry, I had not the slightest idea where to go, and the general public do not know. It would take them a long time to get a copy of the Lunacy Act, and meanwhile all sorts of things have happened. The public ignorance on this question is perfectly amazing.

11,047. Mr. Micklem: What is your proposed remedy there?—Generally, we think the big remedy is to simplify the procedure, but having done that, we think that some synopsis of the Act might be available in pamphlet form. The Government issue all sorts of instructions in the case of pensions and other matters. I do not think there is any great difficulty in having something of the sort available in these cases.

11,048. Chairman: I thought something of that sort might well be done?—Setting out, not in legal form, quite clearly what could be done.

11,049. Mr. Micklem: Do you mean setting out Section 22?—No; I am dealing with the whole of the rights which are open to the public. You see, we get such a number of complaints, not only from patients, but also from the patients' friends. They may be months before they ascertain what their remedy is. They are people who cannot go to a solicitor; they have not got the means. They hear in the asylums of the existence of our Society, and they come to us and say, "What are we to do?" and we advise them.

Earl Russell: You mean a short placard setting out their rights in plain language.

Chairman: Where a member of a family is certified and taken away, I see no difficulty in handing the relative a short statement. I mean, if the Government wants us to deposit moneys in savings banks they have no difficulty in telling us how to do it, and I do not see why, equally where a family has had this misfortune, you should not be able, at the time the patient is certified, to say to the relatives, "Here is a useful summary for you." It would show them that they had a duty to come and see the patient, and they should be told that in definite language; and should also be told of their rights to visit, and half a dozen things like that. It seems to me it would be a most useful thing that the household, of which there is an inmate in an institution, should know the simple things and the main things that they ought to know. Of course, for complicated matters they may have to consult a lawyer. That is not what you want. What you want is something that tells people about it.

Mr. Snell: Could they not be referred to the office of the local medical officer of health, or some appropriate place, for further information?

Chairman: For further information, certainly; but I think they should have something, so to speak, that they could look at.

Earl Russell: A card printed on both sides, which would have everything on it.

Sir David Drummond: The magistrate who deals with the case might hand them the information in written form.

11,050. Chairman: It is very proper, when you are dealing with an obscure branch of law like this, that you should not have to go and buy King's printers' copies of the Act, which the public cannot understand. One might well have a summary of the general rights and provisions about getting letters, and things of that sort?—Yes; we shall come across them as we go through.

11,051. On the immediate question of Section 22, that is rather a direction to the justice, if the friends or relatives can really look after the case, to say that it is not necessary to pronounce an order or, rather, to leave the case in the hands of the friends or relatives?—We believe that that section, as far as our information goes, is very seldom availed of; I do not know why.

11,052. I suppose it will be for this reason, that it is very difficult for the relatives to take proper care of a lunatic?—Quite.

11,053. That must be the real reason. One knows how extremely destructive of the home life a person of that type may be. Take a small house, where you cannot get a nurse: manifestly, proper care could not be taken of anything but a slight case. On the other hand, wealthy people might be able to look after them in their own homes?—My attention was drawn to a case where an old lady was taken ill and the son came down from Scotland and asked if he could not take her to his own house; and in that case they said, "No." Under this section apparently, he had the right to do so. We are not complaining of that, but that is the sort of case where this section might operate.

11,054. Are you sure that this section applies to the case where a summary reception order has actually been made, or is it applicable only to a case where an order might be made?

Mr. Micklem: I think it applies to both, because it says, "retaining or taking."

Chairman: Probably it does; it does not say "alleged lunatic," as it does in other places; it says "the lunatic."

Earl Russell: I think what Mr. Micklem points out in the second line makes it quite clear.

11,055. Chairman: Yes. It is rather curious, because it is really tantamount to a method of discharge to the care of relatives?—Practically it is a recognition that relatives may be in a position to give the best possible treatment, where institutional treatment is not required.

11,056. You think that more advantage should be taken of that?—It is one of the things one would like to see on the printed notice.

11,057. Then the visit to private patients under Section 39?—Of course, we just make that comment that so many patients become technically paupers under Section 18, and that that does not operate quite as freely as it was intended to.

11,058. Are we to assimilate the pauper case to the private case and to require a month-end report in the case of the pauper, or are we to abolish the month-end report in the case of the private patient? That seems to be the choice before us?—I think the former. It seems to me the so-called pauper is as worthy of a month-end report as anybody else. That seems to accord with modern feeling, I think.

11,059. Do you attach importance to this month-end report as causing the medical officer to address himself to the case and to communicate with the central authority?—I think so, obviously, because it does show that the case is then reconsidered.

11,060. Now, on the question of correspondence, which you deal with next, correspondence is of importance, because it is one of the matters which maintains the contact between the patient and the outer world?—That is so.

11,061. I think we may take this point fairly shortly. We have been at a loss to understand why there should be a difference in the matter of apprising patients of their right to have letters sent in the case of the pauper patients as distinguished from the private patients. Do you remember the section which says that in the places where private patients are detained a notice regarding these things should be put up?—Quite.

11,062. There seems to be no reason for that distinction. On the other hand, all letters written and addressed to public persons should, of course, be compulsorily sent unopened, as at present. Notices should be put up, indicating to patients their right to address those persons, and then you have to make physical provision for the posting of their letters?—Yes, and of course, as I point out, there appears to be a great grievance amongst patients that they never know what happens to their letters. They post them, and wait and wait, perhaps for weeks—and one knows the inconvenience in one's own home if one does not get an answer, and wonders whether the letter was posted; and we certainly think that, whatever decision is taken, they might be told that the letters would be returned to them, as I think is done in the Army where letters are censored.

11,063. Yes, but there is this difficulty. There must be a certain discretion in dealing with the correspondence of these people as distinguished from ordinary persons. It may be that letters addressed to public functionaries must go at all hazards, but I can well see that ordinary correspondence not addressed to public officials would have to be supervised?—Quite; but then two points arise: firstly, do the letters in fact ever reach the responsible person who is to exercise that discretion?

11,064. Who is to judge?—Yes; and to meet it, I understand, in asylums recently there is a more marked development in putting in an equipment of locked letter boxes.

Chairman: That is undoubtedly improving.

11,065. Earl Russell: I can tell you this, that 35 years ago, in the London county asylums, every patient's letter was seen by a member of the visiting committee. They, and they alone, decided whether the letter should go forward or not?—Yes, and in the 1877 Committee this very question of letter boxes and supervising of correspondence was very closely considered, and the proposal was made then that vetoing should not be by anyone in the asylum, but that locked letter boxes should be sent, as in America, to an outside authority.

Earl Russell: We decided, in the case I am referring to, whether they should go on or not. We used to have baskets full of them.

11,066. Sir David Drummond: What is your suggestion?—Our suggestion is that letters should be returned or that patients should be notified whether they have gone. Secondly, we should very much prefer that the visiting committee should be the censor, if that is practicable.

Earl Russell: Of course, I do not mean that all letters were necessarily delayed for a fortnight. It was only those which were not sent on which came to us. No letter was detained which we did not see.

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Chairman: I think this is rather a difficult matter, because there manifestly must be letters of a type which cannot possibly be sent on.

Earl Russell: The majority are.

Mr. Snell: We receive them ourselves.

Chairman: I am thinking of things even worse than that—not merely offensive things.

Earl Russell: Incoherent.

11,067. Chairman: There are cases in which patients have included their faces inside an envelope, and posted it?—Yes; I am not suggesting that there should not be supervision.

11,068. Reams of correspondence are often produced by a disordered mind. One of the difficulties, I have learned, with regard to the supply of toilet paper is that it is used for writing to the Board of Control. These may seem small things, but they are really in administration very often difficult things to deal with. They are not trivial really?—They are very difficult.

11,069. And one wants to ensure that no letter that is of moment to a patient fails to reach its destination, and yet, on the other hand, you want to prevent causing unnecessary pain outside. Take the rambling letter which is full of obscenities and dreadful things; of course, for that to reach a relative would be most painful. It would be as bad, almost, as asking the relative to come and watch the frenzies of the patient. You must safeguard that. How are we to discriminate? There must be some person to judge. We agree that the letter-box should be there, and that the patient should have the satisfaction of depositing the letter in a letter-box, and that somebody would take charge of it.—That disposes of our main contention, but then there is the further point, and that is the question of complaint. We do attach considerable importance to that fact, that a complaint as to treatment can get through, and one cannot help saying—I hope it is not a reflection on the medical superintendents at all—that people lower down in the administration might be and would be tempted to put a letter of that sort aside, and if you can cover that point you have covered the whole of it.

11,070. Earl Russell: The suggestion is that these boxes in the wards should be locked, that they should be cleared, not by an attendant, but by a superior person like a charge nurse, and taken straight away to the central administrative block and taken out unopened—not come into the hands of the inferior staff at all?—I gather that, but it does seem to me a very difficult position, where justified complaints against any institution can be held up. That is what is suggested to us. If they are not held up, there is this further suggestion made, that people are penalised if they make complaints in their letters. That is a much more serious thing to suggest.

11,071. That, of course, is a thing you have to be prepared for in every institution, from the Army downwards.—Certainly, and one does not like to put any limit upon the correspondence, excepting the necessity of sorting out the type of letters you have referred to.

11,072. Which is the chief output in the correspondence from asylums. I am bound to tell you that of the letters we looked at there were not more than 1 per cent. that were fit to be sent outside.—I think the case really would be met, as I have suggested, if the letter which was vetoed, for whatever reason, was returned to the writer. He would then have the opportunity of bringing it before another authority, the visiting committee.

11,073. Consider that. Two large washing baskets full of letters: Are those to be sorted out and returned to their writers?—If the committee have read them, we should be quite satisfied. Our present view is—I do not know whether you can correct it—that it is beyond the capacity of the committee to go into them.

11,074. No. In the case I am speaking of, every letter was looked at by the committee.—That was 20 years ago.

11,075. Yes.—Is it done now?

Earl Russell: Yes, I think so

11,076. Sir David Drummond: Would you not trust the medical superintendent?—I think we could trust him, but I do not think he would have the time to deal with the matter.

Chairman: And we are concerned to see that his time for medical duties is as little trenched upon as possible, and I should not like to think of a skilled alienist spending his time reading reams of letters.

11,077. Earl Russell: I would very much like you to have 1,000 letters taken at random from the output of an asylum.—I have tested the position by one's experience in the Army, where the number of letters that one had to censor was so large that after a time many were passed without being read.

11,078. Mr. Snell: Have you any information as to mechanical difficulties, such as the getting of stationery and postage stamps or anything of that sort inside asylums?—There are constant complaints as to the limitation of stationery.

11,079. Earl Russell: We have heard nothing about the cost of postage from any superintendent, but we know that with the number of letters sent out it must be something substantial in the big asylums?—I quite see the difficulties, but I am wondering whether there is any way of dealing with them. Could you make special provisions for patients who have reached the stage of parole?

11,080. A class of uncensored letter writers would be quite a good idea?—We quite recognise that you must cut away the person who writes those impossible letters.

11,081. And they are the most prolific?—They are the most prolific, but there is the other class.

Earl Russell: It would be quite an assistance in your discipline to make a class of uncensored letter writers.

11,082. Chairman: I rather think I have had a hint that that has been done in some cases. For instance, I was told a very interesting thing about one place, with regard to parcels coming in. The ordinary parcel has to be opened, because it may contain anything—razors, and all sorts of things. One or two of the patients whom I saw received all their parcels without having them opened at all, and I asked the very question; I said, "Is there not some danger about that?" The answer was, "No; we know that patient quite well, and we know the relatives, and the parcels for that patient are handed to him direct, unopened by us. Those patients are trusted by us." It seems to be one of those things which could be usefully dealt with in rules rather than by legislation, if the general principle is assured, that all letters are dealt with by some responsible person, and not by subordinate attendants?—That is the great thing we want to provide against.

11,083. The risks of victimisation are possibly more likely in the lower ranks than in the upper ranks?—Yes; one does not like to be criticised, and the criticism passed outside.

11,084. Mr. Snell: You do not urge that all the letters written, whatever may be their nature, be sent out uncensored?—Oh, no.

11,085. You make no claim that the next-of-kin should see everything that is written?—I think that is going too far.

11,086. Chairman: Yes, it looks to me to be a matter concerning which, if we had assured the principle, the detail would be appropriate for regulation in the institution—if we had a sound principle. Now let us pass on to the next thing, about the visits of friends. I am a little appalled at the suggestion that the obligation is to be placed upon friends to visit. How are you going to enforce that?—Are you dealing with Section 47?

11,087. Yes; it is the middle of page 14 of your précis: "Visits of Friends, Section 47. This right, we submit, should be obligatory and not permissive, at any rate for a monthly visit." I do not quite understand the obligatory right?—I was referring to the word in the section, that one of the Commissioners "may" give —. I was rather suggesting that he "shall" give, that right of visitation is permissive at present.

28 January, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,088. What is the safeguard you are going to impose there? As one knows, at present it is generally recommended that a patient during the first period of detention should not be visited by relatives, until he has had a little time to quieten down and get accustomed to the place; or again there are many cases whom the presence of a relative may excite unduly. If you made it an absolute right that the friend in every case should be entitled to insist on access to the patient you might be infringing upon the medical interests of the patient, might you not?

Sir David Drummond: Very clearly that would be so.

Witness: We have in mind a case there where permission was refused, not by the Commissioners, but by a superintendent to visit a certain patient who was said to be violent, and it was pressed, and I think on the third occasion the visit was allowed for three minutes. The person who paid the visit found that the individual was not in the least violent.

11,089. Earl Russell: That was probably why the visit was allowed, was it not?—In this particular case it had gone on for several days, and within two or three days afterwards the man was dead; but still, business of a very urgent nature was transacted. Still, that objection was made, and one does not know whether it was properly made or not.

11,090. But there you did not apply this section. Do not you think the Commissioners are fit to exercise this discretion, without the word "shall"?—Yes, I suppose so. We should not press that.

Chairman: Just look how far it would go. No other authority can go to a patient's room and force his way in.

11,091. Earl Russell: And even a prisoner, you know, cannot be visited against his will?—I did not know that.

11,092. Chairman: Visits are not always welcome, you know?—Quite.

11,093. But the important thing to safeguard is that the person who has a proper interest to see a patient and whose visit will be calculated to help the patient ought to be admitted, of course?—Quite.

Chairman: I do think this is largely a medical question.

11,094. Sir David Drummond: I do not think your medical confrères will agree if the Commission recommend interfering with the medical superintendents in such a matter?—I think the only instance in which this arises is cases in which an ex-patient may want to go back and visit his friends, and that may not be considered suitable. However, that is only an exceptional case.

11,095. Chairman: I can well imagine that the visits of some ex-patients may be of an agitating character. Of course, we know so often that the ex-patient, particularly the ex-patient who disliked his treatment, if he went back might produce very undesirable results in the institution, might he not? He might be the very source of the agitation, which would be most undesirable, especially if he were not just entirely well balanced, as is the case even with some quite sane people?—Quite.

Chairman: It is now four o'clock. I was going to suggest that we might take your further examination possibly in a fortnight. We are very anxious not to break its continuity. I think we have already arranged to hear the evidence of the Asylum Workers' Union at our next sitting, but they have been good enough, through Mr. Gibson, to tell us that they will meet our convenience in the matter; and in that case we propose to meet on Monday, the 9th February, to continue your examination. Will that be convenient for you?

Witness: Yes.

Chairman: As you can see, we are not anxious to hurry your evidence in any way.

Witness: I am at your disposal entirely.

Chairman: Then we will adjourn to the 9th February.

(The Witness withdrew.)

(Adjourned to Monday, 9th February, at 10.30 o'clock.)

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

MR. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER, recalled and further examined.

11,096. Chairman: Mr. Parker, on previous days we have examined with you a number of suggested reforms, and when we parted last time we had been discussing the question of visitation.—Section 47.

11,097. Yes; and the general topics we had been considering with you, I think, were all related to the safeguards for inmates of institutions. We had passed from certification and admission, and we were discussing the various safeguards which exist with regard to persons who are actually under detention. You were concerned to show us that in several respects those safeguards in practice did not work satisfactorily, and you had some improvements to suggest to us. We have dealt with correspondence and the exhibition of notices giving patients an indication of their rights, and we have discussed visitation by relatives and others. I think we might now pass on to page 14 of your précis.—There is just one point on notices. I have not had the opportunity of reading my evidence, but in my recollection I do not think I have made it quite clear that we strongly urge that all notices affecting a patient while under detention should be exhibited. At present of course only one is exhibited, the right to correspond with the Lord Chancellor and others, but it does seem to us rather absurd that where the law provides all sorts of provisions for a lunatic's protection, which he may use once he is getting better, he should not have access to them; as far as we know he never has under any circumstances access to the Lunacy Act.

11,098. You may recall that in the course of your evidence we discussed a suggestion which I personally thought was a very useful one, namely, that when a person is admitted to an institution, that person, if fit to receive it, should be handed a short pamphlet, or a notice, written in simple language describing the general rights, and that a similar document might appropriately be handed to the relatives or persons interested in the welfare of the patient.—I am rather dealing with a case where the patient would not be in a fit condition to receive it, and am suggesting that he should have access to that kind of document in the asylum when he is well enough to consider it.

11,099. I think there is a great deal to be said for giving information in some form to patients?—Yes.

11,100. You could have notices put up, such as the notices about correspondence, which we have already discussed. Of course, on the other hand, one does not want to convey too much the impression of an institution regulated by all kinds of Acts—you know what I have in my mind?—I quite agree.

11,101. We are all concerned to emphasise the idea of the general hospital as much as possible, and the legal detention aspect as little as possible; but at the same time I appreciate the difficulty which patients who have a genuine desire to know about their rights must experience in ascertaining them?—We have quite a number of cases where this occurs. A patient after months or even years at last has access to the Lunacy Act in particular, and then for the first time he begins to find out how it is possible for him to get out. We shall come to Section 49, the right of calling in two medical men. We have more than one case of that kind where the minute the patient found out there was the right, he called in a medical man and got out. That is the point.

11,102. I follow. Of course I have no doubt that the Board of Control and others would receive many amateur exercises in the law from patients—that would be inevitable—if they were supplied with the material, but that is probably unavoidable. However, I think we are with you in the view that some form of simple information should be provided whereby the general rights, without setting them out in detail, should be ascertainable?—Yes.

11,103. Then let us just pass on to some of the other questions which you deal with. On Section 49, which is obviously a valuable provision of the Act, I think your view is that some provision should be made for meeting the expense of the examination contemplated by that section, where patients are unable to pay?—That is so. If the distinction between pauper and private patient is done away with, of course it seems to us that that point will inevitably come up. It is a very valuable right to get a fresh medical opinion on the condition of the patient, and we want to throw out that suggestion for your consideration, whether anything can be done on those lines.

11,104. Manifestly there also we would require to put some limitation on it, because you could not

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

have constant enquiries, and possibly useless enquiries, into the same patient's state of mind repeatedly?—We quite realise that. It is a question of detail. It is the question of the principle we want to put before you, and in that connection on that same section I would like to make this further suggestion: we think it would be very valuable if outside medical men could be induced to visit the asylums more freely, and, particularly, the patient's own doctor. As far as our evidence goes that hardly ever takes place. In fact, I do not know that the patient's personal doctor has any right of entry once a patient passes into an asylum, except under this section.

11,105. Yes, one can see the value of that. Then we pass to an important question, the provisions of the statute for dealing with temporary absences on trial, or for health, Section 55?—Yes.

11,106. What have you to say upon that topic? We all recognise, of course, the value of the provision?—It seems to us probably the most valuable provision in the Act from the patient's point of view, that in the course of convalescence he should be subjected to the only conditions which can really test his condition of mind, and in that connection we want to point out a very wide divergence in the application of this section. Perhaps I might refer you, first, to the Cobb Report. At the bottom of page 62 they deal with it rather conveniently. They say: "The evidence before us does not support Dr. Lomax's suggestions that this practice is neglected. Out of 95 public mental hospitals there are only 12 which do not at present use the procedure; and there are 37 in which all patients are sent out on trial before discharge." We submit that even 12 is a very, very serious figure: this valuable provision is not used at all in 12 hospitals; and if I may refer to the Board of Control's Report of 1923 at page 184—this is a case in which it is extensively used: "Fourteen patients were out on trial. We are glad to notice that considerable use is made of trial by way of testing a patient's fitness for discharge. During the period under review 176 patients were allowed out on trial, and money allowances were granted in just half of the cases so dealt with." That is a London asylum, I think, Bexley. That shows you what can be done. Then on the other side we get very numerous quotations, if I may just give you perhaps one or two. At page 204, Napsbury, they say: "We would strongly urge that trial as a means of testing a patient's capacity to face the world is a most useful thing, and might, as is now largely the case, be made use of extensively, not only to ascertain if a patient has recovered, but also to see if, though not recovered, a patient's condition is such that he might with safety be handed over to the care of his friends. We would recommend this suggestion to the committee's and Dr. Rolleston's consideration." Now, there are very numerous instances which I can give you which show two things, that in many cases it is hardly used at all—perhaps I ought to give you a stronger one—and even where it is used the provision of money varies enormously. Birmingham, I think, is a case where they give money very freely; in other cases they give no money allowance at all, and we do submit that if you want to ease a patient's mind when he goes out to try and face the world, the money grant is probably the most important thing to consider.

11,107. Now, at present the right to give permission for absence on trial is vested in any two visitors of an asylum who have the advice in writing of the medical officer?—That is so.

11,108. So that it is two representatives of the local authority who have the power just now, and the visitors are also the persons empowered to make the allowance, I notice?—Yes.

11,109. On this topic there seems to be again complete unanimity that the provision should be more largely taken advantage of. It is manifestly an admirable thing?—Yes. May I give you just two more instances where no money grant has been made?

One is on page 224 of the Report, Staffordshire, Burntwood. In that case seven patients had been allowed out on trial, but in no case was a money allowance during trial granted. I think that was an asylum with 685 patients, so apparently the percentage is very low and no money is given. On page 246 there is the Worcestershire Asylum, Barnsley Hall. The Commissioner says: "I must again note that in no case was an allowance of money granted to trial cases by the Committee."

11,110. Yes, in that case, however, the right to go out is freely used?—Yes.

11,111. "I was glad to see that 58 patients have been allowed to go out on trial, and to learn that trial is used with a view to finding out if patients are fit to live in the care of their friends, though not recovered, as well as a test for recovery; but I must again note that in no case was an allowance of money granted to trial cases by the Committee." I think you have made your point quite clearly that there is a very large divergence of practice in the matter, and that those institutions where resort is not had to Section 55 suffer in consequence—at least the patients suffer. If it is found advantageous in some asylums, it is natural to infer it would be advantageous elsewhere also?—Yes, and perhaps I might add this, that reading this last Report of the Board of Control, it is quite obvious that they are pressing for this reform very hard.

11,112. I drew the same inference myself from reading it.—Again, the pressing does not seem to have any effect.

11,113. That raises, of course, the difficult question which I have put to you several times. You may enact Rules and Acts of Parliament until you are black in the face, but the question is how you are to get them carried out if you give discretionary powers. It seems to me that the method which would be the most hopeful to pursue would be to give much stronger powers in framing regulations for institutions. At present that power is not a very strong implement?—It is really another reason why we suggest that the Board should have a directing power.

11,114. That is a hopeful line of progress, that you should be able to frame regulations on this and other topics which would have the effect, not only of bringing those powers to the notice of the bodies administering, but also insuring that they exercise them. That is what we want?—Yes.

11,115. So that this is not so much a complaint by you against existing legislation, as that the existing legislation is not being taken advantage of?—That is so.

11,116. Therefore the point is rather an administrative one, to ensure that the existing legislation, though apparently excellent if used, should in point of fact be put into operation?—That is the point.

11,117. No doubt the divergence of practice must be to some extent due to the idiosyncrasies of the medical superintendent—some men would be more cautious or, if you please, frightened to let patients out, while others are more prepared to take risks. It is the advice of the medical officer which goes before the visitors in dealing with this matter.

Mr. Mickle: Under sub-section (6), I think, that is unnecessary, is it not? The advice of the medical officer does not seem to apply to the case of a pauper patient where he is in a hospital or licensed house.

11,118. Chairman: "A Commissioner as regards any hospital or licensed house and two members of the managing committee of a hospital, and two of the visitors may, of their own authority, permit a pauper patient to be absent upon trial." But as it happens there are no paupers, as we know, in licensed houses or registered hospitals. If they were there they would have the advantage of this. (To the Witness): But I think that is the case, is it not?—I suppose they are not technically classed as paupers. Of course, there are people in registered hospitals who pay very little.

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,119. But they are not, I think, classified as pauper patients?—I was going to suggest that the visiting committee probably have a very great voice in the exercise of this section besides the medical superintendent.

11,120. Yes, but the fact remains that while this subsection (6) deals with patients in hospitals or licensed houses, and gives power to a Commissioner and certain other persons to permit a pauper patient to be absent, I am afraid the answer is, in fact, that there are no pauper patients in those institutions; and, at any rate, the great bulk of the pauper patients are in public asylums?—That is so.

11,121. And what you are concerned with is to see that this right is more freely taken advantage of?—That is our proposal.

11,122. It does apply, of course, to other institutions as well; the probation system is very useful for all classes of patients, I should imagine?—Very.

11,123. You do not confine your recommendation to paupers?—No, by no means, but that it should be general to licensed houses and registered hospitals.

11,124. We have your view upon that. Then may we pass to the boarding out provisions which are to be found in Section 57?—The suggestion we want to make there is that where a justice of a locality to which it is proposed a patient should go is satisfied, that that should equally apply, and if the justice is satisfied the right should be made obligatory instead of permissive. That is rather carrying out our suggestion that the lay authority shall not only have something to say to discharge, but also in the preliminary step of boarding out.

11,125. Yes. This section raises, of course, a question of general policy of some interest. We have been told that the boarding out experiment has been tried in England and has not been very successful. On the other hand, I am aware that in Scotland the boarding out system was very largely taken advantage of. I learn, however, that latterly there has been some falling off in that respect. We will hear evidence later on, of course, of how it is worked in Scotland, but I think in Scotland it has been largely used for the purpose of sending patients who were really harmless, and indeed to some extent useful, out to country cottages where they were more or less incorporated into the household and did some work, did their share of work on the farm or small holding, and lived with the people there?—Yes, that I gather is so. It is largely dealt with in the report of the last Commission.

11,126. Yes. That is a method which has been largely taken advantage of in Scotland. In many of the Highland parishes you will find in a number of cottages a person staying there who is quite harmless, but who is obviously mentally deficient, but is well looked after and does some work, and lives a more or less happy life. The difficulty, I gather, in England has been the difficulty of supervision. That in Scotland, I know, is met by sending round visitors who under the Scottish Board of Control go round and visit these people in the houses and find out that they are being properly treated. It is manifest, of course, that it would be liable to abuse if there were not some supervision?—Quite. It occurs to me in that connection that if the system of district commissioners which we have discussed were adopted, it would facilitate all that kind of supervision.

11,127. It has an attractive side, because it means that the unfortunate patient is not segregated from his fellows, but is allowed to carry on as well as he can still as a member of society, subject to his disability and with the necessary protections?—There is no question, I should think, that he leads a much happier life, and a partially useful life, because I understand some of these cases earn money.

11,128. Those of us who come from Scotland know that they are quite useful about the house, if one may put it colloquially, and also on the holding?—Yes.

11,129. Now, I think we may pass to the question of discharge. We have discussed the terms on which the patient enters the institution; we have discussed the rights which he possesses while an inmate of the institution, and then comes the important question of his discharge, and I should rather imagine from your experience that that is a point upon which attention is concentrated by your Society?—That is so, yes.

11,130. And I suppose that most of the complaints you have had are by people who say that they have been detained after recovery longer than they should have been?—Unduly detained.

11,131. We discussed earlier with you the difficulties which do surround that question—I mean the difficulties of convalescence, and we need not recur to that. Let us attend now rather to the statutory code of discharge, and hear any observations which you have to make upon that topic?—The first point I would like to put before you is Section 72: the case of the private patient who apparently can only be discharged if the person, on whose petition the reception order was made, by writing under his hand so directs. Now that brings up quite a biggish class of cases where we find that the petitioner is interested adversely to the patient. Take the simplest case of all: it is not always that a wife wants to get her husband out. One very strong case of that kind came under my personal observation last year, which I should like to mention, if I may?

11,132. Certainly.—That was a case where a very busy man in the north of England got run down, and he attempted to take his life. He was then under treatment for six weeks in the local infirmary. He was very well known and was visited by a lot of friends. He had the assurance that nothing more would be done, and that he was free to go out. He was then persuaded to go for a fortnight's change, as it was put to him, to a very big registered hospital in the Midlands; of course, he knew nothing about it. His wife knew nothing about it, his two sisters knew nothing about it, and these three ladies took him down to this place. He was admitted and the usual thing happened. When I say "usual," I think it is almost invariable; they are given sedatives when they arrive. His sisters came to visit him the next day and were advised not to disturb him; he himself told me he was under the influence of the sedative well into the next afternoon. When it gradually transpired to the two sisters that he was not in a home of rest at all, but in a big lunatic asylum, they then went up to live in his neighbourhood, and for eleven weeks they lived there, having him out every day. The medical superintendent said, "This man has no business to be here, get him away," and they were absolutely, and entirely powerless until the petitioner, the wife, was at last persuaded to act. There were other features about that case which I should like to mention. That happened to be a case where a very violent assault took place while he was there; his arm was so badly wrenched that the whole of the muscles under the left shoulder blade were destroyed. That was represented at the time to these ladies as complaints on his part of rheumatism, and then ultimately the authorities found out it was something far more serious. Of course, when he came out he had massage, but he will never use that arm again. I could give you the name, but I cannot give it publicly.

11,133. Sir David Drummond: Was he certified?—He was certified on the petition of his wife ultimately. That is a typical case, where the man has gone back to his work, and it is very responsible work, and for obvious reasons he does not want to raise the question. He takes no action and it stops there. I only want to point out that it took these ladies 11 weeks to get that man out.

Sir Ernest Hiley: Has the Witness overlooked Section 83?

11,134. Chairman: I was just coming to that. (To the Witness): You rather suggested that the only person who could extricate such a patient was the petitioner; but is there not provision in the Act for the discharge of patients on recovery, apart from the petitioner.—There is that provision, but the point is, how often is it used?

11,135. That is another question; we are looking at the Act itself just now?—I thought I qualified it when I said that, as far as our information goes, this section is very seldom availed of. Of course, one cannot say that positively; I can only say that in the cases that come before us this section is never used.

11,136. That is not quite the point; I understand that in this case it was a hospital that the patient was in?—A registered hospital.

11,137. In that case the medical superintendent who said that the man should never have been there could have given an intimation to the wife to that effect, and then if the patient were not moved in seven days he could have discharged him right away?—He could.

11,138. And should, I take it, in such a case?—Well, Sir, of course one never quite knows. A medical superintendent may say to one person, "You are a person who ought not to be here," and yet he may not care to take the onus of exercising his powers under this section where the petitioner will not act. No doubt ultimately he would, but meanwhile this interval has elapsed.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I did put a question on that point as to how many times Section 83 had been put in operation by a medical superintendent of one of the largest institutions. Perhaps at a later stage you will put that to a witness.

11,139. Chairman: Yes. Of course what one is concerned really here with is two things: first of all, is the code adequate, and, secondly, if the code be adequate, is it properly put into operation? These are the two questions which one has always to deal with in legislation. Section 83, I can well believe, is not availed of to the extent it might be. All I was putting to you for the moment was that there is at least in the law, whether it is used or not, provision whereby that gentleman could have been got out in seven days, or should have been, if he was in point of fact a recovered patient?—There is in this 1908 Report the conclusion that the Royal Commission came to, viz., that the real effect of the statutory provisions is that the person is returnable at the instance of the person who lodged him; but really the working of the Act is that the petitioner should be the person to free the patient, and that, no doubt, is subject to Section 83, if it is ever used.

11,140. But your general criticism just now is that the fate of the patient is left too exclusively in the hands of the person who has obtained his or her incarceration, shall we call it, in the asylum?—That is so, and it works excellently if there is no ulterior object.

11,141. But there is the risk, of course, of the petitioner having an interest adverse to the patient?—There is that risk; I do not know; I think it exists perhaps more than one would suspect.

11,142. Of course there is this element to consider, apart altogether from what one might call the more sinister motive, of having a pecuniary or financial interest, which is something of course quite apart; there is the other, which one might call the social element. Take the case of a wife who has had a very painful experience with her husband; she has perhaps quite properly brought about his detention in an asylum; she is told by the other relatives that he has now recovered and ought to be out. She may be not unnaturally reluctant to resume life again just because of her past experiences, and that apprehension may be the cause of the reluctance to put in operation the powers of the Act?—That is probably the explanation.

11,143. It is not a financial matter at all, necessarily, it may be a social matter?—Quite. We submit that that is a terribly unjust thing. I think that probably operates much oftener than the financial element.

11,144. The financial element is the more dramatic element and lends itself to treatment in novels; but I can well understand the case of a family which has had an alarming experience feeling reluctant to take back the person round whom all the trouble has centred. I can appreciate that that may arise?—I am afraid it is very frequent, and the only thing is that in urging the interests of a patient one has to take that into view; but it is the last thing a family very often wants, whether their experience has been alarming or not, to have anybody who has been the subject of discussion coming back into local family life.

11,145. I will agree with you that that affords no reason whatever for the detention of a person against his will after his recovery, but it may explain the reluctance to resort to the power of release, which is conferred on the petitioner?—I think it does. Then there is another question which is always arising, and that is the fear of legal proceedings. They are frequently threatened, but in practice they are not taken because the money is not available.

11,146. Mr. Jowitt: Legal proceedings by whom, against whom?—By the patient when he comes out if he thinks he was wrongfully certified, against the petitioner in the case of a private patient.

11,147. Chairman: What would be your practical suggestion upon this, Mr. Parker?—The suggestion we make is that there should be an additional power of discharge vested in the judicial authority—that is to say, that you should have a quick application to the local judicial authority to investigate and to discharge.

11,148. At whose instance do you contemplate that application should be made?—At the instance of the patient or his friends.

11,149. The patient involves difficulties, of course, does it not?—Of course it may. Mr. Stewart points out to me that if the patient had an authorised representative he would be available for this particular purpose, but at any rate for the patient's friends we consider that would be a very valuable provision.

11,150. Mr. Jowitt: Logically, you would leave it that the person on whose petition the reception order was made had the right at any rate to procure the discharge of the lunatic at any time?—Certainly, because that operates, no doubt, quite well in the large majority of cases. We are dealing with the opposite class of case where the petitioner is not anxious to exercise the right, and we say there should be some definite alternative.

11,151. Chairman: You do not want the patient's fate to be entirely in the hands of the petitioner?—That is so.

11,152. There is, of course, in sub-section (3) of Section 72 a provision which is of some little importance: "If there is no person qualified to direct the discharge of a patient under this section, or no person able or willing to act, the Commissioners may order his discharge." If you had a petitioner who was recalcitrant altogether, and would take no action, that would be "no person willing to act." I do not know whether that means willing to act as petitioner; probably it does. It does not necessarily mean a petitioner unwilling to do his duty?—That follows on sub-section (2), the right of substitution of a person, if the petitioner is dead.

11,153. Mr. Jowitt: Of course, the combined effect of Sections 72 and 83 is this, that if you get an unwilling petitioner, a man who ex hypothesi has perfectly recovered is detained against his will for at least seven days?—Yes, and much longer.

11,154. But at least seven days?—At least seven days, I agree.

11,155. Mr. Micklem: Section 72 does not throw any onus on the petitioner to demand discharge, does it? It only gives him a right whether the patient has recovered, or has not recovered?—It gives him the right.

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,156. But it does not throw any onus upon him?—No. I wish I could give you this reference here. I will look it up. I think the conclusion came to by the 1908 Commission was that in practice the procedure was that the petitioner was the moving spirit, and that these other clauses are not exercised. They are there, I agree.

11,157. But, prima facie, the petitioner would not be inclined to move unless he was so instructed by the medical superintendent. He would have no information before him?—I rather understood that the basis of the Act was that the petitioner should visit at intervals and use his own discretion as to the point at which he should remove the patient.

11,158. Chairman: Of course, this Section 72 covers, not only cases where the patient has recovered, but cases where the patient has not recovered?—Exactly. I thought the petitioner was to be in a position to exercise his own discretion as to the point at which he would remove a patient, whether he was recovered or not.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Unless Section 74 comes in.

Chairman: That is the barring certificate.

Witness: Yes, that is the veto.

11,159. But one is considering for the moment what duties are involved in regard to a patient of that sort. As Mr. Micklem points out quite properly Section 72 is really an empowering section. It empowers the petitioner to procure the release of a private patient; but, looking at it from the point of view of the patient, who has the duty to discharge that patient when recovered? As far as that is concerned, I think Section 83 seems to be the section that is applicable. Section 72 does not impose a duty upon anybody; it confers a right?—That is so.

11,160. Therefore the real safeguard for the private patient under the existing code seems to reside in Section 83, and in Section 83 alone, does it not?—I agree; under the statute that is the position and that is why we are so anxious to find out to what extent in practice this Section 83 is availed of. We can only give you the information as far as we go, that it is seldom availed of, if at all.

11,161. But that again assumes recovery on the part of the patient. Section 72 deals with the case where the patient may not have recovered but may still be released by the petitioner. Now the cases are different. A patient may not have recovered, but may nevertheless be quite a fit and proper case for discharge, in the sense of discharge to the care of relatives; that we have in another context. Do you contemplate that there should be this application to the justice, not only in cases of recovery, but in cases where the patient, although not recovered, might be discharged to the care of friends?—We do, because in many of these cases you are dealing with moneyed people, and it does seem to me if they reach a point in their recovery where they can be treated privately, and a judicial authority reviews those facts, and there is no danger to the public or anything of that sort, that would be the proper course to pursue in the interests of the patient. You would hasten his recovery by putting him in more congenial surroundings.

11,162. There are difficulties there, you see. Because, if not recovered, then he could not be kept in a nursing home for gain at present, because he would be a person of unsound mind; and if the relatives said "We really cannot undertake his care" (they might say so quite legitimately, they might not have the means at their disposal, or they might say so from a reluctance to have the anxiety of his care)—what would one do in that case, assuming a man has enough means to receive private treatment outside an institution?—I suppose factors such as that would be eminently ones for the judicial authority to consider. I do not think you can legislate for them; they would turn on the facts of each case.

11,163. I mean the unrecovered patient must be taken to some place of care, obviously. You cannot let loose the unrecovered patient on society plainly; therefore there must be some method for providing for the continued treatment of that patient, and that seems to be obtainable only in two places, either in a nursing home, or in the private home of the patient himself or his relatives?—If one contemplates that these After Care Associations will grow there will be an outlet there possibly. When you talk of the unrecovered patient, I was rather considering the man who may not be technically recovered, but has very much improved; perhaps you mean by the man who has recovered that the man is in the same condition as when he went in.

11,164. He might be a case, although properly certifiable, who might nevertheless be harmless, and if there was a proper environment for him he might be kept at home?—Quite.

11,165. But you cannot compel relatives, of course, to undertake the duty of care?—No, we are not suggesting that they should. We are suggesting rather the case of a patient who has the means himself, and that, if proper provision can be made for his particular state of health at that moment, the judicial authority obviously is the person to make it.

11,166. At any rate your main criticism upon this part of the statute is that it leaves the private patient too exclusively in the hands of the petitioner?—I think we go further, and say entirely in the hands of the petitioner.

11,167. Mr. Jowitt: In practice?—In practice.

Sir David Drummond: Is it not reasonable to assume that in practice nearly always the petitioner, the relative, would be guided by the medical superintendent, as in any case of illness?

Chairman: I should think, Sir David, he would be guided by the medical superintendent on the medical question of recovery or non-recovery, but not as to whether he wanted the person home or not.

Sir David Drummond: But the question would be put to the medical superintendent, "Are you quite sure there is no danger?" and the medical superintendent might be cautious and say "I am not quite sure but I think so." That will happen in the great majority of cases; therefore it is conceivable that the relatives would decline to take the responsibility.

11,168. Chairman: Of course, Mr. Parker says he has in view at the moment not the general case, because in the general case fortunately the petitioner is very anxious to get the patient home again if recovery has taken place; but he is contemplating now a case where there may be motives operating the other way. I have put it rightly, have I not, Mr. Parker?—I think so. One has to bear this in mind in the case Sir David raises, that of course in these licensed houses there may be motives operating which will prevent the medical superintendent from pressing a point of that sort.

11,169. That is the financial interest?—The financial interest.

11,170. That, of course, one can imagine, but I think we have been rather impressed with the circumstance that the accommodation in licensed houses just now is so limited that, so far from there being a desire on the part of the medical superintendents of those institutions to get more patients, the difficulty rather is to accommodate the patients there are. They are rather like hotel keepers who have too many applications for their rooms. That may be due to the fact that, although the population has increased, the licensed houses have diminished, as you know?—Perhaps later on we may give you our views on licensed houses.

Mr. Jowitt: May I just ask this with regard to Section 83? Miss Symons points out that it applies to every manager of a hospital and licensed house. Does it not apply to asylums?

Chairman: No.

Mr. Jowitt: Why is that?

Chairman: "Hospital" is defined under the statute. I think that the code dealing with the discharge of pauper patients is different.

Mr. Jowitt: I do not see why it should be. It does remain a remarkable thing I think. Under

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Section 83 in the case of a petitioner who will not help, the doctor makes up his mind that the time has come when the patient has recovered, and yet he has got to keep him shut there for at least a further seven days.

Chairman: That is so in the case of patients in hospitals and licensed houses. In the case of patients in asylums Section 77 provides for their discharge by the visitors.

Mr. Jowitt: That, I suppose, is forthwith.

Chairman: Forthwith. Then you have Section 73, which puts the Poor Law authority practically in the position of the petitioner with reference to a private patient.

Witness: As Mr. Jowitt says Section 83 rather points out that the petitioner is in the possession of extraordinary power. He has to be notified, and the patient may not be let out until the petitioner is notified.

11,171. Chairman: There is no doubt that the scheme of the Act is to confine to the petitioner practically the control of the destinies of the patient?—Absolutely.

11,172. Subject to this (again one must carry as many of the provisions in one's mind as one can), that of course, in a licensed house the patients are kept for gain, and if a patient has recovered and the owner of the licensed house continues to keep the patient there for gain, he is contravening one of the cardinal provisions of the Act?—Yes.

11,173. And he has to look after himself there and take his risks of that?—Yes.

11,174. Then you refer to Section 73, which we have already mentioned. It is enough to say there probably that the Poor Law authority is in the position of the petitioner in relation to the pauper patient, and may order the discharge.—That is the position, and both sections are subject to Section 74, which is the right of veto of the medical superintendent, and you will notice that it is confined to: "if the patient is dangerous and unfit to be at large."

11,175. You draw attention to a point of some importance, the money question. The patient on discharge, of course, will find himself in the ordinary case without means if a receiver has been appointed. He is discharged, and until he is reinvested in his estate he is practically penniless?—That is so. We were not sure whether it was in your Terms of Reference, but we wanted to put it before you, that in practice the procedure of obtaining possession again at this stage is a very slow one, and as far as our evidence goes the allowances given are extremely meagre. Of course you have the case of Mr. H. in mind; he had money from his club. In another case which occurred very recently, I think, the Master offered £1 or something; it was a small estate of £200 or £300, and under pressure, and a lot of arguing, it was ultimately raised to £3. Of course that is quite inadequate.

11,176. At present, where the estate is taken charge of by a receiver the patient's money is applied by the receiver for the benefit of the patient. If he is in a licensed house the charges are paid by the receiver?—That is so.

11,177. What you contemplate, I take it, is that upon his being discharged recovered, he should be entitled to call for payments from the receiver out of his own estate until the formal re-investing takes place?—Yes. Even if those payments were to come out of capital, he is in urgent need of money, obviously, and the procedure is rather cumbersome at present, and the decision is very strict apparently.

11,178. But suppose he was a patient in a licensed house where the receiver was paying five guineas a week for him. I should have thought there would have been very little difficulty in his getting the five guineas a week when he recovered, by intimating to the receiver that the payment, instead of being made to the keeper of the licensed house should be made to himself?—I am afraid we have not enough evidence upon that point to be of assistance.

11,179. It is a practical point, of course?—It is.

11,180. Because it is concerned with the rehabilitation of the patient as a member of society. We are assuming he has recovered; he is going out into the world again, and he is naturally in rather a difficult position, because his estates are in the hands of a receiver. Some provision should plainly be made for his maintenance during that time until he gets control of his property once more. However, I think we need not explore that with you, because we propose later on to call some evidence from the Master's Department. It has only this bearing, I think, upon the Terms of Reference, that we are concerned with the discharge of patients, and I think we are concerned incidentally to see that the patient is discharged under circumstances that are for the benefit of the patient; it is only in that rather remote way that we are concerned with it, and we shall have some evidence upon it.—Perhaps if you are going into that, we might put in a memorandum giving you some instances on that point.

11,181. If you would; there is no difficulty in doing that, I take it. Then, on the barring certificate, Section 74, I suppose you really cannot criticise that; there must be in somebody a discretion to say whether the person can or cannot be discharged under Sections 72 and 73.—We think that would be quite well met if you had the judicial authority functioning as well, because then his opinion would become purely a matter of evidence.

11,182. It is a little alarming to contemplate that the justice might be permitted to overrule the decision of the doctor in charge of the case. Suppose the doctor certified, as he has got to do in writing, that in his opinion his patient was unfit to be at large, does your confidence in the justice go so far that you think he might quite well say to the medical superintendent, "I do not agree with you"?—What we feel all through is this, that the opinion of the judicial authority will, and always must, vary from the opinion of the medical authority. The medical authority is trying to establish an ideal, the legal authority in our opinion is taking a practical view, and is prepared to take a practical risk; and that is the difficulty that we see all through, that the two standards will always be dissimilar. We think in the interests of the patient, and the liberty of the subject, on all these questions that the practical standard is the one that should prevail, that a slight risk should be taken.

11,183. If we read on, in Section 74 you will see that the barring certificate is not absolutely autocratic?—It is qualified.

11,184. And observe there is just what you desire, though possibly not in the form you desire it; but there is a provision for the intervention of what one may call the lay mind, because it is qualified by this, "unless two of the visitors of the asylum" (these are the men of the world that you want) "or the Commissioners visiting the hospital or house, or the visitors of the house, or in the case of a single patient, one of the Commissioners, after the certificate has been produced, consent in writing to the patient's discharge." So the medical superintendent may say, "I certify this patient as dangerous and unfit to be at large," and nevertheless two laymen, visitors of the asylum, may consent in writing to his discharge?—Again we come to the practical point: Is this ever exercised? We say in practice it is not.

11,185. We must keep our minds clear of the distinction between the existing code and its exercise?—That is the reason we want the outside authority. We believe that the relation of the visitors to their superintendent must be such that they are entirely guided by his opinion. They do not exercise an independent authority, and it is for that reason we say if you get a fresh mind coming in you get a different state of things.

11,186. Mr. Jowitt: But surely on a point of time this is the right machinery. Under Section 72 the petitioners would have the right to demand the discharge of a lunatic, and you must have the medical superintendent who is on the spot able to put a stop order on the discharge until you call in somebody whose visit may take some time to arrange?—Yes.

11,187. But really you accept the machinery in Section 74, but you want to substitute for the visitors to the asylum the judicial authority?—I prefer to say add a judicial authority, because if there was a judicial authority in the background we think it would be a spur, a certain incentive to the visiting committee to function freely.

11,188. Earl Russell: Adding by way of appeal to the persons named at the end of the section?—We have not contemplated an appeal. Mr. Stewart asks me to read this section from his case: "Subject to modifications in detail the following is in rough outline the procedure suggested as appropriate for insuring fair play to alleged lunatics at the hearing before the judicial authority. The patient or his authorised adviser, together with any person seeking to show cause for or against the granting of an order absolute, shall be entitled to be heard, subject to the right of the patient or his authorised representative to inspection of all entries in the case book relating to the patient and to cross-examine adverse witnesses, and to call medical or other witnesses (if available) to depose to facts relevant to the question of his mental state, and to make such comments as may properly be made concerning documents produced in evidence. The judicial authority shall be entitled to address such questions to witnesses as he may think proper, and after hearing all the available evidence, may either make a 'rule absolute' or dismiss the application for the same as to him seems proper." That is a summary of the judicial authority functioning as such, if the case ever reaches that point.

11,189. Chairman: I have a little difficulty in seeing why the justice of the peace would be more effective here than two of the visitors. No doubt he would be a different person. But the justices of the peace are chosen from just the same class of people as the visitors come from. The visitors are members of the local authority, county councillors, or borough councillors?—Yes.

11,190. The justice of the peace is, after all, generally chosen from very much the same class of people. Why do you think he would be a more efficient person to have this power than the visitor would be?—We think so, because at present we do not think the visitors function under this section at all.

11,191. That I can understand.—As an ideal, if you could insure the visitors functioning, we should say at once that they are just as competent as a justice of the peace, but if you get with a justice of the peace an open judicial proceeding in the background, a sort of court of appeal, we believe that that would be very valuable in making the visitors function.

11,192. Mr. Micklem: May I put this to you: In this particular case of Section 74 the petitioner requires the person of unsound mind to be handed over to him?—Yes, in the case of a private patient.

11,193. Yes. The medical officer says, "No, he is not in a fit and proper condition; he is dangerous and unfit to be at large." The petitioner thereupon would immediately apply to two of the visitors, or to a Commissioner, and he would say, "This man should be handed over to me; I am prepared to make these arrangements for him and take care of him. I want you to consider whether I am not to have him." Do you say, in that case, the visitors or the Commissioner would not properly function?—We have no cases before us in our limited number of cases in which discharge arises in that way. It seems to be entirely in the hands of the medical superintendent; and if he is adverse we do suggest that the members of the visiting committee very seldom take an opposite view, and we should like that tested.

11,194. This is the case where the petitioner and the medical officer are at variance, and the petitioner calls in the visitors or a Commissioner to assist him.—And they go straight to the medical superintendent, and all you get is his view repeated—he has not thought that patient fit for discharge himself.

11,195. Would you get any more if you had a justice of the peace?—Yes, we should get that outside view to which we attach so great importance.

11,196. Chairman: If the whole machinery which you contemplate of a judicial investigation were initiated, I could understand some different results might follow; but if it is merely exchanging the visitor for the justice of the peace as the person who is to decide, it does not seem to me you would get very much further.—We do not say exchange; we say add.

11,197. You add a great deal there about the cross-examination of witnesses, and so on, all of which suggests the paraphernalia of a court of appeal.—That is really what we suggest: the judicial authority should be here, and if these people do not function, there should be an outside court of appeal, quite apart from the permanent officials of the asylum. It is a question of principle.

11,198. Sir Ernest Hiley: Does Mr. Parker suggest that the justice of the peace would be more efficient in this case than he is with regard to certification, because it is complained he is not efficient with regard to certification; is it likely he would be more efficient when it comes to discharge?—We say he is not efficient under the present procedure; that the procedure should be more properly judicial; that at present it is administrative.

11,199. Earl Russell: Before we leave these sections I would like to put to you another view of it. It has always seemed to me that the principle in Section 72 and Section 73 is wrong, by which the patient is regarded as the private prisoner of the petitioner, and the petitioner has power to take him away without any reason assigned and put him somewhere else. It may be that the petitioner is either hostile or careless or a brutal person and wants worse treatment, or wants to have the patient himself in his own house when it is not right that the patient should be there. What do you say with regard to that?—I think before you came in we had been discussing that point at some length.

Earl Russell: I am sorry if I am putting something to you which has already been discussed.

Chairman: The view taken by Lord Russell was that to confide the entire control of the destiny of the patient to the petitioner is unfortunate unless you have adequate safeguards.

Earl Russell: It had rather occurred to me that instead of the barring certificate it should be done the other way about.

11,200. Chairman: You know there is the other point, Mr. Parker, there is the other class of relative who wants to get his weak-minded relation out of the asylum and into his own charge, into his own power. You know these things do occur?—We realise that, if I may say so, very fully. There are such a number of cases that we have been driven back to the same argument, that you must have an authority which will go into each case on its merits and weigh up the evidence. I think that is an additional argument for a judicial authority to come in.

11,201. Sir Humphry Rolleston: There is a point, I think, which lies at the bottom of that, and that is that Mr. Parker is extremely anxious to avoid any abuse on the part of the medical superintendent, and he says that in order to attain that object it is desirable to have an enquiry quite apart from the superintendent. The medical superintendent will know the case, either directly or from information received from the medical officers under him, who are constantly looking after the patient; is it conceivable that an enquiry without any reference to the medical superintendent would really be in any way adequate—because a patient may be perfectly sound in mind for a certain time, but it is known to those who are watching that at times he becomes violently homicidal?—In that connection I was rather struck with Dr. Barham's evidence, because he told the Commission quite frankly that he was largely guided by the views of his doctors. He did not pretend that he could deal with all the patients himself. It occurred to me then that if he is simply weighing evidence, he might quite well weigh that evidence in collaboration with a judicial authority. It becomes purely a question of evidence. The medical view is put forward in one case; in the case we put before you, we say just as the lay authority is involved in certification so he should also be called in in the question of the discharge, and that they should collaborate together and reach a decision.

11,202. I think I misunderstood you in using the words, "quite apart from the medical superintendent"?—I quite recognise that the medical view would have to go fully before the judicial authority.

11,203. Chairman: I think Mr. Parker's view involved this, that the medical superintendent, or the particular subordinate medical officer in charge of the case, should certainly contribute to the investigation. I do not think you excluded that at all?—Not for one moment.

11,204. You rather meant that instead of their having, what one would call the control of the situation, they should be rather contributors to the decision of an independent body?—That is so.

11,205. With direct evidence?—Is the decision to be purely medical, or is there to be a lay element in it; that is the issue.

11,206. Mr. Jowitt: I think, in practice, unless you get as the judicial authority a man with experience or expert knowledge, you would always find him completely bound down inevitably by the opinion of the medical expert. You will not get the ordinary justice of the peace to take the responsibility of differing from what the doctor says?—I am afraid, up to a point, that is a very strong probability.

11,207. And the only way you would get over that would be by getting somebody who has sufficient experience or expert knowledge, to act off his own bat?—Subject to this qualification, that if you get publicity, that is a very great spur, and of course we should suggest there should be a representative in charge of this man all through who would draw out the necessary evidence.

11,208. Earl Russell: But take the case that was put to you: supposing it is said by the medical superintendent "Although this man looks very sane now, he is homicidal, and he will be homicidal again," no judicial authority (however strong a man he was) is going to take the responsibility of saying "I will let him go"?—I quite agree, but what percentage of cases would that cover? As far as my information goes with regard to homicidal cases the percentage is very very small.

11,209. But what percentage of cases do you think a medical superintendent keeps now that would otherwise be discharged? Put it the other way?—I am not going to give a percentage, but from the class of case we get I think it is considerable.

Sir Ernest Hiley: Is it suggested that there should be a public enquiry?

11,210. Chairman: We are just back again to the topic which we discussed at such great length with regard to certification. You advocated the optional publicity of the proceedings, and I am bound to say that that part of your evidence did not carry with me personally so much conviction as many of the other things you have told us, because it seems to me that publicity is the very thing people want to avoid in this matter. We have heard a great deal about the stigma of insanity, but surely the publication of the stigma to all and sundry, which would be involved in public proceedings either at certification or discharge, would be exceedingly unfortunate?—May I just make this comment, that if insanity is to pass, as we are led to suppose, into a much less terrible thing, and we are to do away with the stigma by various means, I think I can conceive its becoming not of very great public interest to the Press. I do think that the feelings of the relatives ought not to be allowed to weigh with the freedom of the individual. That is the point we are on.

11,211. Sir Ernest Hiley: Is it not rather the well-being of the individual?—Of course there again we are supposing that a man is reasonably sane, and wants to get out. Of course the case you are putting is of a person who is insane and wants to get out.

11,212. Chairman: A very common inhabitant of the asylum, as we know?—The great majority, I agree. I am afraid we have to face that comment, that we are dealing all the time with the percentage who are wrongfully detained.

11,213. It may be actually a feature of the patient's disorder that he courts publicity; there is a certain attraction to unbalanced minds in seeing their names in the newspapers; even to well balanced minds I have heard it is not entirely unattractive; and to a person who is egocentric (and one knows the egocentric idea is a very common feature of mental disorder) to have headlines in the newspaper might be quite attractive. But the disastrous results might be obvious, because the patient would become excited, stimulated by all the surroundings which you have described, and the excitement of cross-examination, and so on; and the result is that you would have a considerable amount of sensationalism imported into the case, and the patient, at the end of it, might possibly, to put it colloquially, just go off the deep end. That is quite possible in human frailty?—I am afraid it is quite possible in a large number of cases.

11,214. You could have a gentleman very anxious to have publicity, and it might occupy a good deal of public time among other things, and he would very far from benefit from such procedure—the class of person whose case you are figuring. A man who is really sane, and who can take a balanced view of the situation would probably very much prefer that his case should be taken in private, I imagine?—That is why we say it should be at his option. We say the difficulty is that publicity might be used by the wrong type of man.

11,215. Exactly. In that case you would be bound to say it is by discretion?—Mr. Stewart says the authorised representatives, or perhaps the judicial authority.

11,216. Earl Russell: I do not think you need be afraid of the small number. If you can satisfy us that people are wrongfully detained, I am sure we are all anxious to do everything possible to avoid it. It is not the small number that will stop it?—You will see that from the evidence we are going to submit.

11,217. Chairman: Now this judicial authority who is to be invoked is, I gather, to be a person who has an additional power of discharge over and above the existing power of discharge?—That is the proposal we make.

11,218. When you talk of him being additional, is he to be by way of appeal from the existing persons, or is he to be independent of them?—By way of appeal only.

11,219. I want to know how you contemplate it. You say there should be an additional power of discharge vested in the judicial authority. Now is he simply to be added to the persons operating under Section 72, or is it to be an appeal from the persons who are contemplated by Section 72?—I think it would be quite sufficient if it were made an alternative.

11,220. Earl Russell: But then you would not bring him in if the visitors had functioned or failed to function?—If they failed to function, then the patient or his friends would have access, and in the summary of points in the last section of my précis we add this point. "That any person having reasonable cause to suppose that any person is wrongfully detained and swearing an affidavit to that effect may be entitled to a hearing before the judicial authority."

Mr. Jowitt: If it is alternative, and the visiting committee have affirmed the decision of the medical superintendent, then there is no room for the judicial authority.

11,221. Earl Russell: That is your trouble; he will not come in at all?—Then it must be additional, by way of appeal.

Mr. Walter Stewart: In our case it is put as additional, but subject to a time limit; it would not be reasonable to have these proceedings, perhaps, once every three months. Perhaps once a year is suggested.

11,222. Chairman: That is not quite the point. Under Section 74 the relative, let us say, has applied to have the patient restored to him. The doctor says: "This patient is dangerous and unfit to be at large." At the present moment he can approach two visitors of the asylum, and ask them to consent, notwithstanding what the medical superintendent has said, to the discharge of the patient. Do you contemplate that the option should be given to that person to go instead to a justice of the peace rather than to two visitors of the asylum and say: "Now will you order the discharge of this patient," or do you contemplate he should go, in the first instance, to the two visitors, and on the two visitors having turned down the application, resort then to the justice to obtain a reversal of the decision of the two visitors?—Undoubtedly the latter. It would be an appeal, would it not?

11,223. Yes?—That is really an appeal.

11,224. Sir David Drummond: Do I understand you to say that you have never known the visitors function independently of the medical superintendent?—I meant to say this: within the limited number of cases we have dealt with, I do not recall one in which we know the visiting committee has functioned. Of course, obviously they must function frequently.

11,225. Earl Russell: Sir David and I can give you half a dozen cases from our own knowledge where they have gone flat against the advice of the medical superintendent?—That is very interesting.

11,226. Chairman: For the moment this is only on the question of the barring certificate, whether the visitors overrule the barring certificate, and of that you have not had experience?—No, but quite frankly I want to say that our cases are so limited that we cannot suggest a general principle on that limited number of cases. We ask you to address your questions to it, to find out from other witnesses. We do not know, and we have no means of finding out.

11,227. Besides, quite apart from individual cases, I think, if I may say so, the value of your evidence is the criticism of the code. If you can show that there are possibilities of abuse, apart altogether from whether you can prove that those abuses are real, it is relevant?—Yes.

11,228. But I think we may pass from that now to the utilisation of Section 79, which is the discharge of pauper patients to the care of relatives. That is a very useful provision, as we know, and in this case I think it is taken advantage of to a considerable extent, is it not?—Yes.

11,229. We have heard that in evidence?—You see there again this section is permissive, and if you compare it with Section 22, which is the same sort of procedure, as an alternative to certification, the language there is rather different. It says: "nothing in this Act shall prevent a relation or friend from retaining or taking the lunatic under his own care." Here it is much more permissive, and we think it might with advantage be strengthened.

11,230. Surely there must be an element of discretion in the exercise of the powers of Section 79 also?—Of course, there again it is a question of principle. Prior to certification, in Section 22 there is no such limitation.

Earl Russell: But it might be an undesirable friend in every way.

11,231. Mr. Micklem: There is a limitation, Mr. Parker, in Section 22: It is "nothing in this Act shall prevent a relation or friend from retaining or taking the lunatic under his own care if a justice having jurisdiction to make the order, or the visitors of the asylum in which the lunatic is, or is intended to be placed, shall be satisfied that proper care will be taken of the lunatic"?—Yes, that of course, is in both sections, and we say that in the second section which we are considering, Section 79, if the judicial authority is satisfied, then nothing shall prevent it.

11,232. Chairman: I see you merely mean this, that if the visitors are satisfied that the lunatic shall be no longer chargeable to any union, county or borough, and are also satisfied that he will be properly taken care of and prevented from doing injury to himself, then on their being satisfied on both those matters, they ought to discharge?—They ought to. Use the phraseology of the other section.

11,233. That does assume that they have applied their judgment to the question of whether he will be properly taken care of?—We wanted just to call attention to the dissimilarity of the two provisions.

11,234. Earl Russell: You want to put "shall" instead of "may if they think fit"?—Yes, or the wording of the other section.

Chairman: You may put it that the two visitors, upon being satisfied of certain things, shall discharge?

Earl Russell: Yes.

11,235. Chairman: I do not know that there is much probably in that. Then Section 75 relates to the discharge by Commissioners?—Yes, and the only comment we make on that is that the same power of discharge should be vested in the judicial authority. If the proposals are acceptable that would follow, possibly.

11,236. Then we have already referred, I think, to Section 77; but that section, and Section 78, both relate to the general methods of discharge, in the one instance from asylums, and in the other from licensed houses by visitors?—That is the general method, and I do not think I need repeat there what I said just now, that we do not think that the visitors do function as fully as they are intended to under the statute; but that is a question of fact, of course.

11,237. Something could be done, could it not, by regulations, making the visitation more effective, and enabling a patient as of right to have access to the two visitors, or three visitors, as the case may be, at reasonable intervals, and to state his case to them?—Yes. That comes in again, of course, under Section 188, the next section.

11,238. We might just pass to that, if you please?—Sections 188 and 193.

11,239. This is the large question of visitation, and may I take it at the outset that the general criticism you make is that the visitation, which is intended to keep the patient in contact with the outside world, is liable in practice to prove ineffective, because the visitation is liable to become perfunctory?—That is so, both the visitation by the visitors, and, of course, the annual visitation, the other form, by the visiting Commissioners; and we do attach very great importance to this. If I may refer, first of all, to what the last Royal Commission said, I think it perhaps would be of assistance.

11,240. If you please?—First of all, section 654, page 217 of the Report of 1908, I should like, if I may, to give you the Commission's view of the visit, and then to read you an attendant's view of the visit, and then a patient's view, and that will put before you, what in fact does happen on these occasions.

11,241. First of all, we accept the principle that visitation is a most important safeguard?—Intended by the statute to be the most important safeguard.

11,242. The question is whether it is accomplishing that object?—Yes.

11,243. And you are now going to give us some criticisms upon the way in which visitations are

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

carried out in practice, and how the system may be improved?—Yes. In Section 654, at the bottom of page 217, there is Dr. Needham's description of a visit: "It is always a surprise visit. We go into the asylum and we see the superintendent and we hand in a schedule of particulars which we ask to have filled up with reference to the admission of patients and changes that have taken place amongst the patients since the last visit, the number of deaths, causes of death, and matters of that kind, mechanical restraint, seclusion, and a number of particulars. That has to be done by the clerk, and by the medical officers while we are inspecting; we also inquire as to the number of attendants who have left, and a number of matters of that kind. Then we go round the wards. We go into each ward, and as we go in we see the charge nurse. We are accompanied by the medical superintendent and the assistant medical officers, and by the matron or by the head attendant. We take down in each ward the number of patients, the number of attendants, the number of patients who are epileptic, and the number of patients who are suicidal, and the number of patients who are in bed. Then we proceed to count all the patients in the ward, so as to make the numbers tally with the number given to us. Then we go round each ward, walking slowly from patient to patient, and giving every patient the opportunity of speaking to us, many of the patients availing themselves of that opportunity. If a complaint is made to us we investigate the complaint." And then he says they go into the committee room, and write their report. We believe the suggestion is that the Commissioners investigate anything up to 600 cases each a day, and if you turn to the opposite page, there is a very important bit of evidence that was given by Sir George Savage before this Commission. Towards halfway down Section 654 he says: "I may say the visitation by Commissioners, when they talk of being able to see 800 patients in a day, although a large proportion are weakminded, must mean very imperfect visitation; periodically I go to a lot of these private asylums and hospitals, and if one sees 30 or 40 in a day and really takes any interest or notice of their progress, it is as much as one can do. As for seeing 600 or 800 patients no one can do that in justice to them, it seems to me." And then he goes on to make a very valuable suggestion that with a view to preparing a case to come before the Commissioners on that visit they should send down a clerk—he says "a clerk from the Commission should verify the cases of the patients and should ask them if they wish to make any complaint." That is beforehand, so that the case may be ready for the Commissioners when they come, and the Commission itself rather adopted that view. They say this in section 661: "The inspection of the insane is unlike much other inspection, as it is necessarily liable at any moment to involve a minute and expert investigation of the cases of individuals. It must, therefore, be very laborious and exacting. Partly for that reason alone, it is inevitable that there should be a large delegation of detailed work to others than the Commissioners themselves, perhaps on the lines suggested by Dr. Savage; and certainly the terms of the Lunacy Act in regard to visitation should be reconsidered." That is their finding.

11,244. Earl Russell: The object of this visit which Sir George Savage comments on there is not to find out whether the patients are sane, is it? It is to give them an opportunity to make complaints and of speaking to the Commissioners?—I agree.

11,245. I mean you can give 300 people an opportunity of making complaints much more quickly than you can find out what their mental condition is?—Yes, but any serious complaint that is made would require investigation, and would receive it up to a point. If I may, I am now going to put before you an ex-attendant's view of visitation. This is a man who had been twenty years in a very big registered hospital in the Midlands, and, as far as one can judge, his views are entitled to be heard, at any rate.

11,246. Chairman: I have read a good many accounts. I have read Dr. Lomax's book and his account of visitation, and I have also read other accounts.—I hope I am not wasting your time.

11,247. Not at all. Let us have it if it is comparatively short.—It is one page, Sir. He said this: "Whenever the Commissioners called at the County Asylum, we would be advised by telephone and make our arrangements for their reception. If they called upon us first, we would advise the County Asylum. We would generally have sufficient warning as the word would quickly be passed round the wards. As head attendant" (he was head attendant for 14 years at this place) "I would see that all the lavatories were cleaned up and paper put in, that tooth brushes, brushes and combs, were put out (seldom seen at other times). The patients dressed up in their best clothes and tidied up, sometimes a special attendant put to look after a troublesome patient and keep him tidy for inspection. The side rooms would all be emptied (wherever possible) then cleaned out and disinfected, all the doors left open. The Commissioners would usually stay a little time in the medical superintendent's office, partaking of a little light refreshment after their journey. This would give more time for everything to be put in order. Moreover, the Commissioners would always visit the convalescent or best wards first, thus giving every opportunity to put the worst wards in order. The medical superintendent would always accompany the Commissioners, with whom he always appeared to be on the most friendly terms, laughing and cracking jokes together. To prevent any shortage of staff being discovered and to create a good impression, attendants would sometimes be quickly transferred from a ward which the Commissioners had inspected to another to be inspected by them. They never seemed to observe that this had been done. Several of the Lunacy Commissioners had been medical superintendents themselves and were able to turn the Nelsonic blind eye. Owing to the medical superintendent not knowing many of the patients personally, he took care to always have the charge attendant of the ward or myself at his elbow. If the Commissioners asked any question concerning any patient we would at once whisper the desired information to the medical superintendent. The Lunacy Commissioners would walk through the wards, stopping to converse briefly with any patient that desired to speak to them. If a patient expressly asked for a private interview it would be granted to him" (this is a private patient, not a pauper patient) "but very few patients would ask for this, and they would generally be the old more or less hopeless cases."

11,248. Earl Russell: I thought you said this was a county asylum?—A registered hospital. He referred to a county asylum as 'phoning them to say when the Commissioners were coming: "Most of the patients seemed to be afraid to speak to the Commissioners in the presence of the medical superintendent. I consider the visits of the Commissioners a farce, because they appear to depend on the medical superintendent. I have never known anything to result from patients' complaints to the Commissioner except with reference to the heating of the rooms, which on one occasion was almost below zero when the Commissioners came. This was immediately remedied. The reports, with very slight exceptions, were always very favourable to the institution, and the superintendent would laughingly express his satisfaction concerning same to me. I do not consider that the visits of the Lunacy Commissioners afford any real protection to the patients. There is in fact no really independent tribunal to whom they can appeal. Whichever way they turn, they meet supporters of the system. I consider it essential that some such independent legal tribunal should be appointed, to which both the patients (and the attendants) can appeal."

11,249. Chairman: Of course that amounts to this, that there is a system of deception practised upon the Commissioners?—I am afraid it is common to all inspections in all walks of life which are supposed to be surprise inspections. Somehow or other information generally gets out beforehand.

9 February, 1925.]

11,250. Earl Russell: Is your evidence that that is general, that asylums almost always know when the Commissioners are coming?—Almost invariably. That is why I am stressing it before you, because we attach very great importance to this.

11,251. Chairman: Of course an inspection which is an inspection of something which is dressed up for the occasion is not an inspection at all. You want an inspection of the normal state of matters, not of the show state of matters?—Exactly, and that is the alarming thing about it; that our evidence, collected from so many sources, all seems to point to these sort of conditions, and it is the cumulative weight of it which at last does begin to sway one's mind.

11,252. I do not subscribe to the view that the Commissioners who visit are quite such innocent persons as the attendant suggests?—They have a very full day's work.

11,253. But the suggestion is that they are so innocent that they do not see they are being hoodwinked.

11,254. Mr. Snell: Is this man known to your organisation?—He is prepared to come here and give evidence upon oath.

11,255. And he is thought to be reliable?—I think so, from the fact that he served for 20 years in his position. I have not seen him personally.

11,256. Chairman: However, it is quite a good point to make. One thing strikes me as showing that that must be exaggerated. If you take these large institutions with anything up to 3,000 patients, as we know it is positively a community by itself. I have great difficulty in seeing how, even if the word is sent round as rapidly as possible, you can in the course of an hour or so remodel the whole administration of the place, and have everything in order for the inspection?—I do not think we should suggest that in the case of a big community.

11,257. Earl Russell: I thought your suggestion was that they had notice the day before?—In this case, yes. The Commissioners being in the neighbourhood would obviously visit one or two places.

11,258. Do you think the element of surprise would be easier if you had your local inspection? That is to say, somebody living near who would jump into a motor car and drive straight to the institution?—I think you would never know then when your Commissioner was coming. There again this question of notification is not isolated to this. You had the evidence of one medical superintendent before you as to a private asylum in Kent, and we have exactly the same evidence from there. And it is human nature; I do not doubt that it is there for one moment, and I do not think you will ever stop it.

Mr. Walter Stewart: You remember Dr. Yellowlees said that it was tried on with him, but that he would not have anything to do with it.

Witness: May I complete it with a short statement from a patient?

11,259. Chairman: Just one moment. I am just thinking over what you have been saying. It is difficult to see how you are to secure surprise visits if there is some system of espionage in operation. I do not see how you can get the surprise visit that you want?—I agree; I think it is almost impossible with the telephone nowadays; I do not see how you are going to do it at all.

Mr. Jowitt: Unless you get, as Lord Russell says, somebody who lives in the district and just walks up.

Earl Russell: If a man gets in a car in the morning they would not know he was coming.

11,260. Chairman: You know we are paying some visits ourselves. Probably you will tell us they are not surprise visits, but I think they are?—I think in your case probably they are.

11,261. We must not give evidence ourselves, of course, but I personally have paid a visit to more than one institution, and I can assure you they had not the faintest idea we were coming because the medical superintendent was not even there to receive the Chairman of the Royal Commission. I was in the reception ward within five minutes of my entering the building and I do not think I was hoodwinked in that respect?—I do not want for one moment to suggest that these big institutions are overhauled in a few hours, but I do think that the weak spots in many of them are overhauled.

11,262. Earl Russell: Patients who are dirty are cleaned up, and that sort of thing?—Yes, especially in connection with side rooms, and so on. Of course behind this there is a mass of evidence of patients being specially got up for their visiting friends and taken to other wards. I am not going to trouble you with that, I want to go to the principle. No doubt it occurs, but I do not see how you are going to stop it.

11,263. Chairman: May the reform which might at least mitigate this trouble be found in having district commissioners who would have a very much smaller area to handle, and who would be able to drop in and out of the institution much more frequently?—That is one of the bases of our suggestion, that the thing is getting too big to work from one centre.

11,264. Now give us the third party to the transaction, namely, the patient?—The patient I hope you will hear, but what he says is as follows: "The patients are seated on chairs or forms with their backs to the wall. Two gentlemen not known to any of the patients enter the ward accompanied by the medical superintendent (possibly by another medical officer) and also by the head and charge attendants." As you know of course the Commissioners rotate; these successive visits are by different Commissioners to any one institution. "The two gentlemen (Commissioners) part company, one taking one side of the room and the other the other. Without any introduction or information as to who they are, the Commissioners pass by patient after patient, either in silence or wishing them good day. Previous to their visit however there has been a general smartening up of the wards and the patients. The detached attitude usually adopted by the Commissioners and the fact that they are accompanied by the medical superintendent is calculated to create a feeling of timidity and nervousness on the part of the majority of the patients, who therefore refrained from approaching unknown officials, especially is this the case when it is recognised that by writing letters, making complaints and approaching officials a patient prejudices his prospects of discharge. If a patient rises from his seat and approaches the Commissioners they will stop, but the situation of one man standing up in the presence of 60 or 70 other patients, and all the head officials, and detailing his private affairs is very invidious and unfair. Moreover it frequently happens that more than one patient wants to speak to the Commissioner at the same time, some of whom are very excited, and noisy patients will then be told to sit down and the Commissioner will pass on. When the Commissioners are about to leave the ward some of the patients will then pluck up courage to make an appeal, the consequence being that several patients will congregate together, all trying to make their requests known at the same time, causing great confusion, in the midst of which the Commissioners walk out. All these defects might be remedied if in the first place the Commissioners were introduced upon their arrival, and an announcement made that every patient would be given an opportunity to speak to them in private. Although I was always a private patient in the first place, my maintenance being paid by my family, and on the second occasion by the Minister of Pensions" (this was an ex-soldier) "I was not given any private interview until I had made repeated requests. A private interview appeared to be an unheard of thing. Previous to my requests I do not remember any patient having a private interview. I cannot recollect any pauper patient being given a private interview."

11,265. Yes, our attention has already been drawn to that. The pauper patient has not of right the privilege of a private interview.—Of course that seems to me a very graphic description, and putting the three together, you do see that through them there is running the same type of comment, and I doubt whether the Commissioners themselves would come here and deny it if they were asked.

11,266. You have certainly told us they are over-worked, and they tell us so in their report.—Exactly.

11,267. Earl Russell: Would it frighten the patients less if the Commissioners sat like a person examining passports, and the patients are brought before them one at a time and sit opposite them at the table?—The suggestion, of course, is that a private room should be available.

11,268. Even apart from that, you might have a side room, and the Commissioners might sit in a side room. What do you think the effect upon the patient would be?—All our pleas are that there should be something less formal than many patients filing by. Of course the real substance of the complaint is that it is an appeal in the presence of the medical superintendent and the other attendants, and they do not care to make it, because unfortunately there is that impression that it reacts on them if they lodge complaints, and the only way of getting round that is that they should be entitled to make those complaints in private.

11,269. Therefore if every patient passed through a private interview with the Commissioners there would be no invidious distinction between them—a purely private interview?—That would help very considerably, undoubtedly.

11,270. Chairman: Of course, the Commissioners would need to make enquiries of the medical superintendent, would they not, after they had seen the patient, if there was any point calling for their attention?—Obviously. Of course we are not stressing these Commissioners' visits; it depends upon other matters, of course, but you want something that operates much more frequently than once in 18 months, and as bearing on that perhaps I may give you the final conclusion of this report of 1908. They come to the conclusion at the top of page 222 that "The policy of the sections referred to is to throw on the local managers—the visitors of asylums and of houses licensed by justices the duty of discharge, and . . . not upon the Commissioners." We suggest that that is really a very sound view to take, that the question of discharge is not one in which the Commissioners visiting once in 18 months can very usefully function.

11,271. On the other hand, they might function very usefully if they were persons on the spot familiar with the asylum, and who had seen the patients frequently?—I agree.

11,272. Many of your suggestions, Mr. Parker, are inter-related, are they not?—That is the difficulty.

11,273. You put forward a suggestion at one point as to the judicial authority operating more. On the other hand, the judicial authority might operate less if you had really reliable persons taking an interest in the cases and looking at them from an independent point of view. The whole question is what are the best points at which to strengthen the procedure—where will you get the most reliable safeguards?—Yes.

11,274. That is your account of visitation, and we have your criticism of it, the visitation by committees and by the Commissioners.—There is just one more point on this question of the visiting committee functioning. I want to give you just an extreme case, on page 161 of the Board of Control report, to show you that these things have substance in fact: "Some male patients informed us that they seldom saw members of the visiting committee in the wards. This matter was mentioned by our colleague in his entry two years ago, and we would draw the attention of the Committee to the provisions of Section 188 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, which requires visits by at least two members once in every two months. From the entries in the visitors' book only one member appears generally to visit at a time. Some patients also stated that they seldom saw any of the guardians of their unions, and this particularly applied to the Unions of the Isle of Sheppey and Milton." So that you see there is the Commissioners' own report on the failure of an individual committee to pay any attention to the statute. It is a continuing failure for two years.

11,275. But in justice to the Board of Control and the efficacy of their visits I am bound to say there is a lot of very useful material contained in their report. The detail with which they criticise the different institutions is very remarkable?—We want to give them full credit for that, with this comment, that of course this was the first year since the war when these details have been published, and I have not been able to find out whether such detail was ever published before. You have had three Departmental Committees in the last two years, and a great mass of detail which of course is most useful.

11,276. I am told they were published before the war, and were dropped during the war. But I have been very much impressed, upon looking at the report of 1923, with the extraordinary detail with which they have gone into these institutions, and have picked out all sorts of things which were matters for criticism; and they have assisted you very much in your case before us?—Quite. We want you to see that a great deal of our criticism is an admitted case, but when is anything going to happen?

11,277. But it rather takes off the edge of the criticism that the Board of Control is lacking in vigilance. I am surprised really how a comparatively small number of ladies and gentlemen have been able to get through this amount of work and detect so much?—But I do want to make this point, to ascertain whether that vigilance is a new found vigilance, because of the appointment of this Commission.

11,278. Earl Russell: It could not have been in 1923?—The new Commission was being pressed for then, and there was this publication of Dr. Lomax's book. I am bound to put before you that we think that did stir up life which did not exist before. Many of these things, when you come to deal with detail, you will find are recent developments; take dentistry, for instance, there has been a tremendous move to introduce dentistry in the last two years.

11,279. From whatever cause, or with whatever motive, I do not care, the point is conspicuous, I think, that the Board of Control have already, if you prefer recently, applied themselves very minutely to the very questions which you are so interested in. One cannot read this report without being impressed with that?—I quite agree, and there one wants to urge that that activity shall continue.

11,280. And do not you carry it further, that they shall not only have power to draw attention to those things, but have some power to see that redress is given?—That is the important thing.

11,281. Now will you just pass from the visits of the Commissioners and the visiting committee to the visit by the guardians. We have had the guardians' visits criticised as being of no particular importance. What do you say upon that topic—Section 201?—Shortly, the evidence we have got is just the same, that in the case of the guardians the proceedings are even more formal. They simply, as a rule, tick off the names of their patients, and it is suggested that the visit really is to see that the money they supply has been properly applied.

11,282. You notice in Section 201 there may be a medical practitioner who has the right to visit; that is rather interesting?—Yes; I noticed that recently, but some months ago I saw a guardian from Hampshire (I did not know the Act then), and he raised this very point. He said he was continually being pressed by the friends of people who had gone into these asylums to report on the case, and he said he very much wished to take one of the guardians' medical practitioners there; but he had been unable to get his way on that.

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER

11,283. "A medical practitioner appointed by the guardians of a union and also the guardians of any union shall be permitted, whenever they see fit, between 8 in the morning and 6 in the evening to visit and examine any pauper lunatic." That is an important thing if it is taken advantage of?—A very important provision.

11,284. Mr. Snell: Is it your suggestion that the guardians do not know of this provision?—I only suggest that in that particular case they obviously did not. I do not know what the general knowledge of guardians is on this.

Earl Russell: The words in the second line of this section are "and also the guardians of any union." I rather take it that means the boards of guardians. It is not quite the same as if it were any guardian of that union. If a single guardian desired to go when the others did not, he might not be admitted.

Chairman: I do not know that that means they must go en masse, does it?

Earl Russell: Supposing there were two guardians who wanted to go and the rest of the board did not go, would the two be admitted?

Chairman: I think what we heard was that in practice some of them went; they appointed some of their members to go.

Earl Russell: Yes.

Chairman: It does not indicate whether the medical practitioner could go by himself without the guardians, or whether they must go together.

Earl Russell: I think he could go by himself, because it says "also."

11,285. Chairman: Yes, I think he could go alone, if he were appointed by the guardians. Of course, one knows that the departments are in the habit of sending out circulars from time to time to local authorities where any laxity is taking place, reminding them of their powers, and exhorting them to use them. That is all that can be done by a central authority where there is a discretion given to a local authority, unless there is a complete dereliction of duty where you can proceed by a mandamus against them?—Yes.

11,286. Then leaving visitation, you refer next I see to the question of the patient's knowledge of the grounds on which he has been certified?—Would it be convenient just to interpose here before we pass to that, our views on licensed houses, which we wanted to put before you?

11,287. If you please?—They are really these, that first of all we hope this Commission will take the opportunity of ascertaining what the profits of these licensed house are; that is knowledge which is denied to the public, because they are nearly all registered as private companies, and we submit it is a very large question whether in the present state of public feeling any institute of that sort should be allowed to function for exorbitant profits; there are rumours, and these rumours are very widespread; and we want to suggest to you that it is against public policy that extravagant profits should be made out of the misfortune of individuals, and that if it is a question of compensation to vested interests that might well be considered by the State.

11,288. What is your view on the subject of licensed houses generally; do you consider they play a useful part?—Our view is that the legislature is quite right in limiting their number as they did in 1890, and we are strongly opposed to the proposals that have been put before you by the British Medical Association that they should be increased. It is very lightly touched on in their evidence, but I think Sections 47 and 77 are the references in their memorandum.

11,289. But there is this point: the legislature evidently thought in 1890 that they did perform some useful part, because they were continued, although no doubt restricted in number. Is there not room for some such institution; take the ordinary private patient of the middle upper classes who is able to pay; the surroundings and circumstances of the private house, which are reproduced to some extent in the best licensed houses, surely afford a very desirable environment for treatment?—We agree, on philanthropic lines, yes, such as Bethlem. On the lines of registered hospitals of which there are several, yes, because there are people who can pay, and if they do pay a little more money than is usual it goes to pay for poorer people; but when you come to private profit we then say it is entirely opposed to public feeling to-day.

11,290. Nobody need go to these places unless they like. You might say it is contrary to public policy that an eminent lawyer or medical practitioner should have extravagant remuneration?—That is optional, is it not?

11,291. But is it not optional to go to a licensed house?—I am afraid it is not altogether. The petitioner lodges his patient there.

11,292. Earl Russell: But you would not say, assuming you get safety, it was more morally wrong to get money out of a lunatic patient than out of a nervous patient in a nursing home?—Not more morally wrong, but the conditions are very different. If you do not like your nursing home you go out; if you do not like your private asylum you unfortunately have to stop in.

11,293. Is not the real difficulty the doubt about safety where the fees are higher?—Yes; I am afraid personally I have a very strong aversion to the idea that exorbitant profits are made out of that class of business.

11,294. People do make exorbitant profits out of other things?—You have the State interfering in other directions. Perhaps broadcasting is the most recent one, in which they say an individual shall not make enormous profits out of a monopoly of that sort; we think the same thing should apply to a business of this sort.

11,295. It is not quite the same thing, of course. There the State is letting out something that belonged to it?—I am only instancing that the State does interfere in these matters.

11,296. Because it was the State's property that was being dealt with?—True.

11,297. Mr. Snell: Is the question of excessive profit the main thing here? Is not the real difficulty that the medical proprietor has to choose whether he will forego the fee that his patient pays him, or whether he will keep him? Is not the position one of conflicting interest, which constitutes the real danger?—Yes, very frequently. That is rather a different point.

11,298. Mr. Jowitt: The larger the profit the more the interest conflicts?—Yes; the larger the profits that are permissible the less likely any institution of this sort is to afford the real benefits which the patient is entitled to receive.

11,299. Earl Russell: The greater temptation?—The greater temptation.

11,300. Sir David Drummond: What is your view as regards the sufficiency of the accommodation for private patients throughout the country?—I can only say I am surprised to hear that there is pressure on the existing places. Within my own knowledge, which is very small, there is no such pressure. I hope it will be removed by these voluntary institutes, and the other matters we have discussed. I do not think that pressure will serve any reason for extending the present places.

11,301. Earl Russell: Take a philanthropic place like "The Retreat" at York, which is not run for profit, but suppose you do not find a community of people willing to establish such places, what are you to do with those who want treatment?—We hope that need will be met by all the things we have discussed, by hospitals being made available and all the treatment prior to certification. We hope that that will relieve the pressure.

11,302. But all those things might not meet the case of a man who wants an exclusive high-class place

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

for which a large sum is paid?—I think the existing places are ample for it, because they will always make room for the high-class patients, I should think.

11,303. Chairman: That is not a very nice way of looking at it?—I am afraid we have evidence behind it; I am not making these statements lightly. You have had evidence of one sort given, and if you force me to it I am going to ask you to send to Somerset House and get the files in the case of the particular institute about which you have had evidence given.

11,304. The question is rather this: Suppose one has a relative and one wants to secure for that relative the best possible treatment. You want to get privacy, and you want to get quiet; you are able to afford it; it may be your own money you are spending, not the unfortunate patient's money at all. The father may be a wealthy man, and the daughter has no money; he is anxious to secure for her the best possible circumstances, is able to afford it, and is willing to afford it. Why should he not be entitled to go to some suitable institution and pay, if he pleases, extravagantly to secure for his daughter the surroundings he desires?—I do not think he should be prevented. But I will give you an exact case, which came within my own personal knowledge within the last few months, of a rich father who wanted those conditions for his daughter, who sent her to one of the licensed houses in London which appears to be one of the best; and I happened to be visiting somebody else down there and came across this girl shortly after she had been there. She told me herself that she was in the refractory ward, that before she had been there (I think it was) a couple of days she had been seized by the hair; she was a very strong girl and high spirited, and she said she turned round and bit the nurse. "Would not I have done the same under like circumstances?"

11,305. I do not see that is quite relevant; in that case the payment was being made and the treatment was not being got.—That is the suggestion we made—that what is being paid for is not being got, and that therefore that class of institution should not be extended, unless you have very strong evidence before you that the need exists for its extension.

11,306. Earl Russell: But does not a place get a reputation in the end which depends on its general conduct?—I do not know. My own experience is this—that the inside details of these places are only known to those who have become inmates there.

11,307. The incident you gave us looks to me like one which would cause a man to lose his good will.—It depends how widely that incident is spread.

11,308. Mr. Jowitt: That really is a safeguard, is it not? One may say there is a temptation to a barrister prima facie always to advise people to bring lawsuits or a temptation to a doctor always to advise operations. The real safeguard is that if a doctor or barrister goes on in that way for long he will lose his reputation?—Subject to this, that these statements are always discounted, because they are made by certified people. There is the difficulty.

Chairman: There is this also. One knows that a great many people have come out from institutions and they have been thoroughly satisfied with their treatment. These people say pleasant things about the care they have received, and so on, and are the best advertisers for the institution where they have been treated. Every person who comes out from treatment is not in a state of indignation, as you know; many of them fully recognise the benefits they have received, and fortunately many of the institutions are well conducted.

11,309. Mr. Snell: Is it not true to say that the West Riding County Council runs a private asylum. Have you the same sort of objections to the private asylum run under auspices of that kind?—That is not run for profit, is it?

11,310. Well, no, I suppose it pays its way?—Yes; that is quite legitimate.

11,311. Chairman: Mr. Parker says that the possibility of making large profits out of a patient exposes the management to a temptation.—That is the point. I am not suggesting for one moment that all these licensed houses have these abuses. I have several statements of patients who said they considered that the treatment was very good; but it is exactly in those institutions where the temptation proves too great that these abuses arise.

11,312. Sir David Drummond: Might we hear Mr. Parker's views upon institutions where the charges are not so great, where they are very moderate, where small fees are taken, and people are able to send their patients there?—Take an institution like Bethlem—I have not been over it; one listened to the evidence, and one could not help being very favourably impressed in that case.

11,313. Chairman: That is a registered hospital, of course?—Yes.

11,314. Sir David Drummond: What objection have you to places where moderate fees are charged? I am afraid I cannot say that I have any objection; I have no knowledge of such places.

11,315. Earl Russell: Would you object, in the case of the rich man who was willing to pay handsomely, to single care—under proper supervision, of course, of the Board of Control?—I think in many cases that would obviously be the most suitable treatment, and it is largely done to-day.

11,316. Of course, there would be the same temptation there, you know, to the doctor in charge of him?—I am afraid in all these cases one can see it is a two-edged sword.

11,317. Chairman: All that one really is concerned to see is this, that if this class of institution when well conducted supplies a public want it is desirable that there should be enough of them to meet the demand; and we have an indication that in some parts of the country when the doctor is anxious to have his patient sent to a suitable private institution, not a public institution, he has a difficulty in obtaining an admission to that institution because the numbers are now restricted; and, of course, they are gradually falling in; the tendency is to diminish that class of accommodation. I gather you do not object to that class of accommodation, but your criticism is rather this, that there is a danger that in this kind of institution the patient may be unduly detained because there is a financial motive to do so; and you are out to see that the financial motive should not be allowed to prevail, that safeguards should exist against it. If there were adequate safeguards against abuse, I take it you do not object to the extension of this kind of accommodation if it is wanted?—Not if it is wanted, and subject to what I believe is a strong public view that that class of business should not be run for excessive profits; and that is easily dealt with by making these type of places disclose their accounts, or having them reviewed by some central authority.

Sir Thomas Hutchison: Apparently what Mr. Parker advocates is what is known in the case of other houses as disinterested management.

11,318. Mr. Jowitt: Do you have a larger proportion of complaints from these places than from others?—No, I think not.

11,319. So far as you know in practice, there is no evidence that this conflict of interests has any adverse effect?—We could give you cases.

11,320. But you see in other cases, too, with regard to asylums, the motive is obviously an interest to get rid of the patient, to prevent him being a charge upon the rates?—I do not quite follow the point.

11,321. I want to see if you could give us any statistical help to show that the proportion of complaints is greater in the case of these institutions?—No, I am afraid I cannot. In all these things we are limited to the number of cases that come before us. I hope you will get the supplementary evidence

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

from elsewhere. We can only give our limited views on a limited number of cases.

11,322. Earl Russell: It is a thing we should find it very difficult to get evidence on?—I understand you have had a great mass of evidence tendered to deal with these sort of points.

Chairman: We have.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: I am not quite sure what is the object gained by extracting from the licensees the amount of profit they make.

11,323. Chairman: Suppose we find that A.B. who conducts one of the best houses in the country has recently died leaving an estate of a quarter of a million, which is described as having been made from the nefarious profits out of lunatics of this country,—supposing the lunatics have been well treated under his care, why should he not leave a quarter of a million?—If they have?

11,324. That is the whole point?—That is the whole point; but supposing the same A.B. is getting 35 per cent. profit a year, and that you get at the same time statements from the patients that the food is beastly, and so on?

11,325. That means that the man who is paying for all these things is not getting them.

Dr. Sara White: Perhaps the Chairman would allow me to say that in the York Retreat large sums are paid sometimes, but there is no profit, because it has to go to reduce the fees for others.

11,326. Chairman: We understand that system; but really Mr. Parker just now is on the general question as to whether licensed houses should be allowed to make large profits.—If you are going to extend them. Admitting the need, we say that the principle of the York Retreat or elsewhere is a very sound principle, that if some pay big fees, and if there is a surplus, it should go in relief of those who cannot pay big fees, and give them treatment which they would not otherwise get.

11,327. Is not your case really this—that persons who pay large sums to these institutions do not receive value for their money?—Unquestionably they do not.

11,328. Why do they go to them?—Because there is nowhere else to go.

11,329. Does not that suggest that if there were more of them they would reduce their tariffs and provide better accommodation?—If you introduced unlimited competition you might get that result, but I am afraid you might get other results as well. I do not think I can take it any further than that.

11,330. Now we will pass on to another topic. You have a paragraph dealing with what you describe as the patient's knowledge, that is to say, his right of access to information about his own certification. I think we have really discussed that incidentally already, have we not?—I think we have dealt with it.

11,331. We have seen the pros and cons of that subject?—Yes, but the additional point we make is this—that records such as the case book, and so on, we do feel should be available at any rate to relatives; and, of course, as you know at present they are guarded with the utmost secrecy. We ourselves in the case of patients whom we are going to call before this Commission applied to many asylums, asking for leave to inspect the case book of the special patients we were going to call, with a view of saving your time and checking their evidence.

11,332. Of course, there again you are dealing with a difficult question. I do not suppose I have any right to see the case book of my own doctor who has got my own record and many things said about me, and if I asked him for the case book he would say, "I am certainly not going to show you that; these are my own private notes about you?"—I quite agree, but is that case quite on all fours with a public institution?

11,333. But why does not he show them to me? It is just because he says, "I have made a number of notes; it is not always desirable that you should hear everything I have noted about you. It may make you imagine all sorts of things about yourself."—I quite see that, but the difficulty is this—that the relatives never know what is alleged against the patient—I am assuming the case of a petitioner who wants to get a patient discharged—and the patient never has any opportunity of contradicting what is stated there, which is much more important. Later, when we come to a case book, I think you will see that that crops up.

11,334. Earl Russell: The actual case book is rather different from telling him what is alleged to be his condition. I can imagine there are very few people, sane or insane, who would, without harm, learn the full medical details about their condition?—No, quite.

(After a short adjournment.)

11,335. Chairman: Now, Mr. Parker, with regard to the medical superintendent and his position, I believe you have some comments to make?—Yes. I should like, first of all, if I may, to call your attention again to the Report of 1908, paragraph 655, where Dr. Needham again says this on the question of the interference by Commissioners with the treatment of the patient: "I think we have always held that interference with the medical treatment would be an encroachment upon the duties of the medical superintendent, would limit his responsibility and be rather undesirable. In the medical profession it is not customary for one man to criticise very closely the dealings of another, even if he is in a consultant capacity, unless he has reason to think that the treatment is unsatisfactory." In that connection we feel that that is really the underlying factor which militates against these different authorities acting, that they do not in fact, and they do not care to, criticise each other's duties very much.

Sir Ernest Hiley: Subject to that proviso; you have not completed the sentence here in your précis. The sentence you have is, "In the medical profession it is not customary for one man to criticise very closely the dealings of another": but there is something else you read.

11,336. Chairman: "Even if he is in a consultant capacity, unless he has reason to think that the treatment is unsatisfactory." Why should he criticise unless he thinks the treatment is unsatisfactory?—The point we want to make is that the Commissioners in fact on their visits do not interfere with the medical treatment, and that is one of the reasons given by a Commissioner himself, and we suggest that probably what held good in the Commissioners in those days still holds good now.

11,337. Earl Russell: How could they?—If they are going to discharge, obviously the medical view of the medical treatment is one of the first things they must look at.

11,338. Chairman: I do not quite follow this because it is an odd thing to observe that the medical treatment should be removed from the sphere of the medical practitioner. One might as well say that the legal treatment of a case should be removed from the legal expert—some people perhaps think it should?—I am not suggesting that. The point I want to make is that it is left exclusively to the medical superintendent, that he in fact gets no interference from above on treatment or on discharge, and that when we come to deal with his functions he does not in fact himself exercise an independent view below. You have had that in evidence from Dr. Barham.

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,339. Earl Russell: But surely they do interfere with treatment to the extent of calling attention to the people that are employed, the advantages of giving them work, and they call attention sometimes to the use of drugs, and also to mechanical restraint; all those are part of the treatment?—I suppose they certainly are in that sense.

11,340. How much further could they interfere with the medical treatment?—I am not suggesting they should. I only want to clear the ground, and say the Commissioners do not in fact interfere with that side of it.

11,341. Supposing a man is to be treated for some physical ailment as well, how on earth can a Commissioner deal with hundreds of cases of that kind when he comes round?—I am not suggesting that he should, I only wanted to clear the point in considering what the medical superintendent's own position is, that he is in fact in an unchecked position, in an autocratic position, and I think that is fully recognised.

11,342. Just like any other doctor treating any other case?—The comment I am going to make is that he has so many duties that that is a dangerous position to leave him in.

11,343. Chairman: You know one of the ideals, if I may so call it, of reform in the matter of the treatment of the insane is to assimilate their case as much as possible to that of people suffering from other ailments. Now people who suffer from other ailments are necessarily to a large extent in the hands of their doctors, because these are the very people who are skilled to treat them. In a sense there is rather an inconsistency in saying on the one hand we want the insane person to be treated just as an ordinary patient, and, on the other hand, we do not want the insane person to be treated just as an ordinary patient, because we do not want the doctor to be the person in supreme control; you cannot at the same time assimilate mental disease to ordinary disease from the point of view of treatment, and subordinate the doctor, because the doctor of course is predominant in the treatment of ordinary disease?—I hope you do not think we are seeking to eliminate the doctor. We are trying to suggest that the medical superintendent as such should have his duties far more closely confined to medical duties.

11,344. That is a large and important topic of course. But the question that arose for the moment was that you seemed to cite Dr. Needham as if you rather challenged his view that interference with medical treatment was inappropriate?—No Sir, I do not challenge his view. I accept his view and I think that reluctance to interfere runs all through the treatment to which patients are subjected. There is no interference from above, and I do not think there is much interference except on rare occasions from below; that is to say, the medical superintendent I do not think does interfere very much with the treatment given by his subordinates, and when we come to consider cases I think I shall be able to show you that.

11,345. Earl Russell: Unless he disagreed with it, or thought them incompetent, why should he?—Because there seems to be the idea prevalent that the medical superintendent has his patients in close touch, and under his thumb. (I think Dr. Barham suggested the opposite view.) That was the suggestion made to you, and it is a suggestion which we want to combat.

11,346. Chairman: That arises on the question also of whether the institutions at present are not too large to enable the medical superintendent to be in personal contact with the cases; but I am in a difficulty in seeing why, if you have an institution of the proper size and a medical superintendent in proper relationship to his patients under his care, you should interfere with his method of treatment of the cases?—We do not want to interfere with that.

11,347. Sir Thomas Hutchison: Is there not some confusion of thought? Medical treatment there does not mean the general management of the patient but the therapeutic treatment?—Yes.

11,348. Chairman: Yes. Of course it would be ridiculous if you were being treated for influenza to have a friend coming in and saying "I do not think the doctor is treating you in a proper way; I propose that you take somebody's cough cure." I do not know that that would be a desirable state of matters; you have got to rely upon the medical man in therapeutic treatment. Whether he should have so large a control of the destiny of the patient in his hands when he has so many other things to attend to is a very different topic, and a very serious topic. However, I do not think we are very much at variance on that?—As it is a finding, might I just refer you again to the Cobb Report, page 21, at the bottom. They say this "The Committee are however impressed by the consideration that the fate of an institution and its inmates is determined perhaps for many years by the personality of the medical superintendent placed in charge of it. And we have considered very seriously whether the present methods of appointment are calculated to ensure that the best available men are selected for these great responsibilities." Now that, of course, I suppose is admitted on all hands.

11,349. Yes, I have read that passage, and was very much struck with it too. Of course every institution, even a Royal Commission, depends upon the efficiency of the persons in whom the duties are confided, and in a human world you will always have people of varying degrees of capacity. I can quite imagine you will have some medical superintendents who will not be satisfactory?—That of course is what we submit, in the past and in the present there is again an enormous divergence in the capacity of the people administering these things, and it is very wrong that the law should not lay down stricter provisions for their selection.

11,350. What do you think of the suggestion made in the Cobb Report on this subject just over the page, that there should be an advisory board?—I think that is quite excellent as far as it goes. Of course the question one would like to see raised is what their capacity is really to be.

11,351. Dr. Lomax's suggestion is that the appointment should be vested in the Minister of Health, but you know the Minister of Health may appoint an incompetent person, too?—One hopes, if you have got a central board with wider representation, that they might have, shall we say, a veto on the appointment.

11,352. One cannot always get the class of person for these responsible duties; the supply is limited, obviously, because it is a post that undoubtedly requires a remarkable combination of qualifications, does it not?—Of course, that is what one feels; it requires very high technique, I should think.

11,353. Not only technique, but, if I may say so, one ought to have very high qualities of human sympathy?—I quite agree with you.

11,354. Then they go on to say this in the Cobb Report: "We consider that at no distant date it should be made compulsory that no one should be appointed medical superintendent unless he has obtained a diploma in psychological medicine." There is another suggestion which in process of time may be given effect to, that they should be specialists by trade?—One hopes that will come about, but as you say, it will take a long time.

11,355. Earl Russell: Have you got any view about the possibility of the superintendent becoming stale? Suppose he is appointed superintendent and settles down for life, do you think at the end of 20 years, or something like that, he ought to be removed in case he is getting too much of a routine superintendent?—I think we have two views that bear on that. It is recommended somewhere, and we thoroughly approve of it, that there should be frequent visits by the medical superintendent to other more advanced institutions, or even if you got it, to a central body which is doing research work; and then, of course, there is the other alternative, whether it should be a fixed appointment, or whether it should rotate like the Wesleyan Circuit, whether it should be a life appointment or not.

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,356. Then you see, of course, there are advantages in a man getting to know his own asylum. As against that, after 15 or 20 years it might become too much a routine matter?—I think the view we take is that the move should be long before 15 years, or not at all, because I think there is the personal interest that a man takes in his institution. I was very much struck in one institution I went to in Hertfordshire by the superintendent telling me that he had seen the thing grow up round him; he felt it was his life work. That was a very valuable outlook.

11,357. You do not want to uproot him if he is really planted?—As far as one has an opinion, I think it would be much more valuable if he visited other places.

11,358. Chairman: Of course, one has to recognise that a man who must have the diploma of the Medico Psychological Association might be on paper a "100 per cent. man," who might equally have commended himself for various reasons to an advisory committee, and yet might be an extraordinarily bad medical superintendent; not because he had not the technical qualifications, but just because he might be a hard type of man and not the sympathetic type. He might be a failure, whereas, on the other hand, you might have the kind of man who cannot pass a single examination and yet who is a perfectly ideal administrator, because he has the other human qualities. It is very difficult to get a standard which must be satisfied?—Yes, but I feel in that connection that a central body who are frequently dealing with that type of appointment would exercise a better judgment than a local body.

11,359. Then may I take it generally that you agree with the recommendations of the Cobb Report?—Yes.

11,360. Earl Russell: Do you think it would be a good thing if a medical superintendent were not finally appointed until he had been two years on trial?—I think that would be a useful provision. The appointment should be provisional.

Sir David Drummond: I do not think you would get the best man under those conditions.

Earl Russell: If it were universal they would have to come under it.

Sir David Drummond: Yes, but I do not think it would be acceptable to the profession.

Chairman: I think possibly Mr. Parker's suggestion, which is the Cobb Committee's suggestion, of an advisory committee, might meet the point; because, after all, medical superintendents are selected to a large extent from the medical officers of asylums who have had training, and who would have come under the cognisance of a board such as you suggest, and would therefore be persons whose qualifications were known. The Advisory Committee would be able to select them as men who by disposition as much as by technical qualification would be appropriate, and this body would be able to make very useful suggestions. There is something in what Sir David said. A man does not like being appointed to a job, and their saying "We will see how you get on; we will put you on probation."

Earl Russell: You would not get him to give up anything good to take it?

11,361. Chairman: No. Now so much for his appointment. What else have you to say about this?—We say at present of course he is in a very powerful position, and there is really nobody who can interfere with his decision; and we suggest that there again there is an argument for introducing a judicial authority.

11,362. At this stage do you desire to take up the question so much discussed as to whether he should be relieved entirely of administrative work?—Yes, we do; we feel strongly on that point, that what is demanded of a medical superintendent at present is really quite impossible. On the other hand, of course, one is very much impressed with the difficulty of splitting that work from an administrative point of view.

11,363. You probably have read the discussion, because it is argued on both sides in Dr. Lomax's book—you may remember the pages devoted to the subject?—Quite.

11,364. If I remember rightly, he sums up against the present system.—I think he thinks they should be divided.

11,365. Yes, but I am impressed with this view, that in the case of mentally afflicted persons treatment is so largely a matter of the regulation of conduct and regimen, which in turn depends upon a whole lot of administrative considerations. The position would be very awkward if you had the medical superintendent entirely divorced from what one might call the general conduct of the establishment, though it is the very conduct of the establishment which is itself one of the curative agencies?—They interlock, of course, very, very closely.

11,366. Do you not then rather look with sympathy upon this view that the true solution is not to be found so much in dividing the functions between two heads, one administrative and the other medical, as in reducing the size of the institutions, so that the medical superintendents will not be overburdened with administrative work?—Unquestionably we should support that, and I think it is generally urged everywhere, and has been throughout, that the institution shall be limited. I think 1,000 is the highest figure given.

11,367. Some, I think, have put it higher, but 1,000 is a figure which has commanded general assent. You must have it a certain size in order to be efficient and economic?—Yes.

11,368. But if you have institutions on a more moderate scale than many of the present public asylums, would not this difficulty to a large extent disappear?—Even 1,000 people, with the administration of all these details, is still a very big matter.

11,369. Earl Russell: Of course, you could give him a steward and competent clerks, and all that sort of thing?—I think he has that at present.

11,370. If you take away from him the final say you make it very awkward, as the Chairman says.

11,371. Chairman: I think the difficulty is largely a question of temperament. Some men, of course, try to avoid matters of detail as much as possible, while other men are positively attracted by the detail of routine, and enjoy more perhaps than their medical duties the filling up of forms and all the neat and tidy arrangement of their books. It is a matter of temperament, I should think, largely?—Yes.

11,372. Sir David Drummond: But even reducing the asylum to say 500 it would not relieve the situation?—I am rather inclined to agree with that; I do not think reducing the numbers will dispose of the difficulty.

11,373. Chairman: It would not dispose of it altogether, but it would mitigate it?—In the particular asylum I went over one could not help being struck with the fact that the medical superintendent was an expert on the farming question. He could answer questions about pigs and so on. It does seem to me deplorable that he should be wasting his time on matters of that sort, but that is one of the profit-earning departments of the asylum, and one which is very closely watched by the visiting committee, and I gathered that he had to be in a position to satisfy them, and one wondered how much time was wasted on that. It seems a deplorable position, if you consider it.

11,374. I am not sure that the solution is to be found in having a co-ordinate authority in two persons under the same roof?—No, I agree with that. The only suggestion that has crossed one's mind is this: Would it be possible to concentrate the purely medical duties in a senior medical officer? Let the superintendent be an overriding authority, but let the routine be definitely that, and the medical duties given over to a senior medical officer, and then you would have to give him under the Act certain of the powers at present given to the medical superintendent.

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,375. I imagine in practice that obtains to a considerable extent just now, that the second in command is the person who is most conversant with the medical side of the institution?—I should think it does in practice, but ought not that to be regulated? There is somewhere in the Act, I think, a reference to the senior medical officer. I only throw that out as a possible suggestion.

11,376. Earl Russell: That again must depend upon the conditions of each institution to some extent?—Undoubtedly, but I think you would want some statutory change to make that scheme work.

Earl Russell: I do not think so—would you?

Chairman: It could be done, I think, through rules and regulations.

11,377. Sir David Drummond: What is the advantage of having a special authority upon mental disease, if you are not going to give the medical superintendent the medical charge of the patients?—Then it would be your senior medical officer who would be that authority; you would have your superintendent as an administrator, co-ordinating the whole thing, and the senior medical officer would have the medical duties more completely in his hand.

11,378. Chairman: I think we may put it in this way that in view of the character of these institutions it is almost indispensable that the person who is at the head of the institution should at least have medical qualifications?—Quite.

11,379. Because even the administrative questions which he has to determine have medical implications?—Yes.

11,380. And if he be both a doctor and a man possessing those qualifications he is probably the right man there. The real criticism upon the existing régime is that in view of the very great medical responsibility which he has as medical superintendent, his other duties may be liable to divert his attention from what is primarily his function, that of attending the medical welfare of the patients?—Quite. His other duties, of course, are very pressing undoubtedly.

11,381. And then the difficulty arises partly from this, that those other duties are related to matters which in turn are related to the treatment of the patients?—Quite.

11,382. If by rules and regulations it were possible to bring about a delegation of duties to relieve the medical superintendent of a certain amount of administrative work by imposing it in terms upon subordinates, would it not be possible to diminish the volume of his administrative work?—Well, of course, my personal view, from a business point of view, is that that would be a mistake. I think your head man in a huge organisation must primarily be an administrator with the medical qualifications you suggest. I would rather see not the practical administration switched off to subordinates so much as the medical administration switched off to another competent head, who is to be technically second in command, but recognised as the senior medical officer. It is a question of opinion, of course.

11,383. There is another way of achieving that end; suggestions have been made from some quarters that institutions of this sort ought to have associated with them a consultative alienist?—Of course that is suggested, and it is a very desirable thing, but that would not meet the day to day conditions, would it?

11,384. Would it not? Take the great hospitals of this country; they have their eminent visiting consultants who attend frequently?—If that could be brought about of course it would be very desirable. I do not know whether that is a possibility.

Sir David Drummond: I do not know that it would be a practical possibility, on the lines of a general hospital.

Sir Ernest Hiley: It depends very much upon where the asylum is situate.

Chairman: Yes, it might be away from any centre, of course.

Sir Ernest Hiley: If the asylum is situate in a large town it might be possible then.

Chairman: Yes. At present, of course, they do call in a consultant, for example in a surgical case. If there is to be an operation a surgeon is brought down, if it is a grave case.

Sir Ernest Hiley: Yes.

11,385. Chairman: I am not altogether attracted by your idea of a sort of imperium in imperio, that is to say, a medical man who is not the superintendent, but who is to have certain of the powers of the medical superintendent—would you not be very liable to have a conflict between him and the superintendent?—I do not know, any more than you have at present. As long as the head is defined he will generally work with the next in command; I think the danger arises where there is that lack of definition, where there is not a definite head.

11,386. Then you do not suggest that this second medical officer should be independent of the medical superintendent?—No, that he should be under him, but that he should have definitely deputed to him certain medical functions.

11,387. Earl Russell: First lieutenant?—Quite, and I think to some extent it would be necessary to recognise his position in any new legislation.

11,388. Why need you recognise his position if he is still to be under the medical superintendent? It is understood he is the man who is in charge of the whole medical supervision. It would only apply in an asylum where there are a good many other medical officers, anyhow?—In the big asylums, yes. Take the simple question of discharge; when he has made up his mind, is there any advantage in his going to the medical superintendent and detailing the facts all over again?

11,389. If the medical officer is to be trusted, the superintendent will take his word for it?—Still there is that consultation.

11,390. Chairman: Who would be the officer responsible to the visiting committee—would the visiting committee rely upon this person, or would they rely upon the medical superintendent who had consulted this person?—No, our suggestion is that his position in medical matters would be so clear that he would be in touch with the visiting committee, and he would be the one to attend the meetings, and we suggest therefore that he should have power in certain cases to act.

11,391. I think you would get difficulties there. After all, the visiting committee would expect to see the head of the institution.

Earl Russell: They can always both attend. But we have heard of a visiting committee which splits itself up into sections. That is where they do not meet so often.

Witness: That would be rather on all fours with this suggestion.

Earl Russell: Yes.

11,392. Chairman: It is not an easy problem this?—It is really difficult.

11,393. Mr. Micklem: It is rather a curious thing that in Section 276 the Act seems to contemplate that where there is more than one division of an asylum there should be a separate superintendent for each division, and it also contemplates that in certain cases the committee may get power to appoint superintendents who are not medical officers?—Yes, I see that is so, subsection (c). As I say, in one or two places in the Act it does seem to contemplate a senior medical officer. Here it calls him a resident medical officer.

11,394. Earl Russell: Yes, and he need not necessarily be the superintendent as Mr. Micklem points out under subsection (c)?—That is so.

Mr. Micklem: It looks as though the common form of appointing a medical superintendent to the asylum is wrong. There should be a separate one for each division.

Earl Russell: What is meant by a division?

11,395. Mr. Micklem: I suppose usually there is the division of male and female is there not, in the

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

large asylums?—Yes, but is that the division contemplated here?

Earl Russell: I cannot help thinking it is build-ings in separate places.

Witness: I do not know whether the Commission has access to the qualifications of the present medical superintendents taken as a whole, but one has a sort of feeling that they are much more administrative than medical. I do not know whether that is a true suggestion to put forward.

11,396. Chairman: I think you may take it that many of them would have the tendency to concentrate on their administrative duties rather than upon their medical duties?—And, further, their training has been administrative rather than medical.

11,397. Sir David Drummond: That is the practice?—Yes.

11,398. Chairman: And one can quite see how important it is that the medical side should be predominant. As we are now looking more and more to the treatment of these patients from a medical point of view, the medical qualifications and the opportunities of showing medical skill become more and more important?—Yes.

11,399. Therefore this question of the medical superintendent's functions is very intimately related to the whole question of treatment, is it not?—Very, and I suppose it is admitted on all hands that you have got to divide these functions in some way; the only question is how.

11,400. Yes. You have put your views before us, as usual very moderately, but I think you have still left us with a puzzle?

11,401. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Would not Mr. Parker's view really be met if, admitting that it is necessary for a good medical superintendent to have control over the different branches of treatment, he delegated the detail of the administrative work, as he very often does, I believe, to stewards, and people of that kind?—One's experience of delegation is that the responsibility still remains with the delegator. He may save himself a certain amount of routine work, but he cannot dismiss the matter from his mind. It is the hardest thing in the world really to delegate and to get rid of responsibility at the same time.

11,402. Mr. Snell: Have you thought of the alternative suggestion that the medical superintendent should have, as he has now, final control over the medical side; and that then there should be appointed a trained administrator to take all the other side off his hands?—We certainly have considered that. Of course, it must be that, or the course we are suggesting; the question is which is the better, and on the whole, for what it is worth, our opinion is that the administration, that is to say, all the daily work which is so urgent, should be in the hands of the senior man. But I am quite prepared to hear the other view argued, and perhaps it may be the better solution.

11,403. Chairman: I do not know that we get much help from the analogy of the general hospital here. Of course, in a general hospital one knows there is a superintendent, who is a person, very often a doctor, who resides on the premises, and has an office and clerks and all the rest of it. On the other hand, the actual treatment of the patients is confided to the doctors in charge of the wards, that is to say, the young resident physicians and surgeons; and then there are the eminent physicians and surgeons attached to the place; but the superintendent in his office, of course, never interferes in any way with the visiting surgeon or physician, who goes there every day and attends to the patients there with the house doctors, except in so far as relates to the domestic arrangements and things of that sort. But that system does not present an analogy to the mental institution, I am afraid?—We do feel very strongly that if the medical superintendents are to be free to devote themselves really to medical questions they should be absolved from these administrative questions.

11,404. Does not it again resolve itself into a question of the sort of men you get? We have been reading this blue book; it is extraordinarily interesting to read what a lot of scientific work is being done by some of the medical superintendents we have been discussing. If you take some of the instances given there, you will find many of them have made in the course of the year important contributions to mental science, have contributed to the technical journals, have given lectures, have instituted laboratories, and so on, and generally have made important strides in their profession, while at the same time apparently running their institutions satisfactorily. It is the individual once more we are concerned with?—Yes. Of course except in very big centres I am not sure that that local research work is as wise as central research work. The Commission of 1908 rather stressed the other point of view that the research work should be carried on in central places.

11,405. But, on the other hand, one can imagine that the medical superintendent who really cares for the medical side of his work will of course be examining cases and writing papers on them for the medical journals, and so on?—Quite. Of course that class of man would welcome the local facilities.

11,406. I was referring to that just to show this: that apparently some people—whether they are supermen or not I do not know—are able to run their institutions, and to carry on at the same time a great deal of important research work.

Sir David Drummond: That, if I may say so, is done through the subordinates in nearly every case; the superintendent interests himself, and they get different people from the different establishments to work up a certain point.

Chairman: He gets the credit of it.

Sir David Drummond: Yes, he does, but as a rule he mentions the name of the man who has done the work.

Witness: I gathered that myself, but I did not quite like to suggest it. It is so on the detailed statements that come out.

11,407. Chairman: I am not quite sure that would be so in every case, because here is rather an interesting reference at page 13 of the 1923 Report. Speaking of Dr. Orr, it says: "We have confidence that in his new duties and in his capacity as lecturer in mental disorders at Manchester University, he will be zealous in co-ordinating the work of the hospital with that of the neighbouring medical school and in maintaining a high standard of medical efficiency." What really happened is this: that Dr. Orr was a deputy superintendent, and then was made superintendent at Prestwich, and apparently he is at the same time lecturer in mental disorders at Manchester University. Have you got the reference?—Yes, but the detailed test is set out later at pages 89 and 91. On page 91 there is one by Dr. Martin, assistant medical officer, which rather bears out what Sir David was saying.

Sir David Drummond: I think you may accept that as a fact.

Chairman: Yes, but anyhow this gentleman is at one and the same time medical superintendent of an asylum and a lecturer in mental disorders at the Manchester University.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: That I think often occurs, but that does not necessarily strengthen the position of his efficacy at the institution.

Chairman: No, it may be the other way about.

Witness: You see the reference on page 89, "Dr. Orr, medical superintendent, and Dr. A. Corsar Sturrock, senior physician, and neurologist to the Salford Royal Hospital," and then they give their report together.

11,408. Yes. I was citing that rather for this purpose: the suggestion was that the medical superintendent is so cumbered, like Martha, with much serving, that he has no time left to consider medicine at all. Some of them apparently have enough time left to deliver lectures on the subject of their specialty?—Yes; I think we agree it must vary enormously with the class of man.

11,409. However, you are going to leave us with a problem?—I do not think it is one which we could attempt to settle, Sir.

11,410. But it is interesting to notice that after the great consideration which you and your colleagues have obviously given to the whole topic, you are not in favour of a divided head in these institutions. —I think certainly not; I think it would spell disaster.

11,411. I think that is a very important statement on your part. On the other hand, you do wish means to be taken, if they can be taken to insure that there is in every such institution some person whose business it is to attend to the medical side of the treatment of patients?—Yes, and nothing else.

11,412. Undistracted?—Undistracted, and that that person should be the responsible person for all questions of treatment and discharge, and so forth.

11,413. The last addendum is perhaps the controversial part of it, whether he should himself have those powers, or whether he should be the person who would be entitled to speak with authority, because of the special duties he has.

11,414. Sir David Drummond: Has not Mr. Parker rather contradicted himself, that the medical superintendent should have control of the executive, and control of the medical part, not divided—is that what you now indicate?—We are trying to indicate that the senior medical officer shall have a separate recognised position, as I have suggested, recognised even by statute on questions of discharge and that sort of thing, but that in all administrative questions he shall be under the control of the medical superintendent.

11,415. That is not exactly what you indicated in reply to the question the Chairman asked.

11,416. Earl Russell: When the patient is to be discharged it is a question whether the home he is to go to is a fit home?—For the medical officer.

11,417. It is not a medical question, surely?—It seems to me, if it is a borderline case, the controlling factor in reaching a decision must be what is the environment into which you are going to send your patient. I should think any medical man would take that view.

11,418. Do you attach importance to this independent position of the deputy, because I see a crop of difficulties it may raise up?—Under statute?

11,419. Yes. I see a possible crop of difficulties.—Of course that is a question of degree. All I am anxious to avoid is that the decision having been properly taken by the senior medical officer, he should then have the additional burden cast upon him of going and having a talk with the superintendent. It seems to be simply duplicating the work.

11,420. It would do for your purpose if you gave him subordinate duties?—Quite.

11,421. Mr. Snell: Have you considered the similarity of the position of a large mental hospital with a large workhouse, where the master of the workhouse is master, but he does not attend to the medical side.—I am afraid I am not very familiar with the workhouse administration.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Might I say that in our case, a point was emphasised that has not been brought out, and it is this, that what is so much desired is that the person on whose fiat the question of discharge really turns should be in such a position that he can devote sustained personal attention to the borderline cases which are ripe for discharge—that special class. It is a small class, but an important one from that point of view. That is what our case tries to set out.

11,422. That, of course, is a most important class of patient; because there are easy cases which obtain their discharge quite easily, and there are difficult cases which are hopeless; but the cases really which require study are the borderline cases.—Quite.

11,423. And they require intensive study?—Personal touch.

11,424. They must be known and studied?—Yes.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Every day.

11,425. Chairman: And every hour, if you please, if they can be. That, of course, is very difficult to a person who is cumbered with many cares of administration?—Later on, of course, that is set up as one of the chief desiderata of the treatment, and we submit it is impossible under present conditions. There is Section 38 (4) which I wanted to mention, the annual statutory inspection. I only wanted to bring it to your attention that even that, as far as our evidence goes, occupies—

11,426. That is now repealed, but it is in the 1891 Act, Section 7. It is the periodical report which must be made?—The only point I want to draw your attention to there is, it is a very important examination, and as far as our evidence goes it is very often concluded in a few minutes. There, again, one supposes it is the pressure of work which prevents the medical superintendent with all his pressing duties really attending to it as closely as the Act contemplated.

11,427. Now we have come to the end of this part of your evidence which we have explored very fully, and I think we now want to take up the question of the ill-treatment of patients, and the safeguards against it. I suppose of the people who come to you with complaints quite a number complain that they have been badly treated in the institutions?—That is so, and that they have seen—especially those who have had a long period of treatment—other people badly treated; and that is a very important distinction, of course, in dealing with this class to bear in mind, that their own grievances and what they have seen other people suffer are in a very different category.

11,428. Now upon that question the patient must, of course, inevitably be to a large extent in the hands of attendants, just as in the ordinary general hospital the patient is in the hands of the nurses?—That is so.

11,429. One has to recognise, has not one, that the nursing or attending of mental cases is a peculiarly exacting and difficult task?—Yes.

11,430. I think one ought to pay tribute to the persons who have devoted their lives to this work, which must be distressing, and is certainly not very well-paid work, who have done good service; but you must inevitably, I suppose, when you are dealing with something like 15,000 people, have a number of cases where you get unsatisfactory attendants, just as you have unsatisfactory nurses in general hospitals?—I think, if I may say so, that that puts it very clearly, that it is inevitable in a small minority of attendants; and it is no reflection on the bulk of the attendants to draw attention to these things.

11,431. One would not like it to go out that we, as members of the public, do not appreciate the amount of self-sacrifice and sympathy which is shown by many nurses, men and women, in these institutions. One recognises that it is a peculiarly difficult and exacting line of public service. On the other hand, you yourself have had instances, you tell us, and the Board of Control have had instances, and many well substantiated instances, where the attendants have given way, if you please, to irritation, or have been negligent, and where ill-treatment has resulted. I suppose the real problem is to see that these cases are brought, and should always be brought, to the knowledge of some responsible person at the earliest moment so that they can be dealt with. That seems to me to be the real point?—That goes to the root of the matter.

11,432. And the difficulty is just this, that patients, either because of their disabilities or for other reasons, may be afraid to bring their case before a constituted authority, or if they do, may not have it satisfactorily heard and may be over-borne?—Both those features are present in a great number of our cases. A lot of our evidence says this, that from the fact that complaints never lead to any amelioration and sometimes result in reprisals, a patient after a time ceases to complain, he recognises it is better not to; and a case comes into my mind here where after some years one patient changed and went to a new asylum and there he said he was particularly careful not to be a complainer in the new place, and in the result he started with a fresh sheet and got on very much better. That is one class of case; and, of course, the other class of case is that in which patients say that the complaints are not investigated. Of course, in many cases they are investigated on the spot—or in some cases—I should not say many, and there is always a difficulty that apparently the complainer is in the minority of one. I was very much struck on that point by a statement, I think, which was made by Lord Justice Atkin in the Everett case, where he said in effect: of course, a jury, as a jury, were quite entitled if they chose to put aside the consensus of evidence from many of the asylum attendants on the ground that they were all interested; and, of course, there is that factor in human nature which you have got to take into account.

11,433. Yes, but how are you to obviate that? It is to be obviated, is it not, by improving the various means of contact between the patient and outside authorities. The improvement of visitation, making it a reality, is of course one means, is it not?—Yes. I think, if I may say so, in our view the most important means is by improving the status of the attendants, and that has been very fully dealt with in the departmental report, and they bring out there very clearly this fact, that there is a floating population of attendants going through all these asylums who do not make a vocation of nursing; therefore, they are quite untrained, and I think it is more than likely that it is amongst that class that you get violence resulting from loss of temper, and so on.

11,434. Earl Russell: So long as there is this fear of reprisals, no amount of contact with people outside will make them complain?—Unless it can be a private complaint.

11,435. Chairman: If it is to be acted on, it must be known in some way that the complaint has arisen?—Yes, but I think patients would take the risk of that. What they dislike so much is complaining before the attendants.

11,436. Still, suppose there was a complaint made about an attendant, quite a well-founded one, and it reached the properly constituted authority, it reached the medical superintendent; he calls the attendant up, and he is satisfied that there is ground for complaint; he reprimands him, and the attendant goes back to the ward, pretty angry at the whole matter, and says: "I will teach A.B. in future to make complaints about me." I am putting the case in its most crude form. There would not be very much protection there, would there, for the patient?—No, there would not; one realises that however privately the original complaint is made, if it is investigated it probably comes back again in some form.

11,437. Of course, in some instances the attendant is dismissed on the spot?—Absolutely summarily dismissed.

11,438. Earl Russell: And the patient is safe?—Yes, and the patient is safe.

11,439. Chairman: On the one hand the attendant is a reasonable person, he will take an admonition in good spirit; on the other hand you always will have some people who do not like being reprimanded, however deserved it may be?—Quite.

11,440. And accordingly they would be apt to visit it on the patient?—Yes.

11,441. Earl Russell: It seems to me if you make complaints even privately, when they come to be acted upon you would be bound to remove the patient to another ward to avoid the chance of reprisals?—That is a most valuable suggestion, too, and as far as our evidence goes, it does not seem to me very much acted on.

11,442. Chairman: We have had one or two instances of that, that the patient said she could not get on with the attendants in that place, and was moved to another ward where matters were quite different?—And, of course, there are cases where for that reason patients are moved to different asylums, and with very beneficial results. That may apply, and in certain cases does apply, also to junior doctors. You may get an antipathy growing up, and of course that is where your superintendent's sympathy comes in—those are factors which he will take into consideration.

11,443. But it is quite true that where you are dealing with these psychological conditions you may have unreasonable antipathies, but they are nevertheless very present to the minds of the persons who suffer from them.

Earl Russell: They are perfectly real.

11,444. Chairman: They are real, though they may be unfounded, in the sense that the person who entertains them suffers just as much as if they were well grounded?—Quite.

11,445. Earl Russell: The difficulty here is that the superintendent, with the best will in the world, if the attendants do not speak the truth, is left in a hopeless difficulty; it is almost impossible for him to act on the unsupported word of the patient?—Of course one realises that, and one realises too that these complaints of physical violence are really rather extraordinary, they all agree in this, that they take place out of sight, in many places either in a side room, or else in the boot room, curiously enough. We have that on several of our proofs, that the boot room is a convenient place where this sort of chastisement is administered, and it is presumably a small room and out of sight of the other attendants, and so forth. It is a very difficult question, of course.

11,446. Chairman: Is it not rather difficult to imagine that attendants would deliberately proceed to chastise a grown patient as you have described. I can understand an attendant being goaded to exasperation by a very annoying patient, and in a moment of forgetfulness hitting back; but it really is difficult to imagine a properly qualified attendant taking a patient away and deliberately kicking him or hitting him in a defenceless condition. It may happen. You may have persons who would be so brutal as to do that, but it is difficult to imagine that it would happen often?—We have evidence which does not leave a doubt that it occurs, if I may give you a personal experience there of one of the big London asylums. I was personally taking evidence from a person down at my home in the country and from another patient in London; they had known each other in this asylum, but they did not know, either of them, that I was in touch with the other, and I got from their lips almost identical accounts of violence in the administration of purgatives. In one case the man was assaulted there and then in the ward and pommelled in the stomach; in the other case the second person was removed to a side room and there assaulted by two attendants, and our evidence of it always takes the same form, pommelling in the stomach; in fact, hitting below the belt.

11,447. Earl Russell: Because it does not show?—Because it does not show, and one is not prepared to say so definitely, but there does seem to be some connection between that and kneeling on the stomach and broken ribs that we shall come to.

11,448. Chairman: What do you suggest is the object of that ill-treatment? Is it vindictiveness?—I am afraid it is a method of maintaining discipline. When we come to consider other matters you will find there are methods of maintaining discipline, and up to a point I suppose discipline is one of the hardest things to maintain in these institutions, but it should not be maintained in that way, of course.

11,449. Of course not?—The impression it leaves on one's mind is that in these cases it is really a battle of wills, and the patient's will has in the end to give way.

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,450. Of course the patient's will may be irrational—that may just be the trouble?—It may be; that is why we are anxious to call these individuals before you, for you to judge for yourselves if their wills are irrational.

Earl Russell: Still, of course, whether irrational or not, that is not the way to cure them.

11,451. Chairman: Plainly not. Assuming the occurrence of some such cases, and we know that such cases have occurred, what we are concerned with is not to "sup on horrors," but to know how horrors may be prevented. What is your suggestion of reform?—We can only make two, I think, one I have indicated—the obvious one of improving your nursing staff, making it a vocational calling, and giving such terms as will attract the right class of person. The other is to try to bring about a prompt investigation, and one would certainly say an investigation by people who are not interested—an independent investigation.

11,452. But beyond these general suggestions, you have not anything specific to suggest?—Of course there is that other suggestion that has been made, a system of glass panels in the doors, which I believe is in force in many asylums but is not universal, which enables supervision to take place at any time in a ward; but then that does not touch this question of side rooms, where most of these assaults take place.

11,453. Earl Russell: I daresay you heard a superintendent say in answer to me, that he did not expect to be called upon to act as a detective in his asylum; but do you think it would be done by appointing somebody who would be called a disciplinary officer, and who would see himself whether this goes on?—I am afraid it would be a very invidious position.

11,454. I quite see that, a very responsible one, because he might injure an attendant?—I think that would certainly be so.

11,455. Chairman: Have you any view on the subject of having women nurses on the male side?—Yes; I think that all we have heard is very much to its advantage.

11,456. It has been suggested that the influence of women as nurses in mental hospitals, as in general hospitals, is refining?—I think the evidence in favour of it is overwhelming.

11,457. But I understand that your complaints of violence are by no means confined to the male attendants. You have cases also of female attendants who have shown violence to female patients?—We have said that one of the causes may be that moving population which passes through the hospitals. No doubt you get a percentage of very unsatisfactory attendants. We have undoubtedly cases of that where nurses in permanent employ have been reported on time and time again.

11,458. Earl Russell: Of course you want to find them out in the shortest possible time?—You ought to.

Earl Russell: You want to.

11,459. Chairman: These are persons who should be eliminated from the service; they should never have been in it. Then we may pass now to the question of the use of drugs in mental hospitals?—Before we pass from that I should like to refer to Dr. Edwards' statement in connection with female nursing and the absence of broken ribs. Also I do want to draw your attention to this, the views advanced, I suppose it is by different Commissioners, on this same question of broken ribs. At page 218 in the Board of Control's report you get this view "There has been no serious casualty during the period under review, which speaks well for the care and kindness with which the nursing staff treat the patients." If you turn on to the next page you will find: "Serious casualties involving fractures of bones have occurred in six instances—in five through accidental falls in the wards, and in the sixth through fighting with another male patient." We do think it is unfortunate that people in the position of Commissioners should make use of that double argument, that where there are no casualties it points to the care of the attendants, and almost invariably the other point that where there are casualties the attendants are not concerned.

11,460. Mr. Snell: Have you considered this point, Mr. Parker: Is it not the fact that at least some forms of mental disease make the bones extremely brittle, and that a very small amount of compulsion might result in a fracture?—In certain cases that is so, but I believe it is in a very small minority of epileptic cases.

Chairman: I understand it occurs in general paralysis of the insane.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Dr. Edwards qualified his remark here with the reservation that Mr. Snell has called attention to.

Chairman: Yes.

Witness: Of course you will bear in mind that these accidents do in some asylums run to very large proportions, even on the number of patients. At page 184, Bexley, you find this: "There have been 23 serious but non-fatal casualties involving fractures or dislocations of bones, the majority of which were due to accidental falls." Of course there again the percentage does vary most enormously.

11,461. Of course one has to recognise that you are dealing with a population which contains at least a considerable element of violent people, and people who have to be restrained whether they like it or not. I mean the conditions under which a large proportion of the population live there are not normal conditions, and restraint is always a matter of violence, and violence is frequently accompanied with damage, and therefore one would expect in this population inevitably a certain amount of damage done?—I agree, there must be a percentage, but the point I am making is that it varies to such an extraordinary degree that one looks for the possibility of other causes. For instance, you have 23 in this case, and I think I am right in saying that at Claybury, which is a modern institution, there were none.

11,462. Sir Ernest Hiley: How many patients were there in the case of the 23 casualties?—2,140, at Bexley.

11,463. Chairman: Which page is that?—The number of patients is given at the top of page 184. At Claybury the number is 2,447.

11,464. Of course it is difficult to argue from those premises?—Of course I would not for a moment argue from those premises alone. They are supported in a sense by the detailed evidence.

Mr. Walter Stewart: It was Dr. Edwards who said "I was struck with the number of turbulent patients controlled by female nurses," so that violence and turbulence are not necessarily accompanied by violence on the other side according to that.

Chairman: No. Now let us pass to the question of drugs.

Witness: On the question of the use of drugs, except on croton oil, which we desire to draw your special attention to, we do not propose to offer any technical evidence, but we hope you may see your way to get it from elsewhere. We do draw attention, as an example, to the use of the drug hyoscine. That is brought out in the Cobb report. It is described by Dr. Stoddart, who gave evidence before you, in one of his standard works as a "refined substitute for hitting the patient on the head with a club." I do not know how far that is accurate, but we believe it to be a very powerful drug. It is used in certain asylums, notably in Prestwich; and in others, which are set out on pages 114, 116 and 117 of the Cobb Report, it is not used at all, and that is indicative again, we suggest, of a state of affairs which would not exist if you had a strong central body.

11,465. Of course one must recognise that sedatives are one of the recognised methods of treatment. It is a palliative rather than a curative treatment.

Earl Russell: Is hyoscine a sedative?

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Sir David Drummond: Certainly, it is a very powerful sedative.

Chairman: At any rate it reduces a person who is in a state of excitement to calm, and that must always be one of the resorts in the treatment of violent cases, of course.

Witness: I agree, but the point one wants to make is that some of these sedatives are more violent apparently than others, and for that reason are discarded in most institutions, whereas their use is still maintained in others.

11,466. Sir Humphry Rolleston: With regard to the quotation about hyosine—"a substitute for hitting the patient on the head" I am really asking for information—is that a quotation from Dr. Stoddart's book?—That is a quotation from Dr. Lomax's book, and he tells me he took it out of Dr. Stoddart's book.

11,467. Wherever it comes from, I think that most medical men would say that the reason why hyosine is not used more freely is that it is rather uncertain in its effect. The inference I should draw, if I were a layman, from reading "a substitute for hitting the patient on the head" would be that it gave rise to very painful results.

Chairman: I read it to mean that he was stunned.

Witness: I read it to mean immediate unconsciousness—very quick acting.

11,468. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I think that is an exaggeration. The reason why medical men do not use it is that sometimes it makes the patient sleepy, and sometimes it has no effect?—I am only quoting the mental expert on it.

11,469. Chairman: Anyhow, we here are not going into a disquisition on the materia medica. Of course, in a mental hospital, as in a general hospital, there must be a full equipment of the drugs which are to be used in the treatment of those cases, and as the cases are frequently cases of mental disturbance one would naturally find a predominating use of the drugs which are of a sedative character, and so on, and all the appropriate materia medica for that form of ailment. I do not think very much arises for discussion on that point unless your suggestion is that there is an abuse of sedatives?—Of course we do get these suggestions, that powerful drugs are used to put a patient into a state in which he cannot do himself justice if people are coming to visit him. Of course one realises that is a very serious accusation to make.

11,470. Earl Russell: That is going back to Charles Reade?—It is going back to Charles Reade. All I can tell you is that those statements are made to us with apparent force behind them, but short of calling the witnesses before you I do not think it would be proper for us to say anything more.

11,471. Chairman: I think it is quite right to indicate risks, but so far as the administration of these sedatives is concerned that must be a matter for the doctors themselves. As to whether the use of them can be abused is another matter?—There is just this point which I would like to put before you, having regard to the frequency with which urgency orders are now used and the fact that the patient then does come under the influence of drugs, whether it is likely that he does himself full justice at subsequent interviews with the magistrate or anybody else. I am not suggesting any wrong use of drugs, but whether in fact anybody who has been through that treatment and has been torn up by the roots from his home is likely to do himself justice. It seems to us to be an additional argument for not allowing these urgency orders to become the practice because you are interfering with the patient's environment, and with his physical condition.

11,472. I see what you mean. Now here is a subject which is dealt with at great length in Dr. Lomax's book, the question of the use of croton oil?—Yes.

11,473. I do not know whether I might shorten this topic with you. I do not know how far my colleagues have considered the question, but I was very struck in the Cobb Report with the result of some questions that they had addressed to a considerable number of institutions, I think it was 22 institutions in all, I am not sure that I have got the number correct, and the return they got was that in about 15 of those institutions this particular purgative was never used at all?—That is so.

11,474. It is difficult not to jump to the conclusion, therefore, that it is possible to conduct an institution satisfactorily without resort to the use of this drug at all. It is a natural enough inference to draw, is it not?—Unquestionably, yes; that is purely on medical grounds.

11,475. Purely on medical grounds. On the other hand, we have had no evidence, or at least very little evidence, about this croton oil, and I am bound to say I knew very little about it until I came here. Is it part of the view of the Society for Lunacy Reform that this drug should be proscribed altogether?—I think so, unless you get medical evidence that there are cases in which it must be used, and then of course it would have to be used under very restricted control. The view we want to bring before you is that it is used not for medicinal purposes at all.

Earl Russell: As you are not a doctor, I wish our medical colleagues would tell us if it is called a brutal purge.

Sir David Drummond: If it is used in a sufficient dose, of course it is.

Earl Russell: Is it used much in private practice?

Sir David Drummond: No.

Chairman: I understand it is only used in the most obdurate cases of constipation.

Witness: That is so. Dr. Lomax deals with it.

11,476. Earl Russell: Probably if I sum it up as a brutal purge that will be about right?—I have tried it myself. I have some in my pocket; would you like to see it?

Chairman: Yes, I should. (A sample of croton oil was handed to the Chairman.)

11,477. Sir David Drummond: What is the dose?—Two minims.

11,478. Did you try that?—Yes.

11,479. Chairman: It does not seem to be in the dispensary at all in quite a number of the institutions one has been in?—That is the point, but it has been very largely used in asylum practice in the past, and as a result it has a reputation which strikes terror into patients, and that reputation lives on in asylums; and in those asylums where it is still used, we want to try to show you that it is not used for a medicinal purpose. I have a case here where I have no doubt at all it was ordered by the doctor in such quantities that it looks as if it were for punitive purposes.

11,480. It is hardly within our province to proscribe a medicine altogether which is in the British Pharmacopoeia, and which may be necessary in particular cases. It is a peculiar concomitant of insanity that pronounced constipation is a feature of it. It is due to the sedentary life of the patients, no doubt?—On the evidence we have got I question whether it is ever used for that purpose. We have no evidence that it is.

11,481. It does not seem to be necessary for that purpose, because so many institutions get on without it?—Exactly.

11,482. And therefore you say that where it is still found and is still used, the inference is that it is not being used for medical or therapeutic but for punitive purposes?—Yes, and I think we go further than that and say it is a warning signal, to look at the rest of the executive of that particular institution. If they are still so old-fashioned as to employ those sort of methods it is rather a warning signal.

11,483. I think, if I may say so, that is quite a fair way to put it. If you find an asylum using croton oil at all, or to any material extent: have a look at that asylum.—Yes, it puts one on enquiry.

11,484. You say that where it is still used, you have come to the conclusion that it is being used now rather

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

for the purposes of punishment than for purposes of cure?—That is so, and I want, if I may, to put before you a case which only came into our possession two weeks ago, but which really seems to me to prove that contention very nearly up to the hilt. I have got some copies of the medicine card and the case book, which I should like to hand round.

11.485. If you please. I have one; you were good enough to send one in to the Secretary of the Commission, and I have that copy before me.—If you please, Sir. (Copies of the Medicine Card and the Case Book were handed in.)

11.486. Now we need not take the name of the place or the name of the patient, because it is quite immaterial for your purpose?—Quite. Shall I just give you the outline of the case?

11.487. If you please?—That is a case of a patient in 1919 who had a slight altercation with a sweep in his house, and he called in the police, and the police arrested him instead of the sweep. The case went to the police court and was remanded to Brixton, was under observation there, and ultimately Quarter Sessions dealt with it as a case with a history of epilepsy, and as a case to be certified; and under those circumstances he went to the asylum. He was examined of course in the usual way on his entry there, and found to be suffering from heart, and we have got a very detailed medical statement of all his symptoms, which showed a history of typhoid and intermittent fainting fits, and some epilepsy; his disposition, which I think is important, is set out in answer to certain specific questions as "Cheerful, not specially excitable, rarely passionate, hopeful on the whole, bold, not rash or reckless or gloomy, rather reserved and obstinate, and brooding latterly. Not lazy, indifferent, fearful or sleepy." He was an educated bank clerk who had visited, in his holidays, Switzerland, Scotland, Ireland, New York and Morocco, so that he was a man used to some of the amenities of life. The other important thing to notice about this patient on his medical history as set out when he went in is that the bowels were active—perhaps I might hand those details to the Medical Commissioners, they might wish to look at them in greater detail.

is in fact meted out to them. There is no sort of reason there for forcible administration of drugs, and the fact that the patient refuses his food one day would be no justification for forcible administration of food the next day. If I may interpose a remark here, I should like to say this: no doubt it was not with this object, but the British Medical Association in Clause 69 do make this proposal. They say this: "There is some uncertainty at present as to the right of the medical officer or medical attendant to administer medical treatment to a patient under a reception order against the patient's wishes, even though the friends approve of the treatment proposed; this uncertainty should be cleared up." Now, of course, they are raising a very difficult question, and we should like you to have in mind at this point what the ultimate application of any statutory power might be, if it was once laid down that the forcible administration of drugs was permissible. I do not suggest, of course, that that is what is in view, but I do want to press on you very strongly the danger that would arise if forcible administration of drugs were allowed by the law.

11.489. On this special matter of croton oil. I have been through the case of this patient, and I find that croton oil was administered on several occasions to him. Now what inference do you ask us to draw from that?—On the croton oil point I am going to show you that it was administered in different doses. I am going to suggest that whereas one minim might be a proper medicinal dose to start a treatment, if in fact he needed any treatment, where you find three minims given without any reasons attached to them, you get a clear indication of punitive treatment. The other aspect I want you to follow in this case is this system of seclusion—relegation to an inferior ward and seclusion. Shall we deal with croton oil first?

11.490. If you please?—On the 1st September he was in seclusion in a padded cell, where he remained five months "He threw a chamber at attendant A—to-day" and he was given a dose of croton oil. There is not necessarily any connection between those two things, except when you get repeated entries of that sort you find there is a connection. Then you pass on to the 23rd September "Put to bed again yesterday. Very threatening and resistive, accused the attendants of stealing things from him and tried to throw attendant H— while putting him to bed." Three minims of croton oil. We submit there that is almost irrefutable proof that croton oil is being administered as a punishment, carefully graduated in doses to meet the offence committed by the patient.

11.491. Sir David Drummond: It is just possible that constipation may have synchronised with the mental excitement?—That is a possibility, Sir David, but if you look at the medicine card you will find occasions on which a mild cathartic was prescribed, and I submit it is almost impossible that constipation should have synchronised on all these occasions with a breach of discipline.

11.492. Chairman: But, on the other hand, I notice an administration of croton oil does not always synchronise with bad behaviour. For instance, take the 14th August, 1919, "Very restless and abusive at times. Is in single room on account of his aggressive habits." There is no croton oil given to him when he is evidently behaving very violently?—I am afraid if you get to that stage when you administer croton oil on every occasion when violence is shown you would kill a man. I am asking you to assume that, when you find successive entries all dealing with those conditions. You will find another one, and it is the last one I am going to ask you to look at, the 2nd May, 1920, where again you get "Transferred yesterday to 11 ward" (that is the refractory ward) "has lately been exhibiting many signs of violence and struck M.O. in the face."—3 minims of croton oil. Now that dose was administered in the same month as the patient died.

11.493. Sir David Drummond: I might just point out at this stage that I have before me the record of the necropsy and with regard to the bowel I find:

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

"Small intestine healthy. Large intestine mucous membrane normal"—so that obviously there was no serious effect produced by croton oil on this patient?—I am not suggesting that these periodic doses would necessarily affect the mucous membrane; I am suggesting that croton oil was given in quantities to fit the crime unquestionably.

11,494. Chairman: But you are not doing yourself quite justice in this last instance, because you have given us the entry of the 2nd May, 1920, in which he struck the medical officer in the face. The dose of croton oil was given on the 1st May, 1920?—You will see the entry on the 2nd May begins "Transferred 'yesterday' to 11 ward," and I think the inference was he was transferred for striking the medical officer, and croton oil was given on the day he was transferred. That is a matter of inference, of course, but I think undoubtedly it all took place on the 1st May; and I think you have something there even worse than a drumhead court martial. There was no enquiry here. Then I want to take you to what, in my mind, is the most pathetic entry in this case, that is on the 13th May, "Became very excited yesterday making ridiculous statements as to his physical health not being attended to." I want to ask the medical Commissioners here whether they consider the treatment given to this patient was suitable for a heart patient. Of course I have not dealt with the treatment he received in full. Then it goes on "He suddenly went into a state of petit mal when speaking. This lasted fully five minutes. He has again stated that he will commit violence to Dr. W—— if he gets the chance." The evidence we have is that that man then or just before knew he was fighting for his sanity; he had been relegated to this separate cell for the second time, and he said when he went down "If I go back to this place I will lose my sanity," and I am afraid at this time he undoubtedly began to realise that his physical health was endangering his life; and, so far from being evidence of insanity, I do submit it is the most natural statement he could make that if he could get at the doctor who imposed these conditions upon him he would use violence. It is a statement with which I sympathise, and I expect every member of the Commission does too. He died on the 26th and the post mortem shows that he died from fatty degeneration of the heart.

11,495. Chairman: "He died from an epileptic fit while suffering from fatty degeneration of the heart and death was due to natural causes."—That is the Coroner's inquest?

11,496. Yes.—The medical report was only fatty degeneration. Then evidence was given at the inquest which coupled with it the epileptic fit. I do not want to say anything more; I think the documents speak for themselves there. The other point I want you to have before you is this relegation to a refractory ward, because this is the only case in which we have been able to obtain original documents, and it absolutely bears out what is again and again stated in all these proofs that any breach of discipline is, in fact, dealt with in this way. In this case, of course, the conditions were deplorable. This man had just under five months in a padded cell; he was deprived of everything; even the tooth brush, which figures on his medical card when he was first admitted, was removed from him; his spectacles were removed; he had no chair in the room.

11,497. Earl Russell: But surely, with that case book in front of you, you call that a bit more than a breach of discipline, do not you? He was apparently a very violent and dangerous patient?—On July 5th?

11,498. He seems to have been having his fits at times?—All the entry is that he was "abusive yesterday and complained of his food. To-day he refused his sedative mixture."

11,499. Chairman: I do not see from the case book that he was in a padded cell for five months. On the 5th July he is stated to be in the padded room. Then on the next day he is transferred to the refractory ward for administrative purposes?—He was then confined in a side room, and he was visited there frequently by Dr. White, who is present. You will see all the entries after that are "In bed," "In bed," which means on a mattress on the floor, and there is the evidence of Dr. White, who did visit this man, as to the exact conditions under which he remained there for five months.

Earl Russell: The best thing they can say about him before that is that he was rather less aggressive.

11,500. Mr. Micklem: How did you get these facts?—The documents were handed to me a fortnight ago by a certain newspaper which got them on discovery in a contemplated action. They had to be disclosed in an action, and that is the only method at present under which you can get access to any of these asylum documents.

11,501. Chairman: Reading the account of the case I must say it looks as if it were a case, a very pronounced case, of insanity from the outset. It starts at the very beginning on admission "He is suffering from insanity and epilepsy. He has strong delusions of a persecutory type and believes he was wrongfully arrested by the police because of revelations made to them by a friend in whom he placed confidence, and who although dead communicated with him by means of marks placed on newspaper articles; he suffers from epileptic fits of the major variety and after them becomes confused and irritable. He is in fair health."—I am not suggesting that he was wrongfully confined; I am suggesting that for a heart patient the treatment he received was most inappropriate, and I think I can make this clear to you. His five months isolation in this cell was only terminated by outside influence, and be it said to the credit of the medical superintendent that when Dr. White brought this case before the medical superintendent, as she did on the 6th December, 1919, he was at once removed from this solitary confinement back to his original ward.

Earl Russell: He seems to have been quite a dangerous patient.

11,502. Mr. Micklem: What was the action brought after his death?—It was a newspaper statement made which then gave rise to a libel action.

11,503. Mr. Snell: But your argument is that this administration of croton oil did somehow happen to synchronise with the fact that he had been guilty of indiscipline?—Yes, and all our evidence shows that that in some cases, or else relegation to inferior wards, always synchronises with such breaches of discipline, complaints or something of that sort.

11,504. That is really all you want to prove, is it not?—That is all I want to prove, and further here you have it administered in punitive quantities.

11,505. Chairman: Was the libel on the medical superintendent?—As a matter of fact a general statement was made in the paper about this case, and the asylum was identified.

11,506. Charging the medical superintendent with negligence?—And the medical superintendent took action. I have not got the statement here. It was setting out the details of this case, with no reference to croton oil.

11,507. Was the action withdrawn?—The action was stopped on terms that the evidence might be tendered to this Commission when it sat. I should not say "on terms," but the terms of the apology included that condition.

11,508. Did the person who made these observations about this asylum apologise for having done so?—No, the editor of the paper printed an apology.

11,509. Sir David Drummond: There are two points emerging from the papers submitted to us which I think I would like to draw your attention to. The first is with regard to the copy here of the medicine card—the first item is a gross error—it would have killed the patient straight away in all probability if he got that dose. I can only assume this was an error in copying, but it is just possible there may be other errors in it?—You have the original medical card before you.

9 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,510. In the copy it is eight times the dose that the patient actually got. The next point is that there is no evidence at all in the statement that the patient had fatty degeneration of the heart. It is obvious that the fat was external, fat outside the heart, and not fatty degeneration at all?—Of course, we do not profess to say whether having regard to the medical facts disclosed the treatment was suitable or not; we suggest it was not. That is a subsidiary point on which you have your own views, no doubt.

11,511. I say there is no evidence at all in the report of the necropsy that the patient had heart disease—or practically no evidence of it?—There is this entry just after he went in on June 14th, "Heart's action irregular."

11,512. That may be; that is a very common thing?—And there is the medical history of the case.

11,513. Chairman: We have the point on croton oil in this instance, and we have the point that the patient was more than once sent to the refractory ward?—He came up again on December 6th, and then he was sent back again.

Earl Russell: Prior to his death.

11,514. Chairman: I see on the 2nd May, 1920, he was transferred to Ward 11. Just on that, you agreed with me that discipline of course must be maintained in these institutions. The refractory ward sounds unpleasant. It is a ward, is it not, where the patients are under constant supervision. There are a number of them together in the ward, and there are certain attendants who must be there all the time?—I do not know whether that obtains in all asylums, but of course some of them have more than one refractory ward.

11,515. What is the particular point about it that you object to?—What we object to is that for a symptom, which we believe to be symptomatic of the patient's complaint, he is not only sent down to the inferior ward, but treated with solitary confinement for five months, and we suggest that that is not either necessary or proper treatment.

11,516. When you talk of an inferior ward it is a different ward, because it is a ward in which a different system of management obtains?—It is much more than that, is it not? It is a ward where the patient would be mixed with all sorts of more excitable cases.

11,517. The associations would be less pleasant. He would be with other patients of a violent character?—Yes.

11,518. I mean to say violent cases are congregated there and they are under observation. I do not quite see why you should say that that is a wrong form of discipline. You say to a man, "Now if you are going to be violent like this, you will have to go where all the other violent men are"?—But with respect those were not the conditions; the conditions were that this unfortunate patient had refused his food one day and the second day he refused his sedative. We do not know why he refused his food; he may have supposed it to have been drugged. Upon that he is first forcibly given a sedative—it is not a sedative at all, according to the medicine card, it is croton oil. If we are assuming anything we may assume he suspected he was being drugged again, and in those circumstances I think his refusing to take it was justified.

Chairman: We must take the whole story. He is described as restless, resistive and abusive.

11,519. Earl Russell: He was obviously on the face of that report a troublesome patient, was he not?—Yes.

11,520. Very troublesome?—I do not know about very troublesome, but is it not exactly the case where if you are giving medicinal treatment, you ought to be able to put it in charge of an attendant?

11,521. Why should he stop in a quiet ward and disturb it?—Why was he ever permitted to come back into that ward immediately attention was drawn to his position from outside?

Earl Russell: Because it was better?

11,522. Chairman: One of the things we have to aim at is to see that patients who are noisy are not left with the quieter ones. This unhappy gentleman seems rather to have classified himself as a violent person, because from the record it is quite obvious that he was at times a very violent and abusive person. Was it not right that he should be put with that class of person?—I think conceivably it was right to relegate him to another ward, but when that is coupled with a dose of this powerful drug, and when on top of that he is put into solitary confinement, as he was, then I submit that those conditions become very serious. I do not think they can be justified on medical grounds.

11,523. I think it is extremely difficult to draw an inference merely from a case paper?—I would not attempt to draw the inference from that particular case, but as you go through your entries you find croton oil and this sort of thing always synchronising.

11,524. You find there that on several occasions in this hospital to this patient there was administered croton oil; and you find that the administration of croton oil coincides with outbursts of violence, from which you ask us to draw the inference that it was given to him, not for medicinal purposes, but for punishment?—That is the point.

(The Witness withdrew.)

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

MR. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER, recalled and further examined.

11,525. Chairman: Mr. Parker, I think we shall be able to cover the rest of your précis to-day?—I hope so.

11,526. Last night when we adjourned you had been making your point to us upon the abuse of drugs, that is to say, the use of drugs, not for their proper and legitimate purpose of treatment, but for punitive purposes, and you had given us an illustration, supported by documents, to show that the apprehension that such cases did occur was founded on instances which have come to your knowledge?—That is so. May I say this, that the inference we have drawn from a great number of cases was confirmed by the first case with actual documents attached which came before us.

11,527. On this subject of croton oil I do not know that we need delay very much for this reason, which I ventured to put yesterday, that I was much more impressed with the fact that in the Cobb Report it appeared, I think, that in no less than 15 hospitals it was not used, from which I in turn drew an inference that if 15 institutions can do without this very strong drug, there does not seem any particular reason why it should be necessary to other institutions?—I quite agree.

11,528. That was the inference that naturally one drew. Of course we shall have the assistance of our medical colleagues on the question of the utility of the drug in any case. On that you very properly say you do not tender evidence as a medical man. But from a general point of view it does seem to me very significant that quite a large number of institutions find it unnecessary to resort to it for any purpose, medical or punitive. But what would be the best form of recommendation to make? One might take the course of saying that certain drugs should not be used in any institution?—We feel that is quite a medical question.

11,529. I quite agree. I do not know that it would be fitting for us to exclude one of the drugs which is in the British Pharmacopœia from use?—Quite; but we urge this point very strongly, that having regard to the use of drugs that has been disclosed, we do submit that the total amount of drugs used in asylums should be the subject of an annual return, as it would afford a check upon the treatment carried out in various institutions.

11,530. The suggestion you are making is very much on the lines of what was running through my own mind, that what is really wanted is a series of regulations of a much more precise character dealing with the use of drugs in asylums, which would, no doubt, involve records and returns, but one wants to get at the start the control of the use of drugs.

Earl Russell: That would be within the powers of the Board of Control.

Chairman: Yes, or at any rate within the enhanced powers of the Board of Control.

Witness: I think it is in their powers now to call for such an annual return.

Chairman: I want to go further: that they should be given more executive powers over the use of drugs.

11,531. Sir David Drummond: Over what period did these 15 institutions not use croton oil?—I think I can give you the reference. It is in the Appendix to the Cobb Report.

11,532. Chairman: It is a thing that struck me very much when I read it?—Page 114, I think, is the reference.

11,533. Thank you.—There are various schedules. The first is Schedule D. That was a test of two weeks, one in 1921 and the other in 1922, and it was from an analysis of those returns that I found two of these institutions showed large weekly doses. Those are the institutions marked "G" and "P."

11,534. Sir David Drummond: Yes, I have it here.—And others one or two doses weekly, and in 15 cases none used.

11,535. What I mean to say is over what period was none used. There must have been a time when it was used in these institutions, and then it was given up. Do you know that?

Mr. Walter Stewart: It is at the top. "Weeks ending 13th July, 1921, and the 5th February, 1922."

Chairman: Then it is only a return for the week.

Witness: Those are two test weeks taken.

11,536. Sir David Drummond: That was after Dr. Lomax's book was published?—That is so.

Sir David Drummond: That is to say, when the matter was ventilated and made public the various institutions enquired whether they could do without it

Chairman: That is quite true

Sir David Drummond: I think we ought to have that before us.

Chairman: And also it is quite right to have in mind, as Mr. Stewart pointed out, that these were weeks taken, I presume, at random, but at the same time very short periods.

Sir Ernest Hiley: You will see a remark on page 115 about another mental hospital as to croton oil: "None used for 10 years."

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Chairman: Yes.

Witness: Then, if you turn over to page 116 you will find a report on a Metropolitan mental hospital, about three-quarters of the way down: "Croton oil, 1919, 1 ounce; 1920, 2 ounces (capsules); 1921, nil." That is a full three years' return. Then on the next page, there is a Welsh mental hospital. There the analysis is under two heads for the same years, 1919 to 1921. Under part A none; under Part B 1 ounce.

11,537. Chairman: And the next institution had half an ounce in three years?—Yes.

11,538. Sir David Drummond: They are giving it up, as it were, and it naturally will be given up in the course of time?—Undoubtedly.

11,539. Chairman: In the case of one or two institutions which I have been to, I went specially to the dispensary to make that enquiry myself, naturally; and in one it was not known at all. The dispenser said, "I do not think we have any." It certainly had not been dispensed by him.—We quite agree that that is the position. Of course, in the asylums disclosed there, there is a use in about 10 per cent.—that is the point. That being so, one looks with alarm at that other case I put before you of the Prestwich asylum, where the use of it was so prodigious, running to 2,400 doses a year. Of course, we do not know whether that has stopped since 1921; but the reason we bring that case before you is that we want to base on it a criticism on the whole type of enquiry which takes place on these abuses. I hope you will listen to the evidence on that because it seems to us that it is most serious that where Commissioners are sent up, as they were in that case to Prestwich, to report on a definite period of time, that is, the end of 1917 to the summer of 1919—that is a period when Dr. Lomax was there—their investigations should be directed to quite a different period, and that people in that responsible position should put their names to a report which is set out in this Cobb Appendix, and which suggests that croton oil is not being used in bulk, and that its use is decreasing very rapidly.

11,540. I am satisfied even on the Cobb Report itself, however, that croton oil was being used in large quantities in that particular institution.—Of course, that is established by the report. What alarms us, and I think alarms the public, is the clear proof that though the Commissioner's minds were directed to this point the report they gave shirked all the issues. *That is a very serious suggestion to make, but we are prepared to show that from the report. We do not necessarily impugn the bona fides of the two Commissioners who signed that report, but we do impugn the adequacy of their investigation.

11,541. I do not know that we are here to sit in judgment upon another Committee, and how it chose to conduct its affairs. Our business is to see that we conduct our affairs satisfactorily.—Exactly. It is that administration which raises so many issues. If on a clear question of fact of this sort you get a responsible body shirking all the issues, what weight are you to put on their report on more debatable matters?

11,542. Earl Russell: What you are suggesting, to put it at the lowest, is that the Board of Control did not function adequately in this case?—Clearly not.

11,543. Chairman: Mr. Parker is entitled to make the point that it is illustrative. His criticisms on this report are illustrative of his general criticisms of the way in which investigations are carried out by the Board of Control?—Yes. It goes to the whole root of the administration; and if I may add this—I put my personal view—on a reading of the Cobb Report, and a reading of Dr. Lomax's book, I was so struck by the unfairness of the comments, and the bias shown by that report, that it was largely that which led me to devote a great deal of time to an investigation of the subject.

11,544. I have said already that I did not think it would be fitting for us, sitting as a Royal Commission with very different powers, to enter upon the question as to whether a Departmental Committee did, or did not, discharge its duty properly. You are perfectly entitled to say that that kind of enquiry is of very little public value?—That is the point.

Chairman: We have read it, and we are also to have the advantage of Dr. Lomax's reply to this report. These people, I think, must be allowed to fight out their own dispute upon it.

11,545. Earl Russell: (To the witness.) What you mean is that it shakes public confidence in the protection afforded by the Board of Control?—Absolutely.

11,546. Chairman: That comment I appreciate?—I assume this in their favour, that perhaps that report was signed by these two Commissioners without a full investigation, which might be wrong; but I do comment very severely on the fact that when you have another committee, the Cobb Committee, that had the fact brought to their attention that Commissioners say the use of croton oil is declining, and then they get evidence put before them which shows that the actual use is about three times that quantity. . . .

11,547. May I bring this to a point? I think I can help you. So far as the report is concerned it is a report made by a Departmental Committee appointed by the Minister of Health. Three gentlemen are appointed to it, two of whom are well-known mental alienists, and one of whom we have seen here already. Upon that of course the question of the adequacy or inadequacy of the report is a matter between the Minister and the persons he has selected to make that report. But where I think you may venture to make your comment perhaps with some force is on a report which is contained in an appendix to that document, and which is a report by two members of the Board of Control. That is a different point, if I may say so. In the appendix there is on page 89 a report by Dr. Bond and Dr. Rotherham, upon their visit to Prestwich asylum on various days, and in that report they deal with a number of the topics in Dr. Lomax's book. If I may say so, I think the criticism you are entitled to make there is: This is a report by two members of the Board of Control, and you are entitled to say, if you please, that having read that report you think that the public may well question the independence of these gentlemen in carrying out their particular investigation?—Yes. I can put the point quite shortly. You will see on page 93 that, having been requested to direct their attention to Dr. Lomax's period, the end of 1917 to the summer of 1919, they go out of their way to set out figures for the year 1914, for April 1917 to September 1917—(those are the two periods when Dr. Lomax was not there)—and then for the first six months of Dr. Lomax's presence there, October 1917 to March 1918; and they give the figures for these three periods of 6 months: 540 doses used in the first period, 396 in the second, 333 in the third, and then in brackets "(of which Dr. Lomax prescribed 253)." Now the only inference which anybody can draw from those figures is that the use of croton oil was declining, and that if it had not been for Dr. Lomax himself prescribing it, its use would be almost negligible in the last period.

11,548. Earl Russell: At the same time it is a legitimate comment, if it is true, that Dr. Lomax himself prescribed the enormous proportion of doses?—That is a point, and I am going to suggest to

* Note.—Since giving evidence Mr. Parker has informed the Commission that, after communicating with the Board of Control, the National Society for Lunacy Reform are satisfied that the figures quoted by the Commissioners in their Report on Prestwich Asylum were meant to have reference to that part of the Asylum with which Dr. Lomax was concerned only, and not to the whole Asylum, and that the six months periods selected by them for comparison, which seemed irrelevant, were selected in good faith.

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

you that it is a most unfair suggestion to make. When they made that report, if they had directed their enquiries to it, they would have known what subsequently came out, that the purchases in 1919 were 2995 two minim doses (I am quoting now from page 112) and 1,000 half minimum doses; that is 3,995 doses in 1919. Those are authenticated figures from the Ministry of Health, and I do submit that is one of the years they are asked to report upon.

11,549. Mr. Mickleth: Does not that report cover the whole of the time they were directed to report upon?—Their report does not.

11,550. It only touches six months of it?—In only touches the first six months. When one knows that in the last year of Dr. Lomax's residence there were figures available to them showing purchases of nearly 4,000 doses a year, I submit it is the most amazing thing that people in a responsible position could have put forward that report. I am assuming they did it in ignorance of the facts, and I submit it is a question for this Commission to ascertain from those gentlemen who was responsible for giving them such misleading facts. I want also to make this further observation that when these facts were disclosed before the Cobb Committee some seven months later, it is inconceivable to me as a member of the public that no comment should be made upon them; but they were all side tracked; the Cobb Committee does not attempt to deal with them. That is, on the issue of the consumption. There is one other point which I very much want to put before you. Of course the real gravamen of Dr. Lomax's criticism on this particular point was that this drug was administered in the food to patients. Now the Commissioners do not attempt to deal with that point. When you turn to the Cobb Report, they pick many less important points out of Dr. Lomax's evidence, but they do not attempt to deal with that point; and we feel that it is probably the most important point in his criticism; that if, in fact, it is established, as we believe it will be established, to your satisfaction, that it is a regular medical practice to administer drugs in the food, the least that should be done is that that should be admitted. Of course you get there the basis of what is always urged as an indication of insanity, namely, the patients saying their food is poisoned. Croton oil is a poison; if used to any excess it is a very virulent poison, and though its use is being discontinued, I have not the slightest doubt in my mind that for years it has been the practice in all asylums to administer croton oil in food. I do not want to enlarge on the cruelty of that system; it may be necessary in some cases, in very rare cases, but we all know the sort of results in a household if food does get contaminated, if cooking utensils are not clean, or anything like that; it disorganises a household; people will refuse food for weeks afterwards, because they think that is the cause of their trouble. I do submit most strongly that in asylums, where the food is not too adequate, it is a terrible position that patients should acquire the knowledge that their food is drugged, and, as Dr. Lomax says, for days they will look at their food until they are forced by hunger to take it. Once you start that suspicion in their minds, where are you going to stop it?

11,551. Sir David Drummond: Is it your contention that drugs should not be administered in food?—I do not think we can go as far as that; it is a medical question. I do not know that we can say in all cases that the patient should be told. Obviously in some cases he should not be told, but I think it should be done with very great care.

11,552. Earl Russell: It is not the normal practice to administer drugs in food?—It is not.

11,553. Chairman: One knows of advertisements in which people are recommended to try it?—The case I put before you yesterday is quite typical. The patient refuses his food one day; he refuses his sedative the next; he is given it forcibly by tube at once; it is not a sedative, as entered in the case book; it is croton oil.

11,554. I think we appreciate the point, Mr. Parker. The question really is: What is the best method of eliminating the risk of abuse? That is always the question one must focus one's attention upon. It does rather seem to me that the best remedy without an undue interference in the clinical treatment of cases, is by regulation, and, as you suggest reports and returns as to the quantity of each drug which is used, and probably more stringent rules as to the keeping of records in dispensaries, and as to the issuing of drugs on the doctor's prescription in each case. Of course there is a good deal of that already. How far it is carried out is a different matter. Possibly more stringent regulation in that respect, checked by returns, affords the best safeguard. I do not think mere returns by themselves are adequate. They would merely tell you what had been done; but we want more than that surely?—We want much more than that. The first point is this: Is it to go forth as the definite medical view that for adequate treatment they must have permission to administer drugs in food? That is the first point to clear up. It has been denied in a great many quarters; I do not know whether by responsible people it is denied, but we should like to know whether that is the medical point of view, that adequate treatment does entail the drugging of food. If it does, then of course we shall submit that that drugging of food must only take place under the most careful restrictions.

11,555. I think it would be very difficult to lay down an absolute rule in a matter of that sort, because a very common delusion on the part of a patient is that he is being poisoned, and also a great difficulty in the treatment of these cases is their resistance to treatment.—We recognise that.

11,556. You want, of course, to get as little antagonism between the doctor and the patient and the nurse as possible. No doubt it is a concealed method of treatment to put the drugs in the food, but in that way it may be possible to get an otherwise recalcitrant person to take what is a most important medicine for him.—It is very difficult, I realise, to draw the line. There must be a type of case that will resist. But we submit that far the greater number of cases are people who are quite competent to say whether they wish to take these drugs or not. Again we come back to the issue raised by the British Medical Association: Is it to be legal in asylums to give drugs?

11,557. Earl Russell: I understand that in private panel practice the patients clamour for medicine?—It depends upon the medicine.

11,558. Chairman: We have your view upon that point, Mr. Parker. I would only make one observation on the Cobb Report, and particularly on the passages to which you have referred. I appreciate your criticism; of course one sees at once the point of your criticism. I am going to make the general observation that the elucidation of this whole topic is very liable to become controversial. I do not think there is any topic that is so exposed to controversy as this one. I am afraid it is a tendency of human nature that if attacks are made, if I may say so, sometimes in unmeasured language, the defence is liable to be in the same tone; and one knows so well, from controversies in other regions, that if you abuse a man he becomes abusive in return; and, instead of getting what you really want to get, a calm consideration of the whole situation, the merits of the dispute are often lost in what we may call a desire to score and obtain a victory one over the other, as the case be.—I think you have summarised the position exactly, if I may say so.

11,559. It has been our endeavour in this very important enquiry to try and eliminate as far as possible what one may call exaggerations, and to get the facts in the mood which is appropriate for reform, which is a calm and deliberative mood. I do not think I am paying you an undue compliment when I say that you have assisted us very much by

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

the attitude you have adopted throughout these proceedings, because you have dealt with each of the topics exactly in that spirit; but at the same time one must make a certain amount of allowance for persons who are attacked sometimes in unmeasured language, and in human nature you will find a certain amount of unfairness on each side.—I am the first to admit that on both sides.

11,560. And therefore for our present purpose my endeavour, and the endeavour of us all, is to approach these very difficult and anxious questions really with as calm a judgment as one can possibly import into them, and to eliminate the “stunt” element altogether. I am sure you appreciate that?—I do.

Sir David Drummond: I think before passing away from this croton oil question it should be pointed out that croton oil is not the only drastic purgative that is employed. We are dealing with it on the assumption that it is the only one used. There are others which are just as drastic.

11,561. Chairman: Yes, but I think Mr. Parker was using croton oil as an illustration of the way in which the use of drugs may be abused in institutions for punitive purposes, or administered in undesirable ways.—That is so.

Sir David Drummond: There is no evidence that those hospitals treated their patients in this way.

Chairman: We have a record of some of the drugs used.

11,562. Sir David Drummond: None of the purgatives were used at all—just the sedatives?—If I may say so, I quite recognise that the object is to effect an improvement, and that except for drawing attention to particular points it is not much use criticising what is past; our whole efforts are to provide for the future.

11,563. Chairman: Do not minimise your own point, if I may say so. We can only learn from past experience. Past experience is the best index of the points at which the present system is defective?—Surely, the only index.

11,564. But upon this point even laymen know that the use of purgatives is very necessary in asylum treatment because of the condition of life there, and also because, of course (again I speak as a layman) purgatives are one of the methods of removing the toxins which are often the cause or accompaniment of mental disturbance. You selected croton oil, I take it, simply because it was a very conspicuous drug, and a very violent drug?—Yes, and I think an objectionable drug as far as one can judge as a layman; that is to say, unnecessarily violent, and I think medical opinion confirms that.

11,565. But Sir David's point is this, I take it, that suppose croton oil were forbidden altogether, shall we say an unscrupulous dispenser might use some other purgative known to the British Pharmacopœia which might be just as unpleasant?—There are such purgatives, I believe, but can they be administered in the same way?

11,566. Sir David Drummond: On yes, just in the same way?—In food?

Sir David Drummond: Yes, administered practically in the same way.

Earl Russell: The limits of medical ingenuity are not reached, Mr. Parker.

Chairman: Yes, but Mr. Parker has a general point which we quite appreciate. Of course, Sir David's point is a sound one: that regulation must not merely take the form of a substitution of some other equally violent and offensive drug as croton oil.

Witness: Quite.

11,567. There we have your general point on the use of medicines. Now let us pass on to a number of other points. You have mentioned quite a number of miscellaneous topics, and I daresay there is no harm in taking them in their order. You pass on to the subject of latrines?—Yes. Just on the question of purgatives generally I want to draw your attention to this—of course it is somewhat the same point—that the practice does apparently prevail, and prevails to the knowledge of the Board of Control though they do not approve of it, in certain institutions, of giving weekly doses of purgatives, whether they are required or not, from stock bottles.

11,568. It sounds a little like Dotheboy's Hall?—It does, that passed through my mind. It is a survival of an old practice which was considered useful. Now, Sir, in certain asylums that leads regularly to very violent scenes. We propose in our evidence to put that before you, that this weekly dosing, whether it is required or not, is most objectionable to patients, and I am referring to both men and women in this connection. There again it should be stopped, and particularly in a matter of that sort as a layman I see no sort of justification for forcing a purgative upon a patient.

11,569. Indiscriminately?—Indiscriminately, or except in very urgent cases at all. I daresay medical men will not quite agree with that, but I mean in the normal case where a man is not in extremis in any way the individual is a good judge as to whether he requires a purgative or not. It has been urged that croton oil and such things are invaluable in certain extreme cases, but in the normal life of the individual, we submit it is rather a serious proposition that you shall not only give a purgative, but that you shall be entitled to give it if necessary by throwing a man on his back and pouring it down his throat, which is what in fact happens.

11,570. There are some people who unfortunately are very careless about their habits; and mental disturbance, I understand, is rather closely associated with auto-intoxication through failure to remove the spent products from the body?—Quite.

11,571. Take the case of a patient, let us say, whose bowels fail to move for a day or two—

Sir David Drummond: Six weeks sometimes.

11,572. Chairman: Of course that would be one of the obstinate cases, but taking the more normal case of a person who for two or three days has failed to evacuate his bowels, he might say: “I will not take your medicine.” What are you to do in that case? Are you just to allow him to go on accumulating and let the case get worse?—No. Of course we recognise that there must be a point at which the doctor is justified in interfering. May I give you a quotation on this from the Board of Control Report on page 136?

11,573. If you please.—They say: “In examining into certain of the records that are kept I found that aperient medicines are issued to the wards in large stock bottles, and are given to the patients without any written medical order. This is a matter that requires immediate attention, and I draw attention to it”—they give the name. There is another reference of the same sort at the bottom of page 240: “Aperient medicines are still issued to the wards in stock bottles, and are given to patients on a general medical order. This system appears to me to be open to considerable abuse, and I would again urge that only the doses ordered by writing by a medical officer should be sent to the wards”. Of course these are exceptional cases, and the Board of Control quite fairly see the abuse.

11,574. Earl Russell: There one might be entirely with you, but you must remember that in all ordinary lectures on health the importance of internal cleanliness is impressed upon you, and particularly so, as the Chairman says, in these cases which are largely cases of auto-intoxication.—Yes, I am trying to put before you the routine administration without medical order. I say that should be stopped. It does, in fact, lead to violence, and is the beginning in some of our cases of a sort of downward course; the patient becomes resistive.

11,575. Chairman: Of course it is quite improper that 50 people should all receive the same dose on the same day in the week, because their conditions would vary infinitely. One patient may be a person whose habits are perfectly regular, and that that patient should receive the same dose as a confirmed constipated case is not in conformity with the regimen at all?—Quite; and throughout our evidence I do not think I am putting it too high when I say that the majority of institutions did practise that. Of course some of our evidence goes back a great number of years. I believe that authority is now setting its face against it very sternly.

11,576. Again, one always has to deal with the cases of backward institutions. What we have recognised throughout has been that many of the institutions in this country are in the vanguard of reform; but then you have to legislate in this matter, as in all matters, not for the people who are willing to do right and are anxious to improve themselves, but for people who are recalcitrant.—Exactly. I quite recognise that it is an administrative point, and with a directing central body it will no doubt be altered.

11,577. If the gentlemen making this report had not only drawn the attention of the Board of Control to the matter, but had said: "This is a case in which an effective direction should be issued to that hospital that no such treatment is to continue and that for the future every purgative dose is to be prescribed for and given to the patient who requires it"—of course if they had power to do that kind of thing, then your purpose would be achieved?—Yes, and there is one more point I should like to make. In one asylum I visited I found that there was a very strict rule that all doses not utilised for any purpose had to be returned to the dispensary the same night. That should be a regulation undoubtedly, because it goes to the root of another point, where these drugs may accumulate in wards and then are put to improper use by the attendants.

11,578. In that way I think you complete the circle?—Quite.

11,579. May we pass now to the question of the use of latrines?—With regard to latrines, we wish to draw your attention to two points; one is that, generally speaking, we believe the accommodation is still inadequate, and that is recognised by the authorities now. Secondly, there does seem to be an extraordinary practice of locking the latrines at stated periods in many institutions and also of reserving certain ones, which are not, I believe, meant for the use of the attendants, for their use. Both those points are brought out.

11,580. Earl Russell: During what sort of hours in the morning do you mean they are locked?—Apparently from 9 to 11 it is quite a common thing to lock the latrines. Of course, especially when purgatives are being given, a routine order of that sort becomes ridiculous.

Chairman: I cannot see why access to these places should not be available at all times.

11,581. Mr. Snell: Do you suggest they may be locked and yet an attendant is available to open them?—We distinctly suggest that. I have one case in mind where a patient wished to go to the latrine as it was in course of being locked, and the attendant declined to let him in; he said: "No, my rule is to lock this at 9 o'clock."

11,582. May not this important administrative point be involved that the latrines have to be watched a good deal?—I agree. That man went to the head attendant and told him that his case was one of urgent necessity and the reply was: "Oh, you are a cantankerous sort of fellow and you can wait." Of course, that waiting had deplorable results which were at once reported. The patient was taken before the doctor, the attendants were sent for; they did not deny it; they referred to their instructions, and the patient thought that concluded the matter. Not a bit of it. The same evening, when he went back to his ward from the exercising court he found himself relegated to the wet and dirty ward, where he remained for upwards of a month in the most disgusting surroundings. That is a very serious state of things.

Chairman: I think so. I can see no reason at all why a patient should not have access to the necessary places as and when required. Of course, as Mr. Snell has said, we quite recognise that they have to be under observation no doubt.

Earl Russell: In some cases, in suicidal cases and cases of that sort, but a great many do not require observing.

11,583. Chairman: There is this difficulty, of course—it arises in civil life outside asylums altogether. One knows that the use of these places has to be regulated in all factories, because it is not unknown that a workman may spend a quarter of an hour even in the uncongenial atmosphere of a latrine smoking a cigarette and reading the sporting news.—I can assure you it was not unknown in the Army.

11,584. And there is, of course, the difficulty that some of the patients might like to linger in these uncongenial surroundings for an undue time, not for the real purposes of Nature but for other purposes. That, of course, is just one of the difficulties you have to face in dealing with an abnormal population, but your main point is that where Nature requires an outlet an outlet must be provided?—Quite, and it should be an appropriate outlet.

11,585. But while there may be a morning drill of this sort, and it may be that the places have to be closed for a certain time for cleaning and so on, the effective point seems to me to be that any person should be entitled to go to the attendant and say they require the use of this place, and that the attendant's duty should be to make it available?—Yes, I think that is the reason, if one analyses it; it is for administrative purposes in order to prepare them for the usual morning inspection.

11,586. The place must be cleaned, of course?—Yes.

11,587. Earl Russell: Mr. Parker means a little more than that. He means it may be shown nice and tidy when the inspectors come round.—I think that is the reason they are closed, in order that they may be prepared for the morning inspection.

11,588. Chairman: You find in every institution that people have to brace themselves up for the morning inspection?—Yes, but I do think if it entails closing for long hours, the inspection should not require that; they should be reasonably clean and not in a spotless condition. It is not much good closing a place for two hours, and then opening it and saying, "This is its normal condition."

11,589. One of the complaints I have come across in a certain number of cases—though I do not think you allude to it—is that in these places sanitary paper is not provided?—We have numerous complaints of that sort.

11,590. On that subject I made one or two inquiries, but the real difficulty is this: if you put one of those attractive rolls of paper in a latrine it seems to have an irresistible fascination for many patients who proceed to unroll the whole of it in the room, while others take it away in large quantities and use it for correspondence. Difficulties of that sort, although they sound trivial, seem to be the real difficulties. Apparently the practice in some institutions is that the paper is provided for the patient when the patient goes in—a limited quantity of paper. I do not quite know how one is going to get over that difficulty?—I think that is the solution. Of course, one realises that it entails a great deal of extra trouble, but still the alternative is a very horrible one, and I think that trouble should be taken. If you cannot control a general issue, I think it is obvious that there should be a personal issue.

Earl Russell: I think you must serve it out in limited quantities.

Chairman: I think that is how it is done in well-ordered institutions.

Earl Russell: Of course one recognises that it means more trouble for the attendants, and you have always got to put a little pressure on when more trouble is involved.

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Chairman: But apparently it cannot be met by putting supplies in these places in the same way as in an ordinary railway lavatory.

Witness: One realises that. I think if it were available on demand at any time, that would meet it. 11,591. However, though a small point, it is just one of those little things that in the life of the asylum may give rise to great grievances?—It does.

11,592. It is a sort of thing that may be dwelt upon and magnified into a very great grievance?—It is a matter of daily necessity, of course. That is the point.

11,593. Now the next point is a very large issue, and that is the question of discipline in these institutions. As you recognise, discipline has to be maintained in them, and persons in charge have a difficult task in that respect. What is your general view of the policy in this matter?—The first thing that strikes us is this: In the total absence of any statutory provision discipline is necessary—I mean, punishment may be necessary in an asylum; it seems quite obvious that in certain cases it must be necessary—control and even punishment. That leads us to this point: what percentage of the patients in an institution are capable of appreciating punishment? We believe that quite a large number of patients in any institution are quite capable of appreciating the necessity for punishment.

11,594. Of course, retributive punishment is quite out of place in an asylum. Reformatory punishment may be appropriate and necessary?—Exactly.

11,595. Earl Russell: I should like to know what you mean by “punishment”?—Of course we realise that a great many acts are due to the condition of the patient, but there are cases of outbreaks undoubtedly which in our view would merit punishment of some sort.

11,596. Chairman: It is not the punitive idea so much as this:—that you want to introduce motives into minds which may be imperfectly organised minds but still are susceptible of understanding things up to a point. You want to introduce a motive for good conduct. You may induce good conduct by rewards, and you may induce good conduct also by deterrents. That puts it in a sentence, does it not?—That puts it.

11,597. Rewards, as one knows, are to some extent resorted to. There are certain special facilities given; more liberty is given for one thing; that is a big thing; liberty is given to the well-behaved patients to go about the grounds and, indeed, to go out of the place altogether sometimes?—Yes.

11,598. And small rewards, such as a ration of tobacco for the men or tea for the ladies, and things of that sort. That is a system of rewards. The motive of getting some little comfort or luxury is a motive, I take it, that a very large number of the inhabitants of asylums can appreciate quite well, notwithstanding that their minds may be disordered?—I am sure they do.

11,599. The other aspect of it is rather the question of a deterrent with which your précis is concerned. The minds of these patients, like the minds of people outside asylums, may be deterred from doing wrong by fear of punishment. Punishment may be a much more difficult thing to administer fairly when you are dealing with persons whose conduct is not necessarily due to wickedness or naughtiness, but due to symptoms actually of their pathological condition?—Quite.

11,600. I take it that the only legitimate use of punishment is to introduce that motive into the mind of the patient—that he must not do certain things which are subversive of discipline, because unpleasant consequences will follow?—I agree.

11,601. What forms of punishment in that sense—deterrent punishment—are in your view legitimate?—We feel that one has to look at the present system first, and there the arbiters on questions of this sort are any of the junior doctors or possibly right up to the medical superintendent, though that is rare apparently; and we think it is a very deplorable thing that the doctor in charge of the case, whose whole purpose is to build up a personal contact with the patient, should be the person to administer the punishment. He may be the person to report on the conditions which merit punishment, but it does seem to us that he should not be the person to administer it. Then, of course, we look round to see if there is anybody who would be in a more available position. The first thing that strikes one is that on questions of serious insubordination the visiting committee might function. As far as our evidence goes in those matters, they never do. Punishment seems to take this form—a loss of privileges, seclusion, or relegation to a lower ward. That does not take you very far. We look on relegation to a lower ward as a deplorable form of punishment. It is setting back the patient's recovery by just so long as he is kept there—by putting him in very terrible surroundings.

11,602. Earl Russell: Not necessarily?—Well, I am quoting again from a great mass of evidence that when patients, as they think unjustly, for some trivial offence at any rate, are relegated to lower conditions, it is the most irritating and demoralising experience.

11,603. Yes, you talk now of a case where it is done unjustly and lightly, but you can think of cases where it is a proper thing?—Where the classification of the case demands it, obviously.

11,604. Chairman: Suppose you have—and one has seen it—an institution where classification is carried out as far as it can be under existing conditions, and you have one group of patients who have their own ward and who are for the most part well-behaved, quiet people, conducting themselves very reasonably. One of those patients unfortunately (it may be due to a purely pathological condition) becomes violent, abusive and obscene. You would be the first to recognise the undesirability of that patient remaining among the others. That patient must be relegated to another ward and consequently re-classification takes place; the re-classification will take him to the refractory ward because that is the very place where these people are, but he will resent that very much indeed possibly. What is to be done?—In that case one can make no comment; he is properly re-classified. We are on the type of case where there is milder insubordination. When the Harnett case was before the Courts it was a matter of very great interest. In one case a patient who was, in our view, quite fit to be set at liberty, made some incautious remarks in the ward he was in, criticising the asylum administration; he went down the same night back to the refractory ward—insubordination!

11,605. Earl Russell: Are you quite sure that is all he did?—I hope he will be one of the next witnesses before you. It is a point upon which you will form your own judgment. Personally I had him under very close observation for some months after he came out, and I am satisfied that he was detained much longer than was necessary.

11,606. Chairman: Of course, so much depends upon how that is done. If it is a question of a patient criticising the institution, that is one thing; but if it is a case of a patient starting an agitation, it is another thing?—Exactly, one sees that difficulty.

11,607. You know how very easily you may set fire to the tow in such cases. I mean comparatively small things may give rise to very grave difficulties in matters of discipline?—I fully recognise that side of it and that is why I say it must be a difficult thing to maintain discipline in an asylum, but I question whether the present method is the best method of maintaining it, the method by which the doctor only has those remedies available to him.

11,608. Of course there must be a great many comparatively small things from day to day with regard to which it would not be appropriate to call in the visiting committee. Suppose a female patient became a little violent and flung a teacup in the attendant's face (that does happen, one knows), and the appropriate remedy was to say: “Well, you will not get your allowance of tea next week”; it would be rather using a steam hammer to crack nuts to bring in a couple of members of the visiting committee to adjudicate upon such a matter. It is just like one of those things which in a nursery have to be dealt with there and then?—I am not suggesting that, but when you come to the more serious breaches which do seem to entail relegation to lower wards and confinement sometimes for very long periods without books or anything, we say it is more drastic treatment than any prison would give.

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,609. Let us take seclusion now. Seclusion, I understand, ought not to be allowed and is not allowed except on the order of the medical officer in charge of the case. Is not that so?—We find it very difficult to ascertain what seclusion really is. Apparently it is a term the exact definition for which is again under consideration.

11,610. Let us take the sort of normal case of seclusion—what you have seen and we have all seen—the removal of a patient from the general company and the placing of the patient in a side room or, if necessary, in a padded cell in solitary confinement. That is the typical seclusion, of course?—Yes.

11,611. Is it not in practice only permitted where the medical officer in charge of the case directs it to be done?—I think that in an emergency an attendant would take those steps, but it is then confirmed by the medical officer. Our point, however, is rather this, that the confirmation takes place on the statement of the attendant. The medical officer coming round in the evening hears that So-and-So has been insubordinate, has shown signs of violence, and has been put in seclusion. Now there does not in a great number of cases appear to be any investigation of those facts. In fact, a lot of our evidence shows that it is a personal matter between the patient and the attendant, and the attendant is empowered to take this action, and I am afraid it is very often confirmed offhand. There the patient remains for an indefinite time until somebody thinks—it may be a month or six weeks or three months—it is time that he went up to a better ward again.

11,612. Earl Russell: Surely the doctor would consider the next day and the day after whether he was quiet enough to be let out again?—One would suppose so, but our evidence shows again and again that seclusion does take place, or confinement does take place, for very lengthy periods for apparently very trivial reasons. May I give you a definition of "seclusion"? The only one I have been able to find is in the 54th Report of the Board of Control, and it is there defined as "the enforced isolation of a patient by day between the hours of 7 a.m. and 7 p.m. by closing by any means whatsoever the doors of the room in which the patient is." It is quoted in the Cobb Report also at page 36. The point there, you notice, is whether the door is closed, and we get a great deal of evidence of people being in confinement but the door is left open, and it crosses one's mind whether those cases are entered in the asylum records as cases of seclusion.

11,613. I suppose you would not object to a case of seclusion which I saw in one asylum; it was rather a refractory ward. There were a dozen patients at tea, fairly quiet, and there was one man in bed in a side room with the door open, very noisy and shouting all the time; apparently the patients having tea were taking no notice, but of course he really was secluded; he would not have been allowed to leave his room. You would not object to that, would you?—Would his case be entered on the records as "secluded"?

11,614. That I cannot tell you.—That is the important point. All through these Board of Control reports you get a special report on seclusion, that it took place for so many hours during 12 months; and one cannot help wondering how many cases are in fact entered, and how many cases there are where you may get weeks or months of seclusion which are not considered technically seclusion, because the door is not closed.

11,615. Chairman: That point is at present under consideration in Regulations which are being revised by the Board of Control. The criterion of seclusion is the difficulty, and the question whether a person is secluded with the door open or locked or on the latch—all these refinements enter into it. I suppose you would have to have a very precise definition of what is "seclusion" in order that the returns should be reliable?—There is a comment by an attendant who had long experience—the man from whose statement I quoted yesterday. This refers to a registered hospital, and he says: "Patients would be placed in side rooms (in seclusion) upon the reports of the attendants, without any proper inquiry by the doctors. The patients were in the attendant's power. According to the Commissioners' Rules patients were not supposed to be kept in strict seclusion for lengthy periods during the day. The doors of the side rooms are supposed to be left open. This rule would be ignored, and patients kept in the side rooms with the door shut practically all day, and misleading entries made in the seclusion book. There is no check kept on the attendant's reports concerning a patient's conduct. Those reports, although perhaps untrue and actuated by ill-feeling, are invariably accepted by the medical officers as correct, and entered in the report book accordingly. The patient of course has no opportunity of knowing anything of these reports." That goes a little further than the question of reports.

11,616. We must carry along with this in our minds another aspect of the case altogether, and that is that it is of course most detrimental to patients who are quieter to be mixed with patients who are very violent and who are being restrained in their presence. Nothing could be more painful to a number of well-behaved patients to see the unpleasant process of one of their number, who had unfortunately become violent, being restrained in their presence, shrieking, if you please, and generally creating a disturbance. It is essential that such a person should at the first moment be removed from the company of those people with whom she or he is. That, indeed, is one of the main reforms which is desired, that the better patients should not be associated with painful sights and sounds. Therefore it is plain that cases of this sort which would have to be put into separate confinement must be dealt with in some such fashion. I understand that in point of fact the numbers of really violent cases are surprisingly few—far fewer than the public imagine. The public have wrong ideas of what happens in an asylum and think that everybody there is shrieking and raving. Of course that is not so at all. A very large proportion of the inhabitants of an asylum are persons who are able to behave themselves quite satisfactorily, with some supervision. Therefore the class of cases that require seclusion must always be very limited and ought to be very limited. But I understand, and I believe it to be the case, that seclusion, except in the case of an actual emergency, is always on the order of a medical officer. The point is whether the present rules require that such seclusion should always be upon the order of a medical officer, except of course in an emergency, and I understand that even then an emergency step cannot be taken by one of the ordinary attendants, but only by a head nurse or head attendant?—I think that is so.

11,617. Whether that is observed, of course is a different question, but we are concerned just now with what are the existing rules?—I quite agree that it must be by the order of the medical officer, but I rather make this suggestion, that if it is going to be for a lengthy period and to deal with those cases you have mentioned, violent cases, it would be very useful that another authority, the visiting committee or members of the visiting committee, should be called in to ratify. What I want you to have in mind is long periods of seclusion, weeks and months, apparently for no adequate cause.

11,618. Earl Russell: Or without formally ratifying, it might serve the purpose if all cases of seclusion were reported to the next meeting of the visiting committee, and a point made of their seeing them personally?—That would help enormously.

11,619. Mr. Snell: Do you suggest that the removal of punishment should be left to the visiting committee also, because it seems to me that waiting for a visiting committee to come might involve detention in a lower ward a great deal longer than was necessary?—I quite agree, because they only visit at periods of two months.

11,620. Earl Russell: Sometimes? — Sometimes oftener, sometimes less. I quite agree with Mr. Snell's point. Of course if one depended upon the visiting committee and their periodical visits, it would not be an entire remedy. It would be a help; but one cannot help feeling that members of the visiting committee in regard to these matters should function much oftener.

Chairman: I think Lord Russell's suggestion that all cases of seclusion should be reported and that such cases should be gone into by the visiting committee would help.

Earl Russell: It at once puts you on your inquiry, of course.

Mrs. Mathew: Is it not the fact, Mr. Chairman, that that book with the hours of seclusion is put before the visiting committee?

Chairman: Yes. Mr. Parker's point is whether they are adequate records. It is required to be, but the point that has been raised is whether the existing definition of "seclusion" is such as to ensure that every case of real seclusion in point of fact finds its way into the book. Is not that it?

Witness: That is so.

11,621: You suggest that the doctor should be dissociated from the punitive element, and I appreciate that point. But if seclusion is to be resorted to, you know seclusion is not necessarily punishment at all; seclusion may be part of the treatment—in a sense it is classification carried to the last degree. I am not sure that you can put seclusion into the category of punishment at all. It could be used as punishment, I agree; but, on the other hand, it may be and must be in some instances part of the routine of treatment—that a patient has to be kept apart from others?—Surely that would only apply to very noisy patients. I mean where their condition demands it, would not the appropriate treatment be to put them back in the infirmary ward?

11,622. The kind of case I am thinking of is a patient with violent homicidal tendencies; the kind of patient about whom you are told "You had better not go near that person." There are of course a certain number of people of that sort, fortunately very few, whom you cannot trust anyone near; unfortunately they are really in the condition of beasts.

Sir David Drummond: But isolation, when you come to the treatment of early cases, is a most important factor—away from friends, away from other patients, and so forth.

Chairman: Quiet, and even solitude, may have a composing effect. I rather demur to the idea of treating seclusion as if seclusion itself were a punitive method.

Witness: I hope you do not think we suggest that. We quite realise that seclusion is a very important medical aspect in proper cases. What we do suggest is that confinement for lengthy periods is used for punishment, and we are not at all sure that it ever finds its way on to the records of seclusion.

11,623. Mr. Snell: On that point is it not the fact that cases of seclusion have to be reported to the Board of Control, and does not that give you the security you want?—They are never reported to the Board of Control if they do not get on to the asylum records in the first instance; they cannot be.

11,624. The case of a person being in seclusion for months and months together presumably would get on to the asylum records and come before the Board of Control?—That is precisely what we do not know. We think they do not. May I give you this reference to "seclusion" from the Cobb Report? They visited Prestwich and they say this: "At the time of our visit to Prestwich no patient was in seclusion. We inquired, however, into the allegation that patients are occasionally secluded without due record being made. We found that the doors are fitted with a light catch, by means of which the nurse can shut the door—without locking it. There is ground for believing that very occasionally and for very short periods (e.g., at meal times) the nurses may close the door in this way and not record it as seclusion. In our view, however, this practice is a form of unauthorised and unrecorded seclusion. We have been informed that the Commissioners of the Board of Control have also commented on this. The practice is open to considerable objection, and we hope that the responsible authorities will take cognizance of it."

11,625. Chairman: Well, Mr. Parker, that is the whole story. You want the responsible authorities to take cognizance of it, and that would ensure all cases being put on the record?—That is the case.

11,626. Now we come to what I think is the last main heading of your evidence, and that is what you describe as "Environment." That is really the "life" of the asylum, is it not?

11,627. Earl Russell: Before you go to that, might I on this point direct Mr. Parker's attention to page 26? I do not much like your page 26 altogether, but you say here about the various things patients do—"always they go to swell the growing records which prolong a patient's detention." Surely if a patient does anything which is material enough to be entered in the case book, it should be entered, should it not?—I quite agree, subject to this, that we do think the patient's point of view should be recorded. If you get an ex parte entry by an attendant, we suggest they are quite often very untrustworthy.

11,628. Surely the entries in the case book are not made by the attendants?—I am afraid they are made by the doctor on the attendant's information.

11,629. We had a case before us in which the patient was put in the case book as having struck another patient, and the patient's reason and explanation were given in the entry. Still, if there is a true record of the patient's condition, it is a thing that ought to be in the case book, is it not?—Absolutely.

11,630. You rather speak of it as if it were wrong to put these things in the case book. Surely they only prolong his detention if they show he is insane?—The point I was trying to make there is that from the records we get—of course, we have not access to the case books, we have only seen one—but from the patients' statements, we find over and over again that administrative changes have taken place which, in his view, have been unnecessary. He knows the reason; he has either complained or has committed some trivial offence, and we presume those are recorded in the case book. The point we make is that we think the patient should have been heard before that record was made against him—heard by the doctor, at any rate. That does not always take place. If it is an administrative point, then we come back to the suggestion that they should be heard by a member of the visiting committee.

11,631. That is not quite what you say here. You say a little lower down, near the bottom of the page, that "punishment to begin with is always indefinite 'pending the doctor's pleasure,' in itself an irritating and depressing feature." Is not that "pending the doctor's pleasure" rather an ex parte way of putting it? It must depend upon what the doctor thinks of the patient?—I am dealing there with cases in which, we submit, seclusion is being used as punishment, and I do feel from reading these reports that the patient does get lost sight of, while he is in this seclusion. I think when you hear the evidence, we shall make good that criticism.

11,632. But I am asking you about the phrase "pending the doctor's pleasure." You put it there as if it were an improper thing. Does it not mean,

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

until the doctor considers the patient is fit to be let out?—No, not where seclusion is being used for punishment.

11,633. Chairman: I am afraid Mr. Parker means not "pleasure" but "caprice"?—I really do mean that. They are unfairly kept in confinement for periods which are much too lengthy for the offences they have committed. I think that under the present system these cases cannot come up for review every day. I think once a patient gets down into a lower ward he may be kept there until he has got a clean record for some time.

Earl Russell: I want to get exactly what the allegation against the doctor here is.

11,634. Sir Ernest Hiley: Where is the quotation taken from?—It is my own drafting, and somebody has added the inverted commas.

Earl Russell: It seems to me an unfortunate phrase. I should like to know what you really mean by it.

11,635. Sir David Drummond: It is not your intention to bring a wholesale charge against doctors in the asylums?—Not the least.

11,636. You do in a sense; you say: "Of such matters the medical superintendent and his medical staff are sole and jealous arbiters."—That may be tested by the case I put before you yesterday, where a patient was relegated for five months to solitary confinement, and the moment the superintendent's attention was called to it from an outside source he at once interfered, presumably with the subordinate doctor, and had that patient brought up again to the ward he had been in before. One is bound to suggest on those facts that there was an improper exercise of power, not by one subordinate doctor, because this man was under several doctors. One is bound to suggest that if outside influence had not been introduced that man would have remained there for a very much longer period.

11,637. But you treat it as if your charges in that section were wholesale, not that these abuses were occasional?—I do not want to suggest that, but I do want to put before you the point of view I am representing, and that is the point of view of patients who do say that the system is abused.

11,638. Chairman: If I may say so, with regard to Mr. Parker's evidence generally, we have treated Mr. Parker's précis here as an indication of the points he wants to bring before us; but I, for one, should not wish to tie Mr. Parker down to any individual phrase he has used in the précis because his official evidence is the evidence appearing on the shorthand note. In the case of many other witnesses who have preceded you there have been passages which were not reproduced in the note—sometimes the language was unfortunate. I take it your real evidence before us is the evidence you are giving now and which is upon the note?—I am trying to indicate to you the point of view put to us by the patients, and I have said more than once that that must be tested by you as a Commission, by having the patients before you.

Earl Russell: I only called your attention to it because I thought for the moment you had departed from that reasoned calm which the Chairman has mentioned.

11,639. Chairman: I have endeavoured to use a certain moderating influence—I hope usefully. However, before we pass to this last topic of environment, let us consider a very general aspect of the whole thing. Each asylum or institution is a community by itself, a peculiar community, in which persons, owing to their misfortune, have to be under a certain system of control, intended to be for their benefit and their protection and for the protection of the public. We have this little community. It is manifest that under any system, however perfect on paper, the fortunes of that community must to a considerable extent be at the mercy of those who are placed in charge of it?—Yes.

11,640. We have to recognise that. One is reluctant to over-elaborate the rules and regulations affecting the daily life of that community. I take an analogy, not a very perfect one, of a large school, let us say. If the scholars in the school were always occupied in considering whether certain of the assistant masters had broken "subsection 2 of the rule 14 regulating the hours of play," or something of that sort, of course the whole purpose of the school would be defeated and you would get a lot of amateur lawyers instead of a lot of pupils. Similarly, one feels with regard to any institution of this sort, and it is not peculiar to asylums, that there must be a large measure of confidence reposed in the persons who have to run it. I imagine many school boys have a burning sense of injustice with regard to the punishments that are imposed upon them, and sometimes they are unjustly imposed I am afraid, but you cannot convert the business of the school into a series of miniature courts martial. The remedy is to have a good school with a good tone and with good masters and good people in charge of it. That is the real remedy. All the rest of it on paper, the rules and regulations, may be admirable, but if you do not have a good person in charge, no amount of regulation will make the place a happy or fortunate institution?—We are all agreed on that, and the criticism that I have made against the doctors is not a criticism against the medical profession. It is a criticism that the type of doctor employed in many of these places is quite inadequately trained. You have had medical superintendents before you who say that their knowledge on these matters is grotesque—that was Dr. Devine I think, and I think it is admitted that the supply of adequately trained men is short.

11,641. That kind of criticism is useful and very much to the purpose, but we must avoid the risk in our Recommendations of running to the opposite extreme, and instead of engaging the patients as far as possible in recreation and interesting occupations of which you speak, converting them rather into people who are hunting for rules and regulations and trying to catch out those in charge for having broken this or that regulation. You would then give the institution all that appearance of formality which we want to avoid, because we wish to produce as far as we can normal and happy conditions?—Quite, and there is this point, if I may interpose it, that at present we feel that the individual medical officer is asked to look after far too many patients, and therefore he is precluded from giving the individual attention to a case which he would naturally wish to do.

11,642. Again you are pushing an open door there?—But it is on those facts we base our criticism.

11,643. And of course your criticism is valuable as showing that under the present system you cannot secure those main objects to which I have alluded?—That is so.

11,644. But whether the redress is to be found in accepting the present institutions and elaborating the precautionary rules or not is another question. I have an apprehension in my mind that if you make these places over-elaborate in their regulations, well, you just topple over into the other kind of abuse?—I think it is a very great danger.

11,645. Take the point of the superintendent, or his assistants, who have so many forms to prepare and fill up just now, which undoubtedly divert them to a large extent from their main object: if we are always calling for and prescribing more forms and more detailed supervision, we are still further aggravating that very drawback?—Quite. I rather have this feeling that it is quite conceivable now that the time has come when some of the old forms might very well be dispensed with. It happens in all other businesses as far as one knows, if you get a gradual accumulation of returns, at last there comes a point at which you must put your pen through those which are out of date.

11,646. The cellars of Whitehall are full of dead stock of that sort?—That is so.

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,647. One must always bear in mind—and I think it is a general point in considering all your evidence—that in an anxiety to safeguard the occurrence of occasional abuses, one may just step over the borderline and introduce a different kind but quite as serious an abuse in the sense of over regulation or over elaboration; and a man who is not trusted is generally not so good an administrator?—I fully appreciate that.

11,648. Of course there you get into the personal question. If we had ideal medical superintendents probably none of us would be sitting here just now, but in an imperfect world we cannot have perfect functionaries. We have however always got to bear in mind the balancing between the protective element on the one hand and over elaboration on the other hand, which defeats itself. I really have just been thinking aloud with you over it, in order that one may get one's general ideas in order on the subject?—If I may say so, I think our views are entirely on the side of practical administration and we realise one may be snowed under with forms, and we realise also that they are a distraction to medical superintendents of these institutions. They are very voluminous, I believe.

11,649. Now let us come to the question of environment. The first point that you take up has been alluded to more than once, and that is the treatment of patients. I use the word "treatment" in its more or less technical aspect. It has been said that asylums hitherto have been rather places of mere detention, where the citizen was kept apart from his fellows lest he should do harm to himself and the public, and that there has been a tendency to lose sight of the curative aspect. The asylum is not merely a prison or detention place, or ought not to be, but it ought to be a place where the patient is cured, if possible, just as a general hospital is a place for the cure of patients. Upon that part of the case, when what has gone wrong really is the conduct of the individual, is it not very difficult to avoid regarding treatment as largely a matter of the regulation of conduct? I mean to say in a general hospital of course conduct is not the question at all; it is the particular disease or casualty that is in question; but, where you are dealing with persons of disordered mind, and whose disordered conduct is the evidence of their disordered mind, is not one of the main forms of treatment the orderly and regular life of the institution?—In general terms I should agree that regularity of life in certain cases might be and is a very valuable form of cure.

11,650. First of all, take the case of the person at home who has reached a state of mental disturbance, possibly due to domestic worries: the very removal of that person from the surroundings which have been the cause of the disturbance is in itself a first step towards cure, is it not?—Yes, subject to the surroundings into which you remove him being right—removal from the old surroundings is no doubt beneficial.

11,651. But it must be removal to circumstances which are appropriate?—Exactly.

11,652. True, but there is a first step, so to speak. I should imagine that the taking away of a person—take a pauper case—from dirty, unpleasant and insanitary surroundings into a well-ordered institution would in itself be treatment, would it not?—Entirely beneficial.

11,653. Now, apart from that, I have been struck with this in dealing with mental disease, whether it is the case that medical science has not overtaken it yet I do not know, but one hears comparatively little, even in the best institutions, of treatment in the specific sense. In the case of ordinary ailments there is medical treatment, all kinds of things, the use of drugs and all the other expedients which are utilised in a general hospital, all the surgical treatment, dressings, and so on. Apart from the regimen of the life of the institution, what is it that you contemplate as the treatment which should be afforded in asylums for mental cases? What is it that is lacking, because I would like very much to have your comment upon that?—We say that the first thing which is lacking is sympathy.

11,654. "Sympathy" is not in the British Pharmacopoeia?—It is not, but that is the broad comment—that the conditions may on the surface appear to be very satisfactory. The asylum I went over was in such magnificent order that it reminded me of a battleship. I do not think I could have found a speck of dust in it, and I am not exaggerating; but whether that extreme order is indicative of the happiness of the inmates is another point. That is the big complaint—the harshness of the treatment. By "harshness" I mean the conditions under which the inmates are forced to live; the absence of certain things to which they have been used, diet, confinement, questions of exercise, and so on, which we deal with in detail.

11,655. Might one use the phrase "the rigidity of the method"?—The rigidity and the absence of occupation, and I could not help being struck as I walked through this place (I do not know whether the same point has occurred to you) with the vacancy of the patients; they simply had nothing to do. I do not think one in ten was doing anything. It is true that in this case a meal time was approaching, and it might have been a special occasion, but that is the complaint which runs all through our evidence.

Earl Russell: I should be very glad to know what you suggest those who are normally not employed could do. We have noticed it, of course, too. What would you suggest?

11,656. Chairman: It is quite conspicuous?—We shall come to that as we deal with each head, shall we? The human element seems to be the big one.

11,657. Of course, one has got to reckon with this, that institutional treatment at its best can never be the same as home treatment?—I absolutely agree with that, and that is the basic difficulty, but I think this is a comment—that the more you break these places up into smaller units the more you will get that individual element introduced.

11,658. That I understand, but you will never make an institution the same as a private house.—You will never make it a home any more than you can make an hotel a home; it cannot be done.

11,659. Of course, people do talk of "home from home," but you can try to reproduce, possibly more effectively, those conditions?—You can break down the extreme rigidity of some of these institutions; it is being done at the present moment in lots of ways.

11,660. Even in a general hospital, when one visits the wards of a general hospital there is very much the same spick and spanness to be seen, and even rigidity, if you please, in the management of it; you have to submit yourself to that. That is why many people find the discipline even of a general hospital irksome. That is a general point. Then you urge the provision of better facilities, more recreation and occupation. What other heads have you in mind? None of these seem to be to me directly medical?—Of course, there is the very important question of classification, which I think is admitted on all hands to be deficient at the moment, and that exposes patients to constant irritation, which, from a medical point of view, is the worst possible thing they could be exposed to; that again is admitted, I think.

11,661. We are still in this region of classifying patients, amusing patients, and sympathising, if you please, with patients; none of these things are distinctively medical. One has heard the question asked more than once: what are the curative expedients available in these institutions? Do not you merely keep the patient there, and keep him tidy and orderly, and keep him employed, imperfectly employed, if you like? You do not find in asylums the same element of medical processes of cure, and are there any really?

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

That is what I am trying to get at. Are there any methods?—If I may give you a personal view it is this: That one divides cases roughly into two halves—those which are suffering from physical complaints, diseases of the body or brain; and those which are suffering more generally from some pure disease of the mind. For the first class one sees that medical science can and does in these institutions give relief, and they are experimenting in various directions. Take the question of injections of malaria for general paralysis of the insane.

11,662. And there can be considerable improvements in the matter of dentistry, for instance. These are the physical concomitants, but who can minister unto a mind diseased?—That is the other side of the problem. That is where, as it seems to me, the public point of view is at issue with the medical point of view. You pass unquestionably (and it crops up in all these cases) into questions of delusion, spiritual experiences, religious experiences, and all that type of case; and it is there where I think the public are at issue with the medical profession; because, if I may say so with all respect, the medical profession is concerned with the material aspects of the body, and it has approached these other aspects of the mind in a very careful and leisurely fashion. If I may give you one instance—take a question like hypnotism. Hypnotism was in fact used as long ago as 1847, I think it was, by reputable medical men.

11,663. Sir David Drummond: Long before that?—Long before, of course, but not for this purpose and for major operations.

11,664. Mesmer in 1784?—Not, I think, for operations.

11,665. Not for operations?—But it was in fact used at that date; it was 50 years before the medical profession, as a profession, accepted hypnotism as a fact. Up to that point they fought against it. They then accepted it as a fact, and now they claim it as a function which should only be exercised by medical men. I am only instancing that to show how slowly the changes which are in the public mind are acquired by the professional mind.

11,666. Chairman: Yes, every reform of that sort has to fight its way to acceptance; some are discarded on the way, and some achieve it. It is probably desirable that these methods should pass through the probationary period because of the great danger of the abuse of these things?—Quite.

11,667. We are dealing with the most delicate mechanism of the human mind, and it is one of those things where incalculable harm may be done by the abuse of those very discoveries which have been made?—Of course when you come to that class of case I submit that the study of the human mind is one which has engrossed humanity for centuries, and it cannot be dealt with by a short series of lectures. That is the big point: whether you will ever get, as you have said, a cure for that class of case in institutions. I do not think you ever will.

11,668. It seems so comparatively easy in the practice of a general hospital. A case of pneumonia is brought in, and there is a certain prescribed method of treatment. A patient receives all those well-known remedies, and benefits as a rule by them. A case of mental disturbance is brought in. You cannot at once say, "This is a case in which various forms of treatment will produce a beneficial result." You cannot tell; you are dealing with an idiosyncrasy. —Yes, you can say that these experiences you have had we describe as hallucinations, and as long as you continue to have them you will be kept in detention. A great number of our cases turn just on that point, and that is the medical point of view; but curiously enough when that type of case comes before a jury, as it has done in the last half century, you will always find a much wider application given to that class of facts, and the jury will not accept it as a necessary indication of insanity; and that is the important point, if I may say so, which runs through a great number of these cases. The conflict of opinion between the man in the street on the one side and the medical opinion on the other side—and that is why in basing our case we have urged throughout, it being impracticable to get a jury to function, that what we have called the legal opinion, as representative of the lay opinion, shall always form part of the adjudication.

11,669. Earl Russell: You are a long way from treatment, I am afraid.—I am afraid for the moment we are, on this point.

11,670. Chairman: If there is a complaint that there is a want of curative treatment in asylums at the present moment, what are the suggestions of your Society on that subject? What is lacking, in your view?—We have dealt with the physical cases. On the mental cases I think the only suggestion we can make is greater freedom, and to point to all these cases in the Board of Control's Report, where greater freedom has been given and has resulted immediately in such beneficial results.

11,671. Earl Russell: And more medical officers?—And more medical officers, to give that personal touch which we suggest is absent.

11,672. Sir David Drummond: And you recognise that the suggestion that they should be given greater freedom does not arise from your Society; it is the Board of Control who generally recognise it?—No, it does not; subject to this, that that recognition is quite recent apparently.

11,673. It has been coming for a good many years now.—This is rather our comment, that it has come with a rush, quite recently, and, as we suggest, partly as the result of outside comment.

11,674. Chairman: You refer to page 65 of the report of the Committee on the Administration of Public Mental Hospitals of 1923. I do not know that we need get that on the note, because of course that is before us, but the importance of the investigation of each individual patient's case is there brought out. That is the point. Individual care of the case and study of the case?—Quite, and the comment we make there is that that quotation ends with these words, "These, and the endeavour to free the patient from mental worry are all parts of the 'treatment' which all our mental hospitals provide." Now we want to suggest that what is set out is an ideal form of treatment, which mental hospitals may be aiming at; but very few of them provide, as we shall try to show you, either the whole of these things, or any great part of them.

11,675. The great part of that treatment seems to be treatment distinctive to mental cases, as distinguished from general hospital cases?—Quite.

11,676. Now let us take the environment in the sense of the equipment. Shall we just get on the note the suggestions that you have upon that? You want better reception equipment, do you not?—That has been dealt with, of course, very fully before you.

11,677. Then I notice one matter of detail, "Provision of verandahs."—May I interpose and say that we put before you again suggestions which have been made by the Board of Control for the purposes of comparison, taken from page 213 of their Report. Of course obviously all those suggestions are excellent. They represent medical opinion of the day.

11,678. Then we may take it that that report embodies really most of the reforms of environment which you also advocate?—Of medical treatment. If you look at them they hardly go to environment: "The installation of apparatus for continuous baths; an operating room; room for dental surgery; development of the clinical laboratory; provision of medical officers' clinical room; X-ray installation; increased sanitary and lavatory accommodation; a nurses' home." They hardly touch environment. They are definite heads of medical treatment and administration.

11,679. Now all these things are recommended, I understand, by the Board of Control Report?—Yes, they were recommended in the case of the Oxford asylum when it was being reconditioned.

11,680. And you recommend these things also?—So far as we can express an opinion of course they seem excellent.

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,681. Mr. Micklem: Under the provisions of the Act there is no power resident anywhere, is there, to provide these things unless the local authority choose of their motion to introduce them?—That is so; they can only be recommended, and all these things come back to the local authority, and of course are controlled by questions of finance.

11,682. I mean under the Act the Secretary of State is referred to; the Minister of Health has no power, has he, at the moment?—No.

Chairman: He can only withhold his approval from plans.

Earl Russell: And give consent to a loan to the local authority.

Sir Ernest Hiley: That is in the initial stages of the building of the asylum; this is much later on.

Chairman: Yes, this is equipment to a large extent.

11,683. Mr. Micklem: Where equipment is concerned there is no authority. It is really a question of the local authority being prepared to spend the money?—Purely financial, I believe.

11,684. Chairman: I think the only substantive duty imposed upon the local authority is the provision of adequate accommodation, but it does not carry it the length of equipment?—Structure.

11,685. That means the place where you can put people, but it does not carry you much further than that?—No.

11,686. Mr. Micklem: When plans have once been approved and passed and buildings erected he has no further power under the Act?—As far as I know none whatever.

11,687. Earl Russell: I think any substantial change has to be approved?—I believe all structural questions go back, as you say, Lord Russell, for approval, but none of these points of equipment, as far as I know.

11,688. Chairman: Of course that control will enable something to be done in ensuring that the buildings conform to more modern ideas and so on, but it hardly touches at all, as far as I can see, the question of equipment?—No, it does not; and perhaps in this connection I may put this before you, that as one reads these reports one naturally finds the richer centres, the towns, and so on, are the most advanced in equipment; and especially when one passes to the west country, it is there that equipment and general treatment seems to be so far behindhand. The point I wanted to raise on that was whether you will ever get any wholesale change in conditions unless you get some form of central finance to assist the poorer neighbourhoods.

Earl Russell: I see just one effect it would have: they could veto an establishment of 2,500 inhabitants.

Chairman: Yes.

Sir Ernest Hiley: There is no power for a mandamus to go against a local authority for not providing a dental surgery or anything of that sort.

Chairman: No. The only section that would support a mandamus I think, Sir Ernest, is Section 247: "If the Commissioners report to a Secretary of State that any local authority has failed to satisfy the requirements of the Act as regards asylum accommodation, the Secretary of State may require the local authority to provide such accommodation in such manner as he may direct, and the local authority shall forthwith carry the requisition into effect." but, as you point out that does not extend at all to the detail of the equipment of the institution.

Sir Ernest Hiley: No.

Chairman: And I suppose we shall always have varying degrees of efficiency among the institutions.

Earl Russell: It is rather a curious provision in Section 247, if you look at the end—if they have failed in their duty, apparently the Secretary of State can direct exactly what kind of asylum they shall build, "and the local authority shall forthwith carry the requisition into effect."

Chairman: Yes: I doubt if that will extend to the internal equipment of the institution.

Earl Russell: It might extend to the details in the building, the provision of verandahs, and so on.

11,689. Chairman: It might do that. (To the Witness): Now these excellent things that are enumerated have the approval of your Society as well as of the Board of Control, and I think you point to this, that the provision of these things has an immediate and obvious effect on the recovery rate?—It should at once. I think the figures are on page 97 in the Report of 1923; the figure is 71.6 per cent.

11,690. About double the average rate was secured in Oxford?—Yes, based on nearly eight months' experience.

11,691. At Oxford they have these facilities and advantages?—Yes.

11,692. You also refer to the report on Netley at page 318?—Yes; there apparently there is no pressure on the accommodation. Shall I read what they say there—it is quite short?

11,693. If you please.—They say: "The admissions, including 13 officers, numbered 249, of whom 112 were overseas cases and 137 were received from home ports. This total is about a third less than during the previous year and, while, numerically considered, it lessens the field for clinical observation, the reduction has the advantage of permitting a more extended and individual study of patients, and of offering a better opportunity for recovery without resort to certification—a period of from two to three months' residence being now generally practicable, which is, I trust, capable of extension in selected cases." There again the recovery rate is remarkably high, 89.6 per cent.

11,694. Your general inference is that the recovery rate responds to improved modern treatment. It must be almost a truism, must it not?—Yes. While on the question of the recovery rates we wish to put this point of view before you: that they are for some reason which we cannot fathom calculated on the admissions, while the death rate is calculated on the whole population of the asylum, and, as has been pointed out to you by some superintendents, it is a very fallacious form of return. I think it was the superintendent of Portsmouth who said that he thought his recovery rate was going to be very low because his permanent cases were becoming very numerous. I have tried to work it out in my own mind, and I have failed completely to see why you should calculate the recovery rate on admissions. One does wonder what it leads to, because you may get 100 admissions in a year, none of whom go out, and yet you get a recovery rate of people going out who may have been there two or three years. The substance of it is this: what is the average period of detention of a patient in an asylum? At first glance if you hear the recovery rate is 35 per cent, you think it means one in three goes out in the year, but I believe that is very far from the truth. I have a sort of idea, as far as I can get at it, that the average period of detention is a matter of years. It is an impossible figure to get at, because of course there is the question of deaths at the same time. I do not know whether you have had any evidence before you which clears up that point.

Chairman: No, I do not think we have.

11,695. Earl Russell: I think I am just as confused as you are about the average figures.—I hesitate to say it, but what is in my mind is that the average period of detention is three or four years. I cannot substantiate that; that is the impression left on my mind.

11,696. We have a return coming showing us the number of people discharged after five years and after ten years' detention.—That will help.

11,697. Sir David Drummond: Is not that unavoidable? Here you are mixing up incurable patients and curable patients; and you are calling for a return which mixes up these two classes. It is almost impossible to get the exact facts.—I quite see the difficulty, but I submit it is very important to ascertain that one point: What is the average detention of a patient?

11,698. Chairman: What you really want to know is how many patients go into an institution, how long they stay there, and how many of them recover, and in what time they recover? Now one can imagine, starting de novo, opening an institution, that you could prepare your records quite easily on that basis, and then you would be able to show your recoveries, because the incurable cases would be the cases which had been there five or ten years, as the case may be, but you would get a conspectus in this way: what are the prospects of a person going into that institution coming out? If you started in the first year and 100 patients are put in, and assume they are all first cases; then, at the end of the year, I should like to know how many of those 100 people left the institution in the course of the year.—That is the important point, is it not?

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

Chairman: And how long was each in?

Sir Ernest Hiley: Must you not also, if you are going to get to the ideal of having individual attention for each case, keep that fact in mind in considering any of the returns and the rate of discharge?

Sir David Drummond: Do you think that would be very serviceable? The 100 patients might be all incurables. Until we have more perfect classification and can divide up the cases into the curable and incurable, nothing is to be gained by a return of this sort.

Chairman: I see that point. Suppose that by a misfortune the 100 cases they started with in the institution were all incurable, at the end of the year the recovery rate would be nil.

11,699. Earl Russell: The only use of these statistics is to show that they cure a certain percentage in a certain time, and if they are to be of any use you must eliminate the incurables. If you have an asylum of 1,000 in which 600 are incurable it is no good taking your figures on 1,000, because no amount of treatment will affect the 600?—Any figures must be based on the fact that in a big institution you will get an average. All these figures are based on that assumption: that any given place will give you, within certain limits, an average. Answering Lord Russell's question, it seems to us that the basic fact to arrive at in the admissions in any one year is what is the percentage of recoveries of those cases within that first year. Then I think you might carry it possibly into the second year, and after that they would pass into the category of permanent cases.

11,700. What I am saying is that you must not take it on the total asylum population if it is to mean anything?—I agree.

11,701. Chairman: Of course, again statistics are of no value in themselves, although people often think they are. The value of statistics is that one may get a clue to what is going on?—They give you a comparative basis.

11,702. You want to get reliable statistics in order to see whether improvement is in effect being maintained?—I think if you found that one institution discharged 25 per cent. of the admissions and another institution only discharged five you would get that.

Sir David Drummond: That would be of no value at all, because the institution that only discharged five might have had a larger proportion of the incurable cases. Might I say this that the general hospitals returns are not on the whole of the patients admitted; they are on the specific kind of cases, pneumonias, so many recover; fractures of the leg, in so many months or weeks, so many recover; they are all specific forms of disease. That is how we can get at the question of whether we are improving.

Earl Russell: But you would get it if you separated the admissions into curables and incurables.

Chairman: If you could diagnose the incurable at sight, but it must be very difficult to do it.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: I think it is quite obvious that if any investigation of this kind is to be made it must be made by a trained statistician. There are so many fallacies, that any figures taken by myself, for instance, would not command respect. They ought to be taken by a trained statistician. I am quite sure if Mr. Parker is going to get any value out of this investigation, it must be in the hands of a statistician who is equivalent to a chartered accountant.

11,703 Chairman: However, this is a side track to some extent. We were considering with you the various improvements which could be effected?—Mr. Stewart asks me to put this point to you, that at present the discharge rates in private institutions I believe are not disclosed, and we suggest that whatever the basis is, that would form an interesting return; to see how they compare with the public institutions.

11,704. Yes, we will note that. I do not think we need go into detail on the next page or two of your précis. You point out, of course, the advantages of fresh air, and the advantages of verandahs, and so on. You may take it that we appreciate those points?—Quite.

11,705. But the medical staff is, of course, a very important thing, and I think you perhaps have omitted to point out that the Board of Control are very urgent on the subject of increasing the subordinate medical staff under the medical superintendent?—We appreciate that.

11,706. So we need not labour that. Then, on the other hand, with regard to the nursing staff, which you deal with at some length, that has been, as we know, the subject of a recent departmental report which goes into it very exhaustively. That is in our hands; we have read it very carefully. I do not suppose we can really add very much to that, can we?—No. There is just one point there. You will notice in that Nursing Report the Committee deal with the average number of nursing staff who have the final certificate, or have passed the preliminary examination. We just want to put before you that leaving it there does not quite represent the true position. When you come to analyse the different institutions, you find that in some the percentage of the trained staff is one per cent. Of course that is the extreme. We have prepared from the Board of Control Report an analysis which perhaps I may hand in. (Handing in the same.) The only comment I want to make upon it is that in about 19 of the 90 odd institutions reported on by the Board of Control the certificated percentage on the staff is below 12 per cent. Of course one realises again that according to their locality, it would be much more difficult in some places to get a skilled nursing staff; and that raises the question whether it would be possible to provide some method of feeding the more remote localities from a central body.

11,707. Your comment there is really just the comment which arises always upon averages. There is nothing more fallacious than an average, of course?—No.

11,708. I mean to say to tell me your income is £3,000 and mine is £1,000, add the two together and say the average of our incomes is £2,000 a year is not much consolation to me, and yet that is perfectly accurate from the statistical point of view?—Of course it is most unconvincing.

11,709. Averages must always be dealt with with discretion.—We suggest to you that some of these patients get decimal points of the medical attendance during the year.

11,710. I think you may take it that we shall give careful consideration to that Report on the nursing staff; it is very full and very interesting, so that I do not think we need delay with that. Upon that I think you desire to emphasise the importance of the staff being adequately remunerated, and of the career being made attractive to the best class of person?—Being made truly vocational. That is the finding of the Committee, of course.

11,711. Now let us pass on to a different matter, the daily experiences of patients. Apparently in some institutions the bathing accommodation is unsatisfactory.—Are you leaving the question of diet?

11,712. Have I missed it?—Yes.

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,713. I beg your pardon. Please deal with that. There is an important point there.—We only want to make one or two observations on the question of diet. That again, of course, as you know, has been in the hands of a Departmental Committee.

11,714. Yes, I have had that report.—The only comment I want to make there is that they showed that when they started their investigations in 1922, I think it was, no less than 50 per cent., rather over 50 per cent., of the institutions of this country were serving a diet of bread and margarine for tea and breakfast throughout the week. Of course we understand very big improvements have been introduced in that respect, but that is the foundation of very bitter complaints, that the diet has been very bad; and, of course, in certain institutions does remain very unattractive. Again if we had a central authority with directing power one cannot conceive that that state of things would be allowed to continue.

11,715. You draw attention to the very small allowance.—We find it impossible to believe that a sum of 5s. a week is adequate to maintain a person who hypothetically is a sick person. On the other hand we admit that very learned people have put forward a schedule in that Committee's Report which shows that it can be done. You may remember they drew up an ideal dietary, and circulated it to a great number of asylums and asked them to report on the costs, and a great many of them could not come anywhere near the 5s., but they reported that 5s. was adequate. We ask you to test that by the general knowledge one has that the cost of living has gone up enormously. I have got here, if I may give them to you, the returns of one asylum (the one I have mentioned before) which are valuable in this way that they set out a comparison of the weekly cost per head under various heads for 10 consecutive years, from 1914 to 1924. That is a class of return which I have not found anywhere else.

11,716. Where did you get it?—This is in the Hertfordshire County Asylum Report.

11,717. Perhaps you might hand that in to us later.—Yes, if you please. That gives these rather curious figures, that the cost of provisions before the war was 4s. 3'60d. weekly. In 1924 the cost was 5s. 4'90d.; that, roughly speaking, is an increase of 25 per cent. on the cost of food provided for the patients. Now in the same time the salaries and wages in 1914 amounted to 3s. 9d. weekly cost; in 1924 they amounted to 11s. 11d., an increase of some 200 per cent. It certainly struck me as very startling that, taking the average cost of an asylum, and I think this one conforms to most of them, (it works out at about 23s. or 24s. a week) the big increase had been in salaries and wages, that is to say, the necessities of the outside public, whereas the necessities of the inside inmates have only increased 25 per cent. I am not making of course any charge against the asylum, but that does raise the point. If the patients had been more articulate and had had trades unions, or anything of that sort, it might have been different. We may be within reach of that; we have a patients' paper, and that is the first step towards a union.

(After a short adjournment.)

11,730. Chairman: Mr. Parker, we may pass to the question of baths now, and there again I do not think we need delay long. Most of the disadvantages that at present exist are due to the fact of inadequate accommodation, it would appear; it is said that there is not sufficient bathing accommodation, and that it is too public?—That is the point, it is too public. You have had a good deal of evidence given you on that point by medical superintendents.

11,731. Yes, we have had a lot about that, and they have all expressed their desire, as far as they can, to give reasonable privacy?—I think conditions are slowly changing, but I suppose again the controlling factor is finance.

11,732. I do not think we need delay upon that, because the desirability of it, of course, is obvious?—Yes.

11,718. You could have a patients' strike and all the other concomitants?—You had a case in Ireland of the patients running their own asylum, I think, quite recently.

11,719. But the striking point there is this, is it not, that whereas 4s. 3d. before the war was the outlay on patients' diet per head, the figure now does not correspond with the increased cost of the main items of food?—That is so. The day I was there I was very much struck with the goodness of the dinner; I do not know how it is done at the figure. Of course there is a big farm run in connection with that particular institution.

11,720. Mr. Snell: Do you know if the price value is given to the products grown on their farm?—Yes; I tried to get at that, and I think it was 3d. a week.

11,721. Do they charge that food they grow to the dietary cost?—Here is the figure. They give a credit of 3'37d. per week in respect of the farm and garden produce.

11,722. Chairman: Is that all? I should have thought there would have been a much larger contribution to the dietary by the farm than would be represented by 3d. a week?—That is given to me as the correct figure.

11,723. Mr. Snell: Is that included, or is it in addition?—It is treated here as a deduction, so that I think it is included in the figure I have quoted to you, and then deducted in the form of a credit, being a balance in favour of the farm and garden. It is a little difficult to follow these accounts, but I think that is the position.

11,724. Chairman: It is curious. You say that, judged by the test of your own experience, and your own inspection, you thought the meals were satisfactory?—Yes, on that one occasion I was there.

11,725. I suppose you were paying a surprise visit, were you?—No.

11,726. Was it dressed up for you, do you mean?—No, I do not suggest that for a moment. It is only fair to say that I was very much struck with the excellence of the lunch that was being served that day. For instance, it was only about a few weeks ago they were having green peas. I do not know where green peas come from at this time of year.

11,727. From bottles or tins generally?—Exactly, but it was a surprise to see them being served. In that connection Mr. Stewart asks me to remind you of the figures given by Mr. Senior dealing with the cost of diet in his institution. The figure for the attendants was 13s. 6d. and for the patients 4s. 6d., which again shows an extraordinary discrepancy.

11,728. Earl Russell: There are not, of course, as many attendants to cater for?—But surely they are catered for by the central kitchen.

11,729. Chairman: The food will all come from the same kitchen?—Yes.

Chairman: These allusions to lunch have suggested to us that it is time for adjournment, Mr. Parker.

Mr. Parker: If you please, Sir.

11,733. Now I would like you to give us some of your views on the question of occupation and amusements, unless there is any other matter you wish to touch upon?—There is just one point which I should like to draw attention to, showing the great divergence in practice, and that is the question of shaving. It is at page 244 of the Board of Control Report; there is this amazing statement: "None of the male patients are shaved, and those who desire to be have to resort to the use of pumice stone. I hope that arrangements may be made for those men who desire to be shaved to be supplied with safety razors." Of course it seems almost incredible that there is still an institution in the country where the pre-Roman practice of using pumice stone is not only in vogue but insisted upon, and that institution, like so many of them of course, has ex-service men there; and to

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

them, I submit, it must be peculiarly distasteful after their training in the army to have to submit to those sort of conditions. And it is not an isolated state of things. There is another reference at the bottom of page 266. Those are two which crop up: "None of the male patients are shaved, and the introduction of safety razors would I am sure be appreciated by them." There again one is lost in amazement to find conditions of that sort still existing. You will notice in one case it is a west country institute.

11,734. And the other is Brighton?—Yes, but I think it is probably a county institution again.

11,735. I suppose there is some difficulty with regard to razors?—Still it is a problem which is dealt with in the great majority of asylums, not daily, of course, but at reasonable intervals. There is this aspect of it, of course, the patients complain bitterly that they are forced into a condition first of uncleanness, and, secondly, that their appearance militates very much against them. A man who is growing a beard and is introduced to a magistrate under those conditions of course does not make the most favourable impression, and it is a very vital interview to him.

11,736. Earl Russell: You know what people look like if they come up after a couple of days on remand?—Certainly; it does create a very unfavourable effect.

11,737. Chairman: All one has got to do with the safety razor is to unscrew it and take the blade out and then the patient can cut his throat?—Still, they are provided in many institutions.

11,738. And it is recommended by the Board of Control?—Recommended, but I do not know whether the recommendation has been accepted again. Then there is one other point in the case of the City of Hull Hospital, page 278—we rather want to call your attention to that, because there, coming from the mouth of one of the visitors, is exactly the class of complaint we get from all our patients. This is a case where one of the lady visitors paid a surprise visit at seven o'clock in the morning, and she found the following state of things—the allegations are set out in the middle of page 279—" (1) bathing arrangements (over-crowding of bath-rooms, more than one person bathed in same water, lack of decency and privacy, use of soft-soap and use of enamel utensil to rinse the head); (2) disorderly and dirty condition of lavatories; (3) clothing (ragged condition, inadequacy of supply, clothes worn one day by one patient but by another the next day); (4) laundry appliances inadequate and clothing merely rough-dried; (5) dirty crockery; (6) general kitchen (insufficient staff, dirty vessels, untidiness); (7) over-crowding of observation dormitory (erroneously referred to as that of No. 4); (8) sick-rooms comfortable; (9) single-rooms dungeon-like and confinement therein as punishment; and (10) neglect and cruelty on part of nurses."

11,739. These were the allegations?—Those were the allegations, and they were subjected to scrutiny, of course, by the visiting committee, who apparently issued a report which we have not obtained, but the comment I want to make is this, that there in the mouth of a visitor is exactly the type of complaint that runs through so many of our proofs, and we do take that as a very strong corroboration of the accuracy of our witnesses. I may say that these proofs came before me long before I read this Board of Control Report, and where one finds exactly the same class of allegation made it does tend to confirm our evidence. Of course whether some of them were disproved or not I do not know, but it is the type of complaint I want to draw your attention to.

11,740. Chairman: Yes, by the Commissioners who visited, while they found some of the matters alleged to exist, they found at any rate when they went that some of them had been remedied?—The Commissioners in that case declined to interfere until the local visiting committee had reported, and they in fact paid their visit some three months later, and I think they say that they thought it would be best if they confined their remarks to the then condition of the asylum and its future control.

11,741. We could if desired see the report of the visiting committee?—That is what I thought; it is possibly a document you might obtain. On page 27 they say: "This report has been published and a copy can be obtained by anyone who wishes to peruse it." We do not know from whom.

11,742. We might perhaps take a note to get that report. Now let us pass to the question of occupation and recreation. We will all agree that these two matters are very important from the point of view of the treatment of patients, and you spoke yourself of the patients whom you saw unoccupied and listless. Of course the difficulty is to know how to occupy some kinds of patients. I suppose in the institution you visited there were a considerable number of patients occupied in some way or other, either in laundries or outdoor work or gardening?—Actually I did not see many of them because, as I said, it was approaching the dinner hour, and possibly they were not at their work.

11,743. Is there not necessarily a certain residue of the persons whom you find it very difficult to occupy?—That must be so, but of course the first difficulty is this that you get a class of case, not a very serious case, in these institutions who is asked to work, and one type will accept the work joyfully as a relaxation to his thoughts. The other type which one is familiar with says "No; I am not going to work under trade union rates. I am not going to do skilled work here unless it is paid for," and he deliberately sits down and does nothing. I do not think you can suggest he should be compelled to work, but we think you might in connection with this work stimulate it by offering some more adequate reward than is given at present. A little extra tobacco, I forgot how much, is given for regular work, and a little extra tea in the sewing rooms, but there are asylums where methods are being tried for giving some financial inducement.

11,744. Earl Russell: If his objection were a trade union objection he might be put on a different class of work?—Mr. Stewart reminds me of course that some of them would not infringe their own occupation, but might take up some general work. We do not know. It does seem to us practical (again a question of finance) to give that stimulus in the shape of some financial reward. Of course, in licensed houses there are, as you know, something in the nature of canteens where patients can supplement their diet; and, as we are told again and again, in these asylums patients do go terribly hungry, and they rely to a very large extent on the visits of their friends to bring in extra food. That only applies to a certain number. We think it would ameliorate their condition considerably if a canteen were available where they could spend a few pence if they were put in the way of earning those few pence.

11,745. That is extra stimulus for those you can get to work, but what about the class you cannot interest—those who will sit about?—I am afraid we can do nothing for them, except to put more periodicals and books in their way.

11,746. There are a great many whom you simply cannot stimulate?—It is part of their mental condition, of course. There is another suggestion put forward by the Board of Control, and that is the question of animals; one knows that is a great distraction. One Commissioner is keen on the breeding of canaries. That does raise another point that there is a total absence of animal life in most of these asylums, except possibly an asylum cat.

11,747. In my time in London every London asylum had canaries?—Quite. That is commented on again; it seems to be dropping off. I asked a superintendent about that question of birds, and he said: "The old supply has fallen off, and nobody has given us any more." That was in a county asylum.

11,748. Miss Madeleine Symons: Have you had complaints as to the quantity and quality of books and periodicals?—Yes; general complaints. I think the supply is very unequal in asylums. Our evidence really amounts to this, that in many institutions patients are thrown completely on their own supplies.

11,749. Earl Russell: You remember what one superintendent told us—he said you could get books and papers sent to a hospital, but that the public took no interest in asylums; that it was very difficult to get things sent to them?—Yes, I remember that; but should a supply of that sort of thing depend upon the public? Where you are treating mental cases, is it not one of the first medical objects to supply them with some distraction?

11,750. Certainly one might think they should have a library of their own, but they have a library in some asylums?—Yes; it varies very much.

11,751. Chairman: Mr. Parker deals with that in a moment. I think we might exhaust the topic of occupation and work. On the question of work you point out further that, while it might be improved by a system of small rewards, asylums are by no means uniform in providing for work?—Of course we find that again. We quote largely from the Board of Control Report to draw your attention to it. I refer to pages 131, 270, and 176 as showing divergencies in institutions in the matter of providing employment, and on this point even where workshops have been provided under practical conditions they are not used, which seems to indicate something wrong. That point again was discussed with one superintendent, and he seemed to think that the question of workshops was limited to useful work, like the repair of asylum boots, and that better class of work is done outside. Of course that is hardly the point.

11,752. No; you want occupation?—You want occupation, and not necessarily in the routine administration of the asylum; there are lots of other forms of occupation.

Chairman: I have seen them at Christmas time engaged in making Christmas decorations out of paper, and so on, quite an attractive occupation, that class of thing which is not remunerative work at all.

Dr. Sara White: Would you allow me to say there is a Brabazon fund specially intended in the first instance for workshops in the Birmingham asylum—a fund for supplying materials. Half a dozen ladies or gentlemen would come once a week and arrange employment for men or women, and the women appreciated it greatly. When I was there the matron chose them, and they were only too delighted to come, and they took a great interest. One circumstance which weighs against that is that all the patients' belongings were taken from them. I think Mr. Parker did not mention that.

Chairman: I have the point which of course is quite a sound one. If you could get people to interest the patients and instruct them in crafts, basket-making and, on the women's side, embroidery and things of that sort, though it might not be very economic employment it would be interesting and a distraction.

Dr. Sara White: This fund supplies the material.

Chairman: Voluntary effort seems to supply the material in this instance, but it would require an instructor if you could get him to come.

Witness: Yes. I think that has been recognised from time to time by the Board of Control. There are institutions in which attempts are made in that direction, but they are very few. I am told that at Severalls asylum in the eastern counties that principle is adopted.

11,753. I personally should have thought it was exceedingly valuable. It is a question of the employment being itself curative. If one can devise interesting occupations which will take the patients out of themselves it is worth doing, even if it costs money to do it?—To the lay mind that would seem one of the only methods in which you can advance, and it ought to be adopted almost independently of cost.

11,754. I was visiting a place the other day where ex-service men are, and I was greatly struck with one or two shops where basketmaking and other things were going on, and men were working vigorously and were obviously interested in their work. They were cases well on the way to recovery; they were turning out some very fine work, some beautiful work?—Yes, and of course there again if you could attach some financial inducement you would rope in a much larger number.

11,755. Miss Madeleine Symons: I saw an institution where they were teaching women to make cigarette cases and to do bookbinding, and they were selling their own work, and the patients told me they got more orders than they could meet?—That is very interesting.

11,756. Chairman: There was one instance I came across where a man, who is a very serious case at intervals, was a very clever draftsman, and he was making a little money by making portraits of his fellow patients and they were very good I am told. But there is room for development along those lines?—Yes. Of course there is another point that comes into my mind, the case of a lady who was very skilled at embroidery, and so forth, and her services were very freely utilised by the Staff. Of course they were not paid for—one has to guard against that sort of thing.

11,757. Do you think that is wrong?—The suggestion is that the work was not entirely voluntary, that it passed beyond the voluntary stage, so that it was difficult to break off.

11,758. Earl Russell: Apart from that suggestion of course it would be good for her mental health?—Quite.

11,759. Chairman: And give her more feeling of self respect—if she were doing work which was useful, rather than if she were doing artificial work?—Always subject to this, that voluntary work must not be made compulsory.

11,760. Quite. Now we may pass to books and libraries, and there you have a quotation from the Board of Control Report at page 232?—Yes; "There appeared throughout the wards to be a great dearth of books and bound periodicals."

11,761. There you find also the want of cage birds referred to "and we should like to see some cage birds distributed through the day room"?—Yes, and they refer again to it at pages 138 and 153.

11,762. But on books and periodicals you want, of course, to have a good library, the question is how you are to get it; it costs money?—Once it is recognised that these are really the most valuable curative agencies for a diseased mind apart from physical ailments, one would have thought it was an expenditure which could be most easily justified.

11,763. I appreciate that; the literature would probably have to be chosen with some care; and the issuing of the books would have to be supervised.

Earl Russell: Miss Symons suggests that there is no reason why these institutions should not have their own library of 100, 200 or 300 books and interchange them, so that, in effect, they would have a library of many thousands if they would only co-operate.

Chairman: That method is pursued in the case of the Commissioners of the Northern Lights, where an interchange of books and periodicals takes place between the various lighthouses, but they also receive from members of the public quite a number of copies of magazines and illustrated papers.

Earl Russell: I think with a little organisation you could get up a very large circulation in this way.

11,764. Chairman: I am sure many clubs would be glad to send a good many of their periodicals at the end of the month. This is a thing which might be assisted, if I may say so, by a voluntary organisation such as yours.—Quite. Sending supplementary supplies?

11,765. Yes.—Of course one feels that one could never entirely rely upon a voluntary system. You might supplement, but really the thing ought to be dealt with by a central control.

Chairman: There must be an ordinary library in each institution.

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,766. Earl Russell: But it is a question of getting, as a medical superintendent said, the public to realise that these things would be useful in asylums?—Yes.

Sir Ernest Hiley: The difficulty is in the counties more than in the towns. The towns have generally got the Free Library where there is a surplus of books to draw upon; but in the counties, where they have nothing to fall back upon in the way of a Free Library, that is where the voluntary organisation would be useful.

11,767. Chairman: Yes, but I think it is part of the general policy which we have heard advocated by Mr. Parker and others. If you can get the public to take an interest in the asylums you will find that they will send their benefactions to them. One reads in the report of every general hospital at the end of the year the thanks of the institution for all kinds of gifts. It seems to me that that supplements in a most valuable way the strict letter of the law, and just gives that feeling of interest in the inmates which one would like to foster. If I might, with respect, commend it to your Society, that is a piece of public work that would be of great value, to make people anxious to send contributions.—We shall bear that suggestion very carefully in mind.

11,768. I think there is a great fund of goodwill in this country which only has to be tapped. If people know it is a good thing, you will get a response in this country.—Yes, but is there not just this: to make that help continuous you would have to get at the personal element, that is to say, occasional visits. One has that feeling. I do not know that they are encouraged at present. I am not sure if I presented myself at the doors of any asylum and simply said "I want to come in and look round" that I should be welcome.

11,769. We had one medical superintendent who said that he attached enormous value to a special lady visitor.

11,770. Earl Russell: Try one or two places where you are not too well known and see if they will let you in?—I will.

11,771. Chairman: People are human; if they thought you were coming for the purpose of making a case against them, of course you would not be received very cordially. I am not at all sure after your evidence here you would not be welcomed in quite a number of them.—Just on that point it may be of interest to you that in this particular report which you ask me to hand in, I find that the expenditure there on periodicals and books was £135 a year, and on amusements £43 17s. That is in that one institution. That is given amongst miscellaneous expenditure, which runs to £3,765.

11,772. Do you think that is on the meagre side?—It does not seem a very big expenditure. I think there are there about 1,100 patients, but in that particular institution I am bound to say the supply of books was quite good, and they were easily accessible in the wards.

11,773. Earl Russell: One does not know how much of it goes to periodicals, but if it is £130 a year in books it is a very fair amount.—That would mean a large supply of books, but I was rather struck with the absence of newspapers; I think I only saw one as I walked through; and there again I do not know what the supply is, but I think it ought to be quite a free supply. If one paper has to be handed round among 50 or 60 people it does not go very far.

11,774. Chairman: That is quite a good point. You deal next with the very important question of parole. Again I suggest that you need not labour that, because we have heard a great deal of evidence, all one way, on the value of parole.—Yes; the only point I want to make again is the divergence.

11,775. I think we might get on the note the references?—The cases where it is very freely used are reported in the Board of Control Report at pages 263, 289, and 183, and the converse of that at pages 204 and 272, and there is another reference on page 177.

11,776. I think the one at page 272 is just worth noting in passing, because that seems a very extreme case: "We notice," says the visiting Commissioner, "that no patients are allowed parole, even within the grounds of the hospital, and that no patients are allowed to sit up later at night than the ordinary patients." That seems a very extreme case?—Yes; and then you have another very extreme case on page 177: "I was surprised to hear that no patients are allowed parole, and that on only one day in the year are patients taken for walks outside the grounds." That simply shows, as I say, that every institution is really a law unto itself; it does what it likes at present.

11,777. It is rather a comment upon the suggestion that there is a system in operation. In every way there seems to be rather a lack of system?—Of course that is the comment made by the Cobb Report, that there is no system, and they take Dr. Lomax to task on that, but when we refer to the system we do not refer to it quite in the same sense. On this question of sitting up, of course there again that is dealt with in the Nursing Report, I think; and we come down to the question of money, that is to say, that sitting up seems to imply, in a lot of institutions, running the nursing staff in two shifts in order to bring in the extra hours, and in that really seems to lie the objection to it. But they recognise that it is a very great hardship, especially on convalescent cases, to be compulsorily sent to bed on a summer's afternoon, with daylight saving, at seven or half-past seven. The changes are coming in very slowly, and there again if there were directory powers one hopes it might be made compulsorily. It seems no answer, as one of the superintendents said to you: "We have lately given these facilities and have found they are not availed of." Of course if you have trained people for years to go to bed at six o'clock they are not likely to avail themselves of it.

11,778. Earl Russell: In connection with that point, at what hour are they brought out of bed in the morning?—It seems to vary from 6.30 to 7.

11,779. In theory, being insane patients, they can stop in bed if they choose, and have their breakfast in bed if they insist on it?—I do not think so ever. As far as our information goes, if a patient fails to get up, it means the refractory ward at once, and we had a very strong case of that in a licensed house. I think I may say with certainty he will go to the refractory ward on a point of discipline. I do not think I am putting it too high, but on that point, as far as our evidence goes, that is what it suggests.

11,780. Chairman: I suppose you must have more or less definite hours for getting up and going to bed, because if you have a large number of patients to dress you must marshal them in a certain order; one has to be the earliest and one has to be the last, and so on?—I am not complaining of that. To maintain the routine, patients must get up unless they are ill.

11,781. I asked a patient a question about going to bed at 7 p.m. She went to bed at 7, and I said: "Do not you think that is far too early?" Curiously enough she said: "I do not think so, because I have worked pretty hard all day, and I am rather glad to get to bed." But I do not think she was a person who would have occupied her time very much, and might be not quite the case you are figuring of a patient who wished to sit up and read?—And then there is the important corollary that, of course, after a tea of bread and margarine, sitting up at night without any refreshment is not an attractive performance.

11,782. And with no prospect of a meal till next morning at eight o'clock?—Yes; that is so. They are now beginning to give what is called a light supper, but when the Dietary Report was made that was given in less than 6 per cent. of the institutions. I have found the reference in the Nursing Report which I think is worth putting before you: "The special requirements of mental patients demand due consideration of the recreation and social life of the hospital; especially does this require that the patients' day should not be unduly curtailed, and there is need to avoid the too prevalent practice of bedding patients at so early an hour as eight or even seven p.m. Indeed the time of bedding patients is a point upon which most existing schemes fail. The need to reduce the hours to a workable basis either necessitates the serious hardship entailed in putting physically healthy persons to bed by 7.30 p.m., or, alternatively, where this is overcome by means of two full eight hour day shifts, the scheme is wasteful and extravagant in staff. The number of patients who can profitably be kept up until nine or ten p.m. probably in no hospital exceeds 50 or 60 per cent. So there is a practical difficulty." We always come back to the question of uneconomic expense.

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,783. Then you deal with seclusion in side rooms—I think we have covered that?—We have dealt with that except one point, and that is the construction of asylums now. It has been put before you, I think, that it is extremely regrettable that it should be necessary to have these side rooms opening on the living wards; and I was very much struck again in the Hertfordshire asylum, which is really beautifully laid out to find in their newest ward, which has just been built since the war, that a side room opening on the dormitory is in evidence. I discussed that with the superintendent, and he said from one point of view it was most objectionable and disturbing to the patients, but it lent itself to easier supervision. If you had side rooms in a separate place that would complicate the difficulties.

11,784. Earl Russell: The real cause of it is economy of staff?—Economy of staff again, and I think we have got a reference to that; I cannot put my finger on it, but I think that is recognised also by the Board of Control, that it is a painful experience for patients, and it does seem a pity that any fresh construction should be allowed on those lines if that is the only object of it, because it is a matter of constant complaint. Here was a beautiful new reception ward with three side rooms opening off one end and beds in close proximity to the side rooms. You have a violent patient, you have either got to let him disturb the whole of the ward, or you have to drug him; and that is recognised in the Nursing Report, that far too free use is made of drugs to obviate that very difficulty; but it is a constructional point, and a question of capital expenditure.

11,785. Chairman: And staff?—And staff.

11,786. I think on this point the evidence we have had has been more or less one way, that you want to keep the violent noisy cases away from the quiet cases, because of the obviously detrimental effect of the noisy cases on the quiet cases. It stands to reason?—Yes. Then there is one more point on this question of side rooms, and that is their actual condition. Of course in many institutions they are still terribly deficient in light and air. That again is recognised by the Board of Control Report, and our evidence shows that especially in the case of women and also some men, where they are exposed to long periods of darkness in the winter, perhaps from seven at night to early the next morning without a glimmer of light, that is a very terrifying condition, especially to a patient in any state of mental excitement.

Earl Russell: Will you not give these two references to the Board of Control Report?

11,787. Chairman: I was going to suggest to Mr. Parker—in support of what you have been saying you might give us the references?—The first one is page 48—then pages 253, 258 and 139.

11,788. Associated with this question to some extent is the question of classification, and we are agreed, are we not, that improved classification, facilities for classification, is a very important question?—That probably lies, I suppose, at the root of reform, but it also involves fresh construction in the existing institutions.

11,789. And that again relates itself to finance?—Exactly.

11,790. I do not suppose that, however persuaded we are, we can do more than the Board of Control themselves have done: i.e., recommend this as urgently as possible in the matter of construction of premises?—There again, we are not quite satisfied that the best use is being made of the existing facilities in classification. We rather suggest that attention might be more directed to that. For instance, as a sort of example there is an institution referred to on page 176 where the Board of Control point out this. "The number of patients on suicidal parchments show a percentage of 13 per cent., or nearly six times as high as the average in all mental hospitals. While fully aware of Dr. Simpson's views on this matter, we hope that all these cases are reconsidered sufficiently often so as to ensure that patients not actively suicidal are not unnecessarily harassed by a too constant espionage." Of course you realise at once that there is an idiosyncrasy, I should expect, on the part of the medical superintendent in classifying suicides very freely, and the Board of Control is powerless to interfere except by this general criticism; from the patient's point of view that of course is serious.

11,791. And you draw attention to a paragraph on page 239 of the same Report, upon the mixed character of patients: "They appear to be in excellent health, and throughout the building were very quiet and orderly in behaviour, even though in almost every ward the patients are of a very mixed character, as is shown by the fact that in all but two wards on the female, and one on the male side, there are acutely suicidal patients, epileptics and troublesome patients mixed with others who are quiet and even convalescent." That is adduced by you to show that classification even in the existing premises is not always carried out?—No; and again it has this further bearing, that though it comes so late in the day it supplements and confirms the evidence we have had from our patients. I have stressed that point, because we have submitted that evidence to as careful a scrutiny as possible; and where we find it confirmed again and again by these reports, we do suggest that it is very reliable evidence.

11,792. And again it is not a matter that really brooks much argument, because it is agreed that classification is at the root of reformed treatment?—Yes, and if I may put this to you: possibly again it is an economy in staff to keep these patients mixed, because patients do exercise considerable control over each other. If there is a shortage of staff, I can well see that it may be from a superintendent's point of view a necessary policy to have sane patients to take a turn in a ward with patients of another calibre. I can see practical advantages in that from the point of view of administration, but it seems to be very wrong from the point of view of treatment.

11,793. With only one qualification, and that is this, that I could imagine that patients well on the way to recovery would introduce a more or less hopeful feeling into the atmosphere of the community; one would not like the patients all to be patients aggregated together who were of one type, and possibly a hopeless type. If patients are on the way to recovery, I am told that they exercise a very considerable beneficial effect upon the others. One is recognised to be getting better, and the others say "If that fellow is going out soon, I hope I will be going too"?—Of course that does raise a very difficult point, whether you are justified in exposing a recovering patient to those people because of the help he would be to other people. One is inclined to say "No, the duty is to the individual and not to the community in the institution." Of course there again we find patients who seem to have a very good form of classification; they refer to a certain type of the cases as the lost cases, and another type of cases as the sensible cases, of whom the best are people you can converse with quite freely, and they say they should not be detained. That does seem to me quite a useful general classification. Mr. Stewart points out to me again that, unless those ripening for discharge are in a class by themselves, they are not likely to come under the sustained observation of the medical staff.

10 February, 1925.]

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,794. One of the most up-to-date institutions I have heard of has a series of villas, and the patient progresses from one to the other as he recovers, until he reaches one at the end in which the conditions are almost entirely unrestricted; that is the last stage before release; it is found the best plan apparently to keep the different stages together—I mean those belonging to each stage in a separate building?—Quite, and that seems to have the additional advantage of the introduction of change—the constant movement.

11,795. You travel from stage to stage, and you should recognise your promotion from building A. to building B. as a stage in your recovery?—In progress, yes, and we feel that, apart from separate villas, it might not be impossible, even with existing buildings, to create smaller wards.

11,796. And grading?—And grading.

11,797. Then you have a page in your précis on the Board of Control, but I am sure we have covered that in what has gone before?—I think we have.

11,798. We have gone into that fully. The next passages relate to definitions of sanity which, you remember, you took earlier?—Yes. It has been pointed out to me there that the definitions I have given you of sanity, in the view of some of our members, are really definitions governing the right of detention. I feel myself that the two things are very much the same, but I was asked to put that view before you.

11,799. We have already pointed out that all practical definitions are rather definitions arising from the consequences of the mental state than explanatory of the cause of that state?—Quite.

11,800. Then I am going to suggest with regard to the two concluding pages of your précis, that you should hand those in, because I understand that these are the considered submissions of your Society, as you have framed them yourself?—As they were framed some weeks ago, I do not know whether you would allow us, perhaps, to revise them slightly, in view of the evidence we have heard given here?

11,801. Certainly; but I think they should be put on the note in your own language; therefore, I am going to suggest that those paragraphs in which you sum up your considerations should be handed in by you.—If you please.

The following is the extract from Mr. Parker's précis:—

"Conclusion.

"The submissions which the Society wish particularly to emphasise in conclusion are as follows:—

"1. Early Treatment.—The immediate provision of voluntary hostels free from detention in any form, supported by subsidy from the State and controlled by the Minister of Health through local Health authorities, with no association with the Board of Control or any other Board or Department of State controlling Lunacy administration.

"2. The early adaptation of Hospital wards to deal with incipient mental cases or temporary cases such as those arising from illnesses with rise of temperature.

"3. The adaptation of Infirmary wards to permit of better classification and conditions.

"4. Legal.—No deprivation of liberty without investigation by the judicial authority.

"5. The unification of the methods of certification and the issue of reception orders.

"6. The elimination of all unnecessary distinctions between private and pauper patients.

"7. No extra fees to be payable to permanently employed officers functioning in certification.

"8. Provisions to secure that the judicial authority shall in all matters act judicially on the lines indicated in the case submitted by the Society, and not in an administrative capacity.

"9. Full disclosure to the patient or his representative of the allegations made against his sanity.

"10. The patient at all stages to have a statutory right to representation.

"11. A clearer definition of the term "Lunatic" or "of unsound mind," and that a definite standard of insanity be specifically laid down, based upon the protection of the public and of the individual.

"12. That the mental standard required for discharge should be the same as the standard for certification.

"13. That the report of the Medical Practitioner be privileged only if given in good faith and with reasonable care, and that all evidence given at the judicial enquiry shall be given on oath and subject to cross-examination.

"14. That every patient under detention have the statutory right of examination by a judicial authority at least once a year, or at any time upon special cause being shown by him or someone acting on his behalf, as set out in the form of procedure suggested in the Society's case.

"15. The Right of Appeal to Quarter Sessions.

"16. Institutional Treatment.—The establishment of a new and more representative Central Authority with definite powers of direction, acting through assistant District Commissioners, who shall be trained administrators and not medical men.

"17. The urgent necessity of applying generally the improved methods of curative treatment now available, and improving the general environment of patients.

"18. The limitation, where possible, of the numbers permitted in any one institution.

"19. Improved classification of patients in all institutions.

"20. The increase of the medical staff and nursing staff to permit of better and more individual treatment.

"21. The strengthening of existing visiting committees with such additional statutory provisions as will ensure their functioning.

"22. A statutory provision that authorised visitors independent of lunacy administration and licensed as in the case of prison visitors, shall be appointed by the Home Secretary.

"23. The introduction of the judicial authority within Asylums with authority to discharge, investigate complaints and act as an additional safeguard to the patients.

"24. The statutory right of independent medical and legal access to a patient without permission of the Board of Control.

"25. Some provisions that the senior medical officer shall not be charged with responsibility for administrative duties, i.e. that the present duties of the Medical Superintendent be divided.

"26. No punishment under the guise of "Curative treatment."

"27. Closer supervision of the use of powerful drugs and a record of their consumption.

"28. Improved facilities for correspondence and notification to patients of their Statutory rights.

"29. Discharge.—Further provisions to ensure that the existing methods of discharge are freely utilised in practice and that more liberal maintenance is granted.

"30. The introduction of the judicial authority as an additional method of discharge.

"31. Licensed Houses.—That no additional licences be granted.

"32. That no existing licences be renewed except upon terms that particulars required in the case of Public Companies be filed at Somerset House.

"33. After Treatment.—Provision for more liberal financial aid and extended opportunity of after treatment, in convalescent homes or elsewhere."

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,802. Then another document has been handed to us along with this précis, which is of quite a different character, and I confess I am a little puzzled to know what to do with it. It is called "The case prepared by the National Society for Lunacy Reform." Have you read that through?—Yes; that forms part of our submissions to you. I have referred to it once or twice; in fact a great deal of it is incorporated in what I refer to as my proof.

11,803. I am bound to say there is a good deal in it that does not seem really to be very helpful to us. There are places where there are attempted draft sections, which are quite useful efforts in the way of formulating proposals. On the other hand, there is a good deal of comment which does not seem to be of very great value to us?—If I may say so, that was an attempt to put before you the sort of opening Counsel should have made if he had been permitted to address you, a general argument, and also the concrete case which I have endeavoured to deal with, and the procedure which we felt might be of some assistance; but I rather gather your recommendations may go even further than that if you recommend new legislation.

11,804. Then we are to treat this as if it had been an opening speech, so to speak?—If you will, Sir. Mr. Stewart tells me that there are constructive proposals in that which I have not quite fully developed, and perhaps you would allow him to address you on those.

11,805. No, we shall not. My real reason for making this comment is that it seems to me that the document does partake very much of a Counsel's opening statement in many respects, which is all very well when addressed to a Court of Law, but which is really not helpful to us. I will tell you what I have in mind. It is full of rhetorical passages of this sort: on one of the pages I read this: "Whatever may still remain in doubt one fact stands out clear and unchallenged (except perhaps by the Board of Control) and that is that not only is there on the part of the Public a haunting dread and suspicion concerning the institutions controlled by the Board, but the patients who have had first hand experience of the environment in asylums, think and speak of those experiences in terms of unmitigated abhorrence. There is no need to stress the gloomy details of the picture disclosed to the startled senses of the recently certified 'patient' as for the first time the doors of the asylum close on him. The impression produced by the strange sounds and the foul odours and pervading atmosphere of gloom might well prove sufficient to turn the brain of even a normal man or woman condemned for an indefinite period to play the part of an involuntary detail in a picture which needs the genius of a Dante or Lombroso to faithfully depict it." Is that really the least helpful to our deliberations, Mr. Parker?—Well, Sir, the substance underlying it I am quite prepared to endorse, and I have attempted to do so because, if I may put it in this way, taking the patients that come before us, the thing that does strike one most fundamentally is that very sense of horror of the treatment they have undergone. I have seen men come out of the trenches, and I have seen patients come out from these asylums, and there is very little to choose between them.

11,806. What I am rather thinking of is this: the publication of sensational matter of that sort is calculated to do a very great deal of harm?—I do not think we are asking you to publish it. That is the reason it is put before you in written form.

11,807. A great many people have to go to asylums, as we know, and if all their relatives thought that every patient encountered in asylums foul stench and all the rest of it, as described in the passage I have read from this document, it would create a most unhappy impression. For instance, take the institution you yourself have been describing to us in Hertfordshire. When you entered that institution were you greeted with "strange sounds, foul odours, and a pervading atmosphere of gloom"?—No, I was not, but I put it before you as a model institution, supplied by a wealthy county.

11,808. But this is made applicable to people generally in asylums at the present moment?—I do not think it is intended to be that, but when you come to hear our evidence it does go much further than that.

11,809. Earl Russell: What you call the substratum is entirely obscured by the tropical foliage?—Yes.

Chairman: You would be able to establish, and we would accept—indeed you need not labour the point—that most unpleasant and most distressing things do occur, and that there are instances of neglect, and, if you please, cruelty. What I am so concerned with is this, that the impression should not go abroad that the entire management of the asylums in this country is characterised by these features. The fact that incidents of a deplorable type occur in certain institutions, or have occurred, should not be put forward to the public as if that were typical of the way in which the treatment of the insane in this country is controlled.

Sir David Drummond: You are just voicing, Mr. Chairman, what I endeavoured to bring out with regard to the medical faculty appertaining to the asylums. There may be officers who do not carry out their duties in such a manner as the Board of Control or we would desire, but the impression the précis gives is that they are all the same.

11,810. Chairman: That is what I think is a little unfortunate, because you would create an impression at large, not that you were merely combating the abuses of the system, which is a most legitimate task, and a task upon which we are all engaged here, but it would give an ill-balanced picture of the existing situation. Now you have been the first person to give credit where credit was due; and it is naturally most discouraging to people who are anxious to do their best if they are lumped with the people who are not doing their best. I should prefer to keep a more balanced and fairer judgment, and without in the least discounting the drawbacks of the existing system, or the cases in which it has lamentably broken down, at the same time to give reasonable recognition to the efforts of those who have devoted their lives to this work, and who have earned the gratitude, I think I may say without exaggeration, of hundreds if not of thousands of patients?—As a Society, of course, we quite assent to that, and we have tried to put our evidence upon that basis, that very great credit is due to the medical profession for the reforms they have brought about, and are bringing about.

11,811. And I think you might include the staff also?—Yes, subject always to this comment that there is a danger that they may dwell more upon the improvements effected, without bearing in mind what relation those improvements have to the growth of improvements in the outside world. Quite admitting that conditions to-day are 50 per cent. better in asylums than they were 20 or 30 years ago, what are the conditions outside? Have they not improved more than 50 per cent.?

11,812. Do not imagine that I do not recognise that for propaganda purposes you have to paint a picture, but while for propaganda purposes that may be quite legitimate, our purpose of course is not propaganda. Our purpose, as I said earlier to-day, is a more calm investigation of the actual defects of the existing law. However, you have told us exactly how we are to regard this second document, and I do not think we need delay over it. I only wanted to say that it gave to my mind a rather ill-balanced view of the present position, that it laid all the stress upon the shadows and none upon the light; whereas throughout your own evidence you have, if I may say so, adopted a different course, and have most fairly recognised instances where credit was due, while not in the least minimising the importance of the reforms which you have at heart. As far as I am concerned, I should like to thank you very much indeed for your assistance to us, and some of my colleagues may now like to ask you a few questions.

11,813. Earl Russell: You have been so very fully examined that I really only have one question to put. That arises out of something which you said, I think, at your last appearance but one. You remember you were talking about what should happen in the case of a convalescent patient who had become sane, who was not certifiable but whom it was not desirable to discharge in his own interests?—Yes.

11,814. And I think the ultimate conclusion you came to, if I remember aright, was that he should be technically discharged, but remain, if he was sane and thought fit to do so, as a voluntary boarder?—That was one solution I remember.

11,815. I have just drafted a form of words, because unless we get these things in words it is always difficult to know whether we mean the same thing. I would like to read this to see if it carries out what your idea is—I am not saying I agree with it: “The superintendent of an asylum or other person having the charge of a lunatic shall discharge such lunatic from detention if he becomes of sound mind, and able to take care of himself”—(I pause there to say that in looking through the Act I cannot find that there is any clear indication of that in the Act itself; it is rather by implication that the patient is to be discharged)—“either forthwith or at the next meeting of the visiting committee, if such meeting is to be held within fourteen days. Any person detaining any such recovered lunatic against his will shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.” That is really what you ask, is it not?—Yes, in substance.

11,816. Then I have put in a saving clause covering the other point, to this effect: “If the patient is unfit to take care of himself from physical and not from mental causes, the superintendent or other authority may retain such patient for ordinary hospital treatment, with the consent of the patient, but shall discharge him from being under certificate.” Does that meet what you were suggesting the other day as desirable?—I am a little bit puzzled about the words “from physical causes.” It seems to me that if the causes are purely physical, the natural thing would be for that patient to go to a hospital. I do not see any advantage to him from remaining in an institution where we have been told that the treatment for “physical causes” is not half so good as in a hospital.

11,817. Would you not give him an option of staying in the hospital if he desires it?—I see no objection to giving him an option. I am not again quite clear whether, if the accommodation is limited, it would be fair to cumber institutions with any great number of these sort of cases.

11,818. No, but what I am trying rather to provide for is where I think you differed from the existing practice, and that is the last week or fortnight or three weeks of convalescence, where a superintendent would not let a patient go because he did not think it was in his interests, although the patient was not certifiable.—I think your suggested clauses are most helpful, because they are optional.

11,819. What I want to know is whether they meet your point?—I think they meet it entirely, because it is optional to the patient.

11,820. Mrs. Mathew: About the question of diet, Mr. Parker, would you suggest that the local authority should have perhaps less say in matters of diet? Is it the local authority that settles that these patients shall only cost 5s. per head per week for food?—At present entirely, and we rather visualise this, that if the dietary scale suggested, or any other dietary scale is adopted, the central authority would then impose upon all the local authorities the necessity of supplying that scale of diet. Of course the cost of it would vary enormously in different localities. That comes out very clearly on the cost of the proposed diet at the end of the Dietary Report; the differences in the cost of any commodity are quite extraordinary, they vary 50 and 100 per cent.

11,821. Yes, but on that perhaps a county asylum might help a town asylum a little bit. I do not know what they produce.—By the interchange of their own produce?

11,822. Yes, they might.—They might. I am not quite sure that it would be economic, because you see the supply is very limited and it is periodic only.

11,823. I have seen one institution, and I was rather struck by the diet which was so very, shall we say, economical and free from fat, and no butter was used whatever. You have not found any great fault with that, but personally I think that is rather a flaw in the present regimen of diet.—I think it is, and on that question of diet there is just this further point. We can get no very satisfactory evidence that the infirmary diet in these institutions is very much better than that of the general patients. I do not want to suggest it is not, but the sort of impression we get is that there is nothing like the standard in the infirmary ward of a mental institution that there would be in a hospital.

11,824. And of course all these people are ill?—As a layman one would suppose that the first basis of building up their mental health would be to build up their physical health, and that is why we have drawn attention to this extraordinarily low scale of diet. I cannot conceive as a layman that with it you can get the adequate basis from the medical point of view on which to work your cure.

11,825. So that you are thereby rather handicapping the cure of the patient?—It seems to me most distinctly so.

11,826. Sir David Drummond: You will stop me, Mr. Chairman, if this matter has already been fully elucidated, but I am not quite clear in my own mind what Mr. Parker would say with regard to the condition of the patient who is to be discharged—that is to say, does he propose to discharge the patient the moment he becomes what we should call uncertifiable? This is a point we discussed before, but I think we ought to be clear upon it.—I welcome the opportunity of saying that our recommendation is that at that point discharge should take place, that there is no legal justification for detaining the patient, because you think that by treatment you can still further improve his mental condition. If you can persuade him to take that treatment voluntarily, do so by all means, but we think it is a very serious proposition that because he has not quite come up to a rather ideal standard of mentality, admitting that medical assistance can improve that, he should be compelled to undergo a still further period of detention.

11,827. He has passed the stage when he would be certified, but he is far from recovered. That is a practical point?—I think it is a practical point, and the suggestion we make is that when he reaches the first stage he should be discharged, even at the risk of his coming back again.

11,828. Chairman: Let me put it in this more or less graphic way, Mr. Parker: we will take the progress of a case, and, just as in every other disease, it will have its incipient stage, that is to say, let us put it that for the first week of the onset the case was not a certifiable case but a recognisable case of mental disorder. Then it enters upon a stage when lawyers and doctors would together agree that the case was certifiable, and let us assume that that stage lasts three months. At the end of the three months it passes into the stage of recovery, and for the concluding week the patient is in this condition: no longer certifiable, but in process of recovery. Thus there is a stage during which you have to invoke the law in order to get the necessary powers of control and detention, and then you have the period in which the disease is passing off, and in which the case is no longer certifiable, but is not yet recovered. The episode which is the period of legal detention is peculiar to this ailment of course. If it were not an ailment requiring the interference with the liberty of the subject, the ordinary patient would enter the hospital at the onset of the disease and remain till the recovery from the disease; but because this ailment requires a period of compulsory detention it seems odd that the patient should be turned out of the place to which he has been sent for treatment and recovery, before recovery is in fact completed?—I see your point. Of course, if that last period was only a week, one might concede it.

Mr. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRCH PARKER.

11,829. It might be much longer, of course?—But we do not feel we can concede such a big principle as this that a patient may be legally detained when in fact he is no longer certifiable, with the object of doing him good. I think Lord Russell's clauses would meet that case.

Sir David Drummond: But there are so many cases with regard to which the medical superintendent will tell you that in a fortnight or three weeks they will have the acute symptoms back again, or in less than a week they will have the acute symptoms back again.

Earl Russell: But surely in that case he would be certifiable, would he not?

Sir David Drummond: Not if there was a court of enquiry, and a lawyer and a magistrate came in and talked to the man. They would find him in a state in which they would say: "I do not think this man is certifiable."

11,830. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You would accept the evidence in a case like that of the medical superintendent, if the person was subject to paroxysms?—I was going to suggest that that was a periodic case; and it seems to me that any authority would at once then say: "If it is a periodic case we must let a period elapse." But then I can give a case where the periods were much longer, and the man came out; the periods have extended in that case to three or four years since he has had any trouble of any sort.

Chairman: Personally, as a lawyer, I find it difficult to reconcile the idea of a person being detained who is not certifiable; that seems to me to be fundamental to this question; but on the other hand I equally recognise that in the treatment of mental disease, as in the treatment of every other form of disease, the welfare of the patient is the main thing. The compulsory detention is only an episode, an unfortunate but necessary episode, in the treatment of this particular form of disease. This may help the problem which I see is pressing upon Sir David, who is thinking of the patient's point of view much more than the legal aspect of it: ex hypothesi, this patient has ceased to be certifiable in the legal sense; that is to say, he has passed into the zone of convalescence; it rather seems to me then that the patient who has reached that stage is a patient who has regained a sufficient degree of sanity to recognise that his own recovery is for his own welfare and would be the last person to insist upon leaving, if the doctor said to him: "You are getting on very well, but these are things it takes some time to recover from. Would you not be better for staying on here for a few weeks?" This person is no longer of unsound mind, and is therefore able to appreciate the argument, and such a person would probably be prone to accept the advice and stay on.

Sir David Drummond: He may be of unsound mind and not certifiable.

11,831. Chairman: I qualified my proposition,—not of unsound mind, but has recovered so far that he is able to appreciate things in a way that a certifiable person would not. (To the witness): That may cover a good many of the cases, may it not?—I think it would; and, as far as one can gauge the patient's view, if the patient was told "You are no longer certifiable, but you are detained for two weeks under statutory regulations for convalescence," I do not believe anyone would raise the slightest objection. It is happening every day in practice.

11,832. Earl Russell: Did you say "detained"?—Yes; I think they would recognise compulsory detention for a short period for convalescence. As far as our evidence goes, that does happen.

11,833. Chairman: Let us also take along with it all the other elements you have in mind. There is, of course, the question of temporary release on parole, which helps in this matter. There seems to me to be probably a very small residue of cases in which the difficulty might arise; the only type of case would be where a patient, ceasing to be certifiable, had conceived a dislike to the institution or had a very eager desire to get home, prematurely in his own interests, and insisted on going out, although the medical adviser said "You are making the greatest mistake in doing so, in your own interest." Such a person would no longer be detainable against his will, and he might do himself some injury. I doubt if it is possible to cover that case, consistently with the law on the subject, unless there is some such expedient of saying there may be a period of qualified detention at the expiration of the period of compulsory detention?—That would meet it, to a large extent; and then we hope, of course, that the After Care Associations would be available for that case.

11,834. Earl Russell: You see the immense difficulty of a hard and fast line—of saying "He is not certifiable, and that finishes it"?—I do; but we have been rather suggesting that that line shall be hard and fast with a very limited qualification.

Earl Russell: I know. I am trying to get you to broaden it a little bit.

Chairman: Then, Mr. Parker, that concludes our examination. May I repeat what I said before? You have assisted us most materially in every way in our labours. We shall pay great attention to the recommendations you have made to us.

Witness: May I say, Sir, that the Society are greatly indebted to the Commissioners for the time they have been good enough to devote to the hearing of our evidence?

Chairman: I do not think for a moment that it has been lost, if I may say so.

Witness: Thank you.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON LUNACY AND MENTAL DISORDER.

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.

Tuesday, 24th February, 1925.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

MR. N. MICKLEM, K.C. (in the Chair).
THE EARL RUSSELL.
SIR HUMPHRY ROLLESTON, BART., K.C.B., M.D.
SIR DAVID DRUMMOND, C.B.E., M.D.
MR. H. SNELL, M.P.
MRS. C. J. MATHEW.
MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.
MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).
MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Mr. WALTER BLOOD (President, National Asylum Secretary, N.A.W.U.), and Miss MAUD WIESE (R.M.N.), called and examined.

11,835. Deputy-Chairman: This morning we are to take the evidence of the members of the nursing staff, a point of view we have not hitherto considered. I understand the witnesses are first, Mr. Walter Blood, who is the President of the National Asylum Workers' Union, and that Mr. Blood and the other two witnesses present are all representatives of the Union?—(Mr. Walter Blood): Yes.

11,836. Are you to be the spokesman, Mr. Blood?—No, Mr. Gibson, the Secretary, will be the spokesman.

11,837. Then we shall have the main evidence from Mr. Gibson and supplementary evidence from Mr. Blood and Miss Maud Wiese?—(Mr. Gibson): That is so.

11,838. If you please. Now we will just consider, first, your qualifications, Mr. Gibson. At the present moment you are the General Secretary, and you have been General Secretary of the Union since 1913?—That is so.

11,839. As I understand, before that you were Honorary General Secretary for some 3½ years, and during that time you were actively engaged in the nursing service?—Yes.

11,840. And you are the holder of the Medico-Psychological Preliminary Certificate?—Yes.

11,841. I suppose before you took your final certificate you accepted this office?—There was no curriculum of training when I entered the service at the institution I was in, and in my service I did not have an opportunity to take the final certificate.

11,842. Then perhaps I may deal with the other two witnesses. Mr. Blood, you are the President of the National Asylum Workers' Union?—(Mr. Blood): I am.

11,843. At the moment you are staff nurse at the Rowditch Mental Hospital at Derby?—Yes.

11,844. You are a holder of the First Aid, and Preliminary and Final certificates of the Medico-Psychological Association?—Yes.

11,845. And you have had 14½ years' mental nursing service?—That is so.

11,846. Miss Maud Wiese, you are a registered mental nurse?—(Miss Wiese): Yes.

11,847. You are at the moment head nurse in the London County Council Mental Hospital at Claybury?—Yes.

11,848. You are the holder of the First Aid, Home Nursing and Medico-Psychological certificates, and a member of the General Nursing Council, and you are also a member of the National Executive Council of the National Asylum Workers' Union?—Yes.

11,849. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Might we know what a head nurse is. That is not the same as matron, is it?—(Mr. Gibson): A head nurse is the intermediate rank between that of charge nurse of a ward and matron. The head nurse supervises a number of wards.

11,850. Deputy-Chairman: A number of charge nurses?—Yes.

11,851. And above the head nurse would be the matron and the deputy matron, I suppose, at the Claybury Mental Hospital?—(Miss Wiese): Yes, that is so.

11,852. Now, Mr. Gibson, I notice that your précis deals with a very large number of topics. Some of them relate, of course, directly to the nursing staff, some relate to the patients, and some to the general lunacy law and the practice. I think after you have told us something about your Union, it would be desirable that we should deal with your précis in that order, taking matters referring to the nursing staff first, then matters referring to the patients, and ultimately your suggestions as to modifications which you would suggest in the general law and practice. Will you tell us about your Union? What does the Union consist of? I see you have over 11,000 members in England, Scotland and Wales?—Yes.

11,853. And those members are drawn from some 128 institutions?—Yes.

11,854. I suppose that means that you represent a large majority of the workers?—Yes, a considerable majority of the staffs.

11,855. Have you any idea what proportion of the asylum workers you represent?—I should imagine about 60 per cent. of the total staffs.

11,856. And I observe that your Union comprises more sections than one—there is the officers' section and the workers' section?—Yes.

11,857. What does the officers' section consist of?—The distinguishing factor between the two is that the officers' section is not called upon to obey any rule regarding the withdrawal of labour unless they do so voluntarily; they are a self-governing section.

11,858. Earl Russell: "Withdrawing labour" is a polite term for a strike, is it?—Yes; the officers' section is a self-governing section. They are not bound by a vote of the ordinary members; they must vote themselves separately on any question.

11,859. Deputy-Chairman: Then taking the ordinary members, are they bound by the vote of the officers, or by the vote of the general Union?—The ordinary members are bound by the vote of the ordinary members.

11,860. You have not supplied us with your rules?—I will hand in copies.

11,861. It might be desirable, I think, for us to see the rules. Can you tell me what are your activities? What does the Union do?—Our object as defined is to promote better relationships between employers and employed, and to improve the status of the nursing staffs.

11,862. I suppose that is the general object really, to improve the status of the nursing staff?—Yes.

11,863. Do you have annual, or six-monthly meetings?—We have annual conferences at which every branch of the Union is represented; and the governing committee meets periodically.

11,864. How many branches have you got?—We have 106 branches.

11,865. Does each separate institution constitute a branch?—Providing it has sufficient members. We have institutions that prefer to be sections of the central branch.

11,866. Those would be the smaller ones?—Yes.

11,867. But with regard to the larger institutions, there would be a separate branch formed in each?—Exactly.

11,868. And then for your annual meeting there would be representatives sent from the several branches?—Yes.

11,869. Are the members bound by the resolutions that are carried at your general meetings?—The annual general meeting is the governing body of the Union, and the members are bound by any alteration of rules made there in conformity with the rules.

11,870. Do you take any particular steps to get members of the different staffs to join the Union?—Well, Sir, we take what steps are possible.

11,871. I gather from information that appears, not in your précis but elsewhere, that you run a magazine, amongst other things?—We do.

11,872. A free and independent Press?—Yes, of which I am not the editor.

11,873. I suppose in that free and independent Press you get an expression of the views held by the Union, criticisms of the Board of Control, of the public, and of the medical staffs, and so on—everything?—Yes.

11,874. Is that a monthly publication?—A monthly publication.

11,875. Earl Russell: Do all your members get it free, or do they have to subscribe specially?—All our members get it free, and many non-members get it on terms.

11,876. Deputy-Chairman: They buy it?—Yes.

11,877. Now let me pass to questions more particularly relating to the nursing staff. I suppose, speaking generally, the probationers who come into the hospitals have had no previous experience at all?—I think that is so in 95 per cent. of the cases.

11,878. The exceptional cases would probably be where some higher position had to be filled, and nurses were wanted who had had a general nursing experience, or something of that kind?—That does take place in some instances. General trained nurses are sometimes engaged to take charge posts, or as assistant matrons, or occasionally matrons' posts.

11,879. Would there be any other cases where there had been previous training, do you think, except those?—There might occasionally. There sometimes is a case where a nurse has been in the Poor Law service, and has acquired a certain amount of experience, although not certificated, and may transfer to a mental hospital.

11,880. Now I suppose all probationers are taken in at the present time as weekly servants, are they not?—Monthly, as a rule.

11,881. So that a month's notice would be required on either side?—On either side.

11,882. But they would either be weekly or monthly, I suppose. There are no cases where your probationers are taken for a term of years?—In some cases the terms are that during the probationary period they may be weekly, but I think invariably when they are appointed they are on a monthly contract.

11,883. Would there be a written contract always entered into with them?—A signed contract, as a rule. They have to sign what is termed the obligation form.

11,884. Now, referring to your memorandum, you have set out for us what would be the ordinary duties of a probationer on appointment; we can take them, of course, quite shortly. In the first place, he would at once be appointed to ward duties, and would be under the direction of a charge nurse?—Yes.

11,885. His first duties would be to fetch coals, light fires, assist in ward cleaning, and so on?—Yes.

11,886. And he would get his general duties and responsibilities explained to him by the charge nurse?—Yes.

11,887. Now taking a day's duty, at 6.30 or 7 a.m. (I suppose that varies according to the particular asylum,) he would assist in getting the patients out of bed and dressed, carrying fuel, and so on, and assist in washing patients; then breakfast at 7.30 or 8 o'clock; then taking patients' meals from the kitchen, ward cleaning, bed-making, floor polishing, washing, and so on, and then patrolling in the airing court or in charge of one or more special cases?—Yes.

11,888. At 12 o'clock preparation for dinner, some patients again requiring washing; dinner generally over by 2 o'clock; staff tea at five o'clock; patients' tea at 5.30 or 6; after tea he may spend half an hour encouraging the patients to play games; then at 7 or 7.30 bed time. In some instances nurses would finish at 7, others at 7.30 or 8, and in a few institutions, where the three-shift system is in vogue, the staff are on duty till 9.30 or 10?—Yes.

11,889. Now in the case of the ordinary hospital the probationer would be taken on for what may be called a long day, a 12-hours' day.—Are you referring now to the general hospital?

11,890. A general hospital?—I believe it is so in the majority of cases, yes.

11,891. They would not ordinarily begin on a three-shift system—an 8-hours' day?—There are about 21 institutions in the country, mental hospitals, where they are at present working on a three-shift system, and if a probationer joined any one of those he would immediately fall into the routine.

11,892. But the routine which you have indicated here would be the routine of the majority of the hospitals?—Yes.

11,893. When you say some 20 hospitals have adopted the three-shift system, those, I think, are the London County Council hospitals, are they not?—They number nine of them.

11,894. And are the others scattered over the country?—Scattered over the country.

11,895. Then after this preliminary probationary period the nurse would be placed on the staff and would commence his studies for the Medico-Psychological Association's examinations?—Yes.

11,896. If he remain after three months I suppose he still remains a junior probationer?—He remains a probationer so far as classification is concerned, but so far as the contract of service is concerned he is placed on the permanent staff.

11,897. Is he what is called sometimes in these reports a senior probationer then?—No. The difference is one of terminology. A nurse is always a probationer until he has qualified by certificate, but legally he becomes one of the permanent staff; that is to say, he is appointed as an established officer and commences to contribute under the provisions of the Asylums Officers' Superannuation Act.

11,898. He becomes a staff nurse for the purposes of the Superannuation Act—that is the 1909 Act?—Yes, and frequently his contract alters, and from a weekly contract it becomes a monthly one.

11,899. Then you say he begins his studies for the Medico-Psychological examination; that is always assuming, of course, that he is in a hospital where there is training for that certificate?—I think in all the county mental hospitals and borough mental hospitals now they have a syllabus of training. The list has only been completed within the last 12 months, but now they all have a system of training.

11,900. Would a probationer, a member of the staff of that kind, have a definite time allotted to him for study, or does he take his study as he can get it between his staff duties?—It varies considerably. As a rule they have to study in their own time. There are some places where they permit them to take, say, half of the studies in their own time and half in the time of the authorities.

11,901. I observe you say he may occasionally have to accept responsibility for patients in the ward; but, generally speaking, he would have some form of ward duty, I suppose, all through the day?—He always has ward duty. What I mean is he may occasionally be left alone with a number of patients, either in the ward or in the airing courts, or have three or four special cases allotted to him to supervise.

11,902. After three months he has arrived at a stage when he might from time to time be left alone with a particular class of patients?—He may do that within the first three months, and sometimes does.

11,903. Then he proceeds with his studies and does his work, and after three years, if he succeeds in passing the final examination, he becomes a staff nurse.—Quite.

11,904. Let us suppose he does not pass his examinations. Assume that at the end of three years he has only passed the preliminary examination, what would be his position?—The position is this, that if he has made due endeavour, and if the authorities think that temperamentally he is likely to be a satisfactory nurse, they will permit him to continue trying in the hope that he will pass within the next two or three years.

11,905. Will he become a staff nurse then?—No.

11,906. Supposing that at a later period, at the end of another two years, he has not passed the examination, will he still be retained on the staff, or would he have to leave the asylum?—He might be retained.

11,907. I suppose there must be a very considerable class of men and women who find it quite impossible from their lack of early education, or whatever it may be, to pass the Medico-Psychological examination—it does not strike one as being the easiest thing in the world to do?—The syllabus is very difficult and some of the tuition is not too efficient.

11,908. I will come to deal with that a little later, but what would happen in those cases where the nurses were unable to take the final examination? Would they, as a rule, stay on in the asylum?—In the past it has been the rule that they did stay on in the asylum. At the present time it is becoming, on the other hand, the general rule that they are given notice on the ground that they are not likely to become efficient nurses.

11,909. Now that the profession of mental nursing is becoming looked upon more as a vocation, and the training, I suppose, speaking generally, is very much improving, a change is taking place in the position of these people—they may have to retire more frequently than they used?—Yes.

11,910. But assuming he gets the certificates he gets appointed as a staff nurse?—Yes.

11,911. And at a shortly later period he becomes a charge nurse—I understand that is a higher position?—Yes.

11,912. What exactly is the meaning of a charge nurse?—A charge nurse is a nurse who is responsible for a ward; that is, responsible for the patients, for the staff of the ward, and for the stock and utensils in the ward. Every ward carries its own stock rooms, patients' clothing, bedding, towels, and all that sort of thing.

11,913. It is an entirely separate unit of its own?—Yes; and the charge nurse supervises the whole ward.

11,914. And that involves, amongst other things, a considerable amount of clerical work, does it not?—It involves a fair amount of clerical work, yes.

11,915. You speak here of keeping the ward list—is that a wardlist of materials, or of patients?—There is a ward stock list which is of materials; then there is generally a ward book in which a roll of the patients is kept, and also a report of daily changes in their bodily or physical condition, temperatures, and any incidents that may occur.

11,916. And it is the duty of the charge nurse to keep those lists?—Yes.

11,917. Then there is the diet list and the medical list; with regard to the medical list, does that include the orders which are given by the doctors?—And a list of patients who are on special medicines.

11,918. And probably the medicines supplied, and so on?—Quite.

11,919. Then there is a casualty book, and other ward books. Speaking generally the charge nurse is in entire control for the time being of the ward, of course, always subject to the directions of the superior, the matron or the deputy matron, or of the head nurse or the male side?—Yes.

11,920. I suppose the information you have been giving us so far applies equally to the male and female sides?—They are both run in entirely a similar fashion.

11,921. Then there may be sick nursing to be done in the infirmary or hospital ward—would that be part of the duty of the charge nurse? I suppose that is only really referring to the general duties of the nurses just as anywhere else?—In the infirmary ward the charge nurse would, as a matter of practice, supervise all the sick nursing—would spend most of his time in the sick dormitory.

11,922. And, of course, as you point out, the wards will vary very largely in their size and in the type of patients, and so on; and in all cases there will be a very considerable responsibility thrown upon the shoulders of the nurses, particularly of the nurses who are in charge. One can see it is an extraordinarily difficult and important post?—Quite.

11,923. Am I right in this, that the view of your Union is that it is an extremely important thing that good probationers should be obtained?—We are entirely of that view.

11,924. Could you indicate upon what lines special inducements could be held out to probationers—how are you to obtain this good class that you desire—what would be the special inducements that you think should be held out?—I think the special inducements to commence with ought to be reasonable remuneration, and better ultimate prospects.

11,925. Would not one very material thing be if you could induce the probationers to look upon this as their ultimate vocation in life, and assure them of good systematic training for that vocation?—Well, Sir, I think I can only answer that by asking you a question. Are you likely to get people to take it up as their ultimate vocation in life, if the prospects are not satisfactory?

11,926. No, that is true enough, but, on the other hand, if once it is looked upon as an important professional vocation it is reasonably clear that there will ultimately be good posts. I mean that the whole position of the nurses would be improved?—I am afraid I cannot agree with you.

11,927. You do not think that is so?—I think the recently issued report of the Departmental Committee goes to prove that the posts will not be improved; as a matter of fact they may be made considerably worse.

11,928. Are you thinking of the pay?—Financially and otherwise.

11,929. Do you think it would be an inducement to nurses to know that they would get a good systematic training in their work?—Decidedly, providing the training is going to lead to something.

11,930. We shall have presently to consider a little more carefully this question of remuneration, but do not you think it would be an inducement if the remuneration were made largely to depend upon the passing of the examinations and the acquiring of certificates?—I think that we have always taken the line that training is essential, and that we have endeavoured to increase the remuneration for obtaining the certificate; but so long as the authorities are permitted to retain an untrained staff, I do not agree that the remuneration should be made conditional upon obtaining a certificate.

11,931. Do you mean to suggest that the untrained staff should be on precisely the same footing, so far as regards the remuneration, as the obviously skilled staff, if I may put it so?—Not exactly, but I do mean this, that if after five years they retain untrained staffs in the service they should not be able to retain them at a much lower rate than the trained staff; otherwise the tendency would be to retain them for the economical advantage that the authorities would obtain.

11,932. I see you say that you are desirous that training should be given. You say that unfortunately it is only within the last three years or so that training has become general?—That is so.

11,933. And that has been partly at the request of your Union, and partly on the recommendation of the Joint Conciliation Committee?—Of which we are parties.

11,934. You are one party?—Yes.

11,935. I suppose the other party represents the Mental Hospitals Association?—Yes.

11,936. Put broadly they represent the employers, and you represent the employees?—Yes.

11,937. And you suggest that in some of the places the tuition at the moment is extremely casual?—That is so.

11,938. We may assume that it is not equally good in all places, but am I right in saying that the training now in the larger hospitals is enormously improved?—It has very considerably improved. I think in one or two of the smaller hospitals the lack of efficiency in training is due to the weakness of the medical staff; they are not strong enough in number. I know that was the case at one institution, Carmarthen, where they only had a medical superintendent, and one assistant medical officer for over 600 patients.

11,939. In a case of that kind I suppose you think it would be desirable that some assistance should be got from outside?—No, I do not think it is necessary. I think it is desirable that one or two members of the staff should be appointed as sister tutors.

11,940. But to take this case of Carmarthen, I do not know of course the particulars myself of that institution, but I gathered from what you said that the medical staff was so small there that it would be very difficult for them to carry out their medical duties in the hospital, and at the same time to give a reasonable time for training the staff?—Quite.

11,941. In a case of that kind it might be a great advantage for them to get outside assistance for the purpose of training, might it not?—No; I think the remedy there was to appoint another assistant medical officer. I think the medical staff was too weak to do their duty to the patients, apart from training.

11,942. Now let us look at the schedule which you have given us of the syllabus for the training for mental nurses, and those nursing mental defectives. It looks as though the nurses who pass through this examination have to do a very considerable amount of reading and study?—A very considerable amount.

11,943. I do not quite follow what is the distinction, what is the meaning of the syllabus of training for mental nurses, and those nursing mental defectives?—The mental nurses are those employed in looking after the certified insane. The mental defectives are those people who are detained in institutions which are established under the Mental Deficiency Act.

11,944. Yes, I see. Then the note says that all sections except XIII apply to mental nurses. Those are the ones we have to deal with?—Yes.

11,945. And I see Section XIII deals with particular technical matters connected with mental deficiency as distinguished from lunacy. Is that so?—Yes.

11,946. Now this syllabus, as we observe, is a difficult and complicated matter. For the first examination, sections I and II have to be passed?—Quite.

11,947. The first section dealing with the general duties of a nurse in a mental hospital, and section II dealing with anatomy and physiology?—The first three sections have to be passed at the first examination.

11,948. Section III is first aid?—Yes.

11,949. And those form the preliminary examination?—Yes.

11,950. Is there not a separate certificate for First Aid?—I want to make one correction in that. The intermediate examination has now been abolished and where there were previously three examinations there now are only two. The first five sections form the preliminary and the remaining sections form the final. Up till this year there have been three examinations—within the last two years.

11,951. There used to be a certificate for First Aid, and then a certificate for the first examination?—The First Aid certificate was really a St. John's certificate, and it had no connection with the Medico-Psychological Association.

11,952. As far as the Medico-Psychological examination is concerned that was just one of the sections of the preliminary examination?—Yes.

11,953. Now there is no intermediate examination?—A preliminary and a final.

11,954. You say the preliminary deals with subjects down to the end of section V.?—Yes.

11,955. Is it possible for the examinees to take the sections separately. Can they pass at one examination for instance, under section I., in the general duties of the nurse, and then at a later examination in anatomy or physiology, or must they take all the subjects together?—They must pass at the first examination in a paper that may be set on all the first five sections.

11,956. There are not separate papers set in each section?—No; there is an oral and a written examination, and questions in both of them may come from any or all of the five sections.

11,957. So that the nurse entering for the examination must be prepared to pass in all those sections at the same time?—Quite.

11,958. Then you say there is an oral as well as a written examination?—Yes.

11,959. Then from section VI to the end, excluding section XIII, that is the final examination?—Yes.

11,960. And there again does the same apply—you must pass in everything at the same time?—Yes.

11,961. Now I must say, looking at these papers as an outsider, and with no medical knowledge, but knowing something about examinations, it does seem to me that these nurses have a rather formidable task before them when they begin?—Extremely difficult.

11,962. And by the time they have finished and have passed the examination they ought to have a very considerable knowledge of the body and of nursing, and of medicine and so on. Now only comparatively few do obtain this certificate, do they?—I think you will find some idea of the numbers if you refer to the report of the Departmental Committee which was appointed to inquire into the nursing service in county and borough mental hospitals. They refer in their report to the number of nurses for all certificates.

11,963. I am obliged to you. There are two separate certificates which nurses obtain now, are there not? A mental nurse might obtain a certificate under the General Nursing Council?—Yes.

11,964. As I understand it, Miss Wiese has both certificates?—(Miss Wiese): Yes.

11,965. And there is the Medico-Psychological certificate?—Yes. The tendency is to take the Medico-Psychological examination because it is cheaper. (Mr. Gibson): The syllabus is precisely the same. (Miss Wiese): It is practically based on the old Medico-Psychological syllabus of training.

11,966. Must you pass an examination in each case if you are to hold the two certificates?—It is not essential. A nurse who has taken the Medico-Psychological certificate is able to become a State registered nurse without sitting for an examination up to July of this year.

11,967. She can be put on the register?—Yes.

11,968. Now I observe it says at the top of page 11 of the Report of the Departmental Committee "The total number of nursing certificates granted by the Association up to the 31st March, 1924, was 17,429, including 146 as respects mental deficiency"—that is the second class?—Yes.

11,969. Now taking the 17,429, on referring to page 12, I do not quite follow how the numbers apply. Looking at page 12, it would appear as though the charge nurses with final certificates were 510 male, 635 female, deputy charges 326, and 241, total 1,588 male and 1,155 female. Does the figure of 17,429 represent all the certificates that have been given from the very beginning?—Since the inception of the examinations.

11,970. Of course, a very large number of those nurses have passed on to other work, and so on?—Quite.

11,971. You draw attention somewhere to a note of the Departmental Committee on the returns for 1923. "We ascertained that as many as 50 per cent. of the men can claim over five years' service at their hospital in contrast with only 20 per cent. of the women"?—Yes.

11,972. And that, "on the other hand, while there are scarcely 11 per cent. of the men with under one year's service, there are no less than 32 per cent. of the women who have not yet completed a year at the hospital where they are at present employed."—It is on page 13 of the Departmental Committee's Report.

11,973. Then it goes on to say: "If the percentages expressing the numbers who have passed one or both examinations are recalculated upon the numbers of those who by their duration of service may fairly be expected to have so passed—a sufficiently approximate mode of calculation—proportions much more favourable to the women then emerge; thus, it would appear then that, of those with over five years' service, 56 per cent. of the men and 70 per cent. of the women are certificated in mental nursing, and that, of those with over one year's service, 25 per cent. of the men and 22 per cent. of the women have passed the preliminary examination." It appears from these figures that a very large number of the nurses who stay on for five years do pass the examination?—Yes, but is not that an extraordinary method of calculation, considering that a very large proportion of the nurses do not stay on? That is like saying if I reach 100 I shall reach a century.

11,974. I suppose many of them stay on because they get the certificate, do not they?—I really cannot agree with that process of reasoning.

11,975. They acquire a certain definite and high standard of service. You see it would look as though in the case of female nurses 70 per cent. of those over five years have taken the certificate?—Yes, but when you consider that 32 per cent. of the female nurses have not 12 months' service, what proportion is that going to be of the actual number of staffs?

11,976. You cannot tell from that; that is one of the extraordinary things, that the female staff apparently is constantly changing and fluctuating?—Exactly.

11,977. They are voluntarily resigning in most cases?—And sometimes being dismissed.

11,978. You show the way in which they are constantly fluctuating; you have set out certain extracts from the Scottish Board of Control Returns?—Yes.

11,979. Have you got any figures corresponding with those?—The English Board of Control only publish percentages, and the Scottish Board of Control do not publish percentages, because I am afraid they would form dreadful figures, so they give the actual numbers.

11,980. Could you refer me in the English figures to the percentages?—Yes, they are in the extract you have read on page 13: "As many as 50 per cent. of the men can claim over five years' service at their hospital in contrast with only 20 per cent. of the women. On the other hand, while there are scarcely 11 per cent. of the men with under one year's service, there are no less than 32 per cent. of the women who have not yet completed a year." If you continue downwards you will find that the extraordinary process of reasoning adopted by the Departmental Committee is this, that of the 20 per cent. of the women who stay over five years, 70 per cent. of the 20 per cent. have the Medico-Psychological certificate, so they say that is splendid.

11,981. So it is; the argument is right, is it not? But, of course, that does not account for the number of resignations within the five years?—I should imagine if they made the conditions of the service so bad that only 5 per cent. of the women would stay over five years they might have still better figures.

11,982. But just consider that for a moment. The conditions of service on the female side are as satisfactory, are they not, as they are on the male side?—Proportionately, yes.

11,983. You do not say that the male side is made more attractive than the female side?—Yes, I do.

11,984. In what respect?—My experience of the administration of mental hospitals is that the male side works much smoother—has more method of working—much more method.

11,985. But it is a strange thing that even if that is so, if there be a little more method, there are only 11 per cent. of the men under one year's service, and 32 per cent. of the women have not yet completed the year?—I think that proves my point, that conditions on the male side are more satisfactory.

11,986. But in what respect?—It is rather an awkward question to answer. What I mean is this: in a large institution like a mental hospital a great deal depends upon the supervision of either side by the matron or the head attendant, and, in practice, there are few matrons who are satisfactory. That is saying a lot, but it is so. What I mean is this. I find that almost daily we get complaints from female nurses who say they never know when they are going to have a day off duty. They may be told in the morning, "Oh, nurse, you will have to take this afternoon off," or it may be that frequently they are told at a day's notice, "You have to go on your annual leave." On the male side, on the contrary, the general rule is that there is a proper leave roster posted, the men know when they are going to have a day off duty, or their annual leave, and they can make preparations for it.

11,987. The administration by a male nurse is better, you think, generally speaking, than administration by a matron?—I think it is much superior. If I may put it in the words of a medical superintendent whom I spoke to recently, he said, "I can go away for a month and be quite certain that the male side would work smoothly, but," he said, "I could not go away and leave the female side for 24 hours."

11,988. Sir David Drummond: Does that reflect on the matron or the nurses?—I think it reflects on the system. I think the tendency on the female side is to keep officers in the service who are too old for the work. I do not think any woman is capable of satisfactorily performing the duties in a mental hospital after the age of 45; I think there are physical and psychological things in the structure of a woman which prevent her from being efficient after that age.

11,989. Deputy-Chairman: After the age of 45?—Yes.

11,990. Do you think the constant changes on the female side are mainly due to lack of good administration by the matrons?—I would not say mainly; that is a contributory cause. There are several causes: the unsatisfactory prospects and the very difficult nature of the work.

11,991. Now let us just consider the unsatisfactory prospects. Has not any female nurse who passes her examination and who is on the staff a prospect of getting a good position as nurse?—I do not know about a good position; she may get a fair position as a charge nurse. (Miss Wiese): If I may say so, the tendency now is only to appoint nurses with additional training in general nursing to posts of administration.

11,992. But, Miss Wiese, do not a considerable number of the mental nurses now who have taken their Medico-Psychological certificate proceed very often to general nursing?—(Mr. Gibson): They cannot get the facilities. (Miss Wiese): It is very difficult; it is only a few enthusiastic people who are prepared to do a probationary period of five years, and very often six or seven.

11,993. You mean you have to start again?—Yes.

11,994. Are there not arrangements made now in different places to assist the nurses?—Very few are willing to do it. (Mr. Gibson): A circular was sent out by the General Nursing Council to over 400 general hospitals asking them whether they were prepared to accept mental nurses for general training, and only 22 of over 400 replied in the affirmative, and about 9 of those 22 were exceedingly half-hearted in their replies. (Miss Wiese): And one or two have withdrawn since.

11,995. We have had some evidence of cases where arrangements have been made between mental hospitals and general hospitals for the interchange of nurses, and for nurses going for their general training after entering the mental service?—(Mr. Gibson): Yes, I believe you had that evidence from Dr. Yellowlees of The Retreat at York, but you see The Retreat is in a privileged position as a mental hospital. The Retreat chooses its cases. For instance, Dr. Yellowlees said they did not take epileptics, probably the most unpleasant type of patient there is. They have made private arrangements. The Retreat as a rule do not keep their mental nurses on after they have completed training.

11,996. Is there any reason why the general hospitals should not welcome nurses from the mental hospitals?—I do not think there is a good reason, but unfortunately they do not welcome them.

11,997. Sir David Drummond: They prefer women to commence training ab initio, and they have so many applications that it is very difficult to take on a new type of applicant, as it were?—(Miss Wiese): I do not think that is the position now; I think most matrons will admit that there is a difficulty in getting nurses. (Mr. Gibson): That is true; that is a general complaint. (Miss Wiese): One or two of the large London hospitals would have a long waiting list, but the majority have not. There is a difficulty in getting probationers in general hospitals. I think possibly another difficulty might be that a trained mental nurse would be expected to be taken on at the hospital as a second year probationer nurse. It does not give a nurse the same opportunity. (Mr. Gibson): And, of course, there is another difficulty, and that is that the mental nurse who has served a period of probation, and has had perhaps four years established service under the Asylums Officers' Superannuation Act scarcely wishes, even if she were able, to sacrifice two or three years in a general hospital, which may not count for superannuation purposes.

11,998. Deputy-Chairman: When you say "which may not," do you mean which does not?—Which would not, unless special arrangements were made.

11,999. But you would not lose your superannuation benefits, would you, by transfer?—No, she would not lose the previous service, but she would lose the service she had at the general hospital.

12,000. Two or three years?—Yes, but two or three years out of a woman's life is a lot.

12,001. Now let us pass on to consider the question of remuneration. Recommendations have been made by your Joint Conciliation Committee as to the remuneration which should obtain. May I take it, in the first place, that there cannot be said to be any general standard of remuneration in the hospitals at the present time?—No, there is no general standard. These figures can be taken as an average guide.

12,002. Quite. Now, there are two forms of remuneration as I understand it. In a very large number of hospitals there is a salary paid, and all maintenance found?—That is salary and what are called emoluments.

12,003. You put maintenance as part of emoluments?—Yes.

12,004. I should put it that there is a direct cash salary paid, and then the nurse has everything found, including washing, board and lodging?—Yes.

12,005. Now, if you turn to page 29 of the Departmental Committee's Report, they deal there with the figures. These are figures for 1922 it is true, but one may assume they are not very different now. Now, for purposes of their own the Departmental Committee set out there the salaries paid in mental hospitals and those paid in general hospitals to women only?—Yes.

12,006. Of course, they say that is not with a desire to suggest that the mental hospital nurses ought to be paid the same as the general hospital nurses; they recognise the extreme difference and character of their work, and so on. If you look at that you will observe that there is a very considerable difference of standard at the hospitals. Taking the probationers: women—the minimum they put at £50, maximum at £69 15s. That would look as though there is no standard of wages. Then men, £71 and £98. Now to one knowing very little about this matter, it would appear that the initial salary offered the probationer is a reasonably high salary, is it not, if you assume that the probationer is to have everything found by way of board and lodging and washing. Those would seem to be reasonable salaries would they not?—I do not think it is too high; I do not think it is high enough. You see there is a very distinct difference between a nurse who is employed in a general hospital and a nurse who is employed in a mental hospital.

24 February, 1925.] Mr. WALTER BLOOD, Mr. GEORGE GIBSON and Miss MAUD WIESE.

12,007. Yes, I appreciate that.—Nurses who are employed in a general hospital know that, with reasonable application, at the end of three years they are members of a profession, and they have some freedom of action; that never does apply to the trained mental nurse.

12,008. I do not quite follow that. I appreciate, of course, to a large extent, what you say: but take the case of a trained mental nurse. Is there not a very large demand in this country outside the hospitals for trained mental nurses?—No. There is a demand by one or two nursing co-operations, but the nurse who enters them is simply devoting her time, in my view, principally to the welfare of the co-operation, and not for herself. They find there a post perhaps of looking after a private case. While she is engaged in looking after that case she is making a reasonable salary. When she comes out of work she has to live in a hostel provided by the co-operation, and she has no more money left.

12,009. You are dealing with cases where they have private nursing, where the fees are paid by the society?—No, the fees are paid by the individual.

12,010. By the patient?—By the patient engaging the nurse, but the nurse, according to her contract, has, when out of employment, to live in the hostel provided by the co-operation.

12,011. But do the co-operation find the patients?—They find the patients; they take a percentage of the nurse's salary when she has a case.

12,012. The patients are members in some way of the co-operation?—No.

12,013. I do not quite follow the position.—“Co operation” there is a misnomer; it is there, but it does not, in fact, exist. It really means that they have started a private nursing organisation, and they call it co-operation.

12,014. It really is a private nursing home?—Yes.

12,015. Who send out nurses to private patients?—Exactly.

12,016. I was thinking you meant rather nursing amongst the comparatively poor who were members of the co-operative society?—No.

12,017. But there must be a very large amount of that private nursing in the country?—I do not think there is a very large amount.

12,018. One can imagine a case of a private patient suddenly becoming insane and requiring considerable nursing, perhaps more than one nurse. Do you think that the doctors in attendance would have no difficulty whatever in procuring at once what nursing they wanted?—They could procure what nursing they wanted, there is no doubt about that; but they could not procure that nurse from a county mental hospital.

12,019. What I am driving at is this: Is there really not a very large amount of work to be done by a person who is trained as a mental nurse, who has left the hospital and engages in private nursing?—No, I do not think so; I do not think there is a great amount of work. I think what work there is is principally conducted through these private nursing societies, and the average individual does not have an opportunity. (Miss Wiese): In my experience very few mental nurses are attracted by private mental cases—very few.

12,020. Take the case of a mental nurse who has left the asylum and who has still to make her living: Would not she naturally look in the direction of private nursing?—Yes, and invariably she gives it up after a year or two and comes back to the county mental hospital.

12,021. Sir David Drummond: Not invariably?—That has been my experience. Just imagine what it means. Very often they have to live with the patients and live with them practically all day; very little time off duty. (Mr. Gibson): The position is this, that in the case of such a nursing co-operation, the more nurses they have on the staff the more money they make, because they charge a percentage on the fees they get for the nurse, and the result is they try to get as many people as possible, and not necessarily all certificated people, on their staff, so as to keep their hostels full. The nurse finds generally, when she is on a case, she makes a reasonable amount of money.

12,022. Deputy-Chairman: It looks to me as though you are suggesting that there is a class of middlemen who take all the profits and leave the nurses nothing?—I think it is so, and the same practice obtains in the general nursing homes which sends out nurses. I believe one of His Majesty's Judges expressed that opinion in a case two or three years ago.

12,023. I understand Miss Wiese's experience is that private nursing is so unpleasant that after a comparatively short time the nurses have to throw it over?—(Miss Wiese): That is my experience of many nurses who have left Claybury and have gone into it; sometimes they get a mild sort of case and make it their home, but very rarely. (Mr. Gibson): Of course, if a case is a difficult one it may mean 24 hours' duty a day, because it is very seldom they get two nurses. They get no relief.

12,024. On the other hand, of course, one does hear of cases of three or four nurses being required in private nursing?—There are very few; very few people have enough money.

12,025. I suppose that class of private nursing, I will not say is well paid, because that, of course, is a relative term, but it is highly paid, is it not?—I think the remuneration is fairly attractive in that class of nursing, while they are working. The difficulty is they do not work regularly.

12,026. You suggest that they are rather taken in hand by the middleman, so to speak?—That is the complaint that we generally receive.

12,027. Now I was putting to you the figures of the Departmental Committee. I gather that your Union is against that method of payment altogether, is it not?—Yes, the method of payment by salary and emoluments?

12,028. Yes, for some reason or other you do not like it?—We are speaking from experience. Our experience was that when we had the system of payment by salary and emoluments, a very high, in fact a fictitious, value was placed upon the emoluments; the emoluments were valued for the purpose of superannuation at £30, £40 and £50 per annum. One had to pay a deduction in cash for superannuation purposes on that valuation, but in actual practice we never received anything like the value of the emoluments—in other words, the accommodation and the food were unsatisfactory.

12,029. Then the plan which you prefer is that where there is living in, for instance, the nurse shall pay for whatever she has?—We prefer that the remuneration shall be fixed, and that the deduction shall be made for such services as are given by the authorities. Then the nurses are in a position to know whether they are getting value for their money.

12,030. But then how do you assess the payments which are to be made by the nurses for food and so on?—In these recommendations of the Joint Conciliation Committee you will find it provided: “payment for board and lodging”—that is on page 8, section XI. “That those members of the staff who are required to be resident and those who are required to take their meals in the institution, be charged for the lodging, laundry, and actual board, as the case may be, which they receive, the basis of the charge to be made, to be, in respect of board, the cost to the institution concerned, and in respect of lodging and laundry, the value of such emoluments as scheduled for the purpose of contribution under the Asylums Officers' Superannuation Act, 1909.”

12,031. I do not know quite what the last means?—That last means that under the Superannuation Act a schedule has to be posted in the institution showing the value of various emoluments as set out for the purpose of the Act.

12,032. Lodging and laundry?—Lodging and laundry.

12,033. How do they, as a matter of fact, get at the basis of the charge in respect of board?—The clerk or the steward as a rule bases it on the actual cost of the commodities, adding a little charge for services and for crockery, and so forth.

12,034. Of course, one knows that these figures are ascertained for all purposes, for the purpose of ascertaining how much is spent on food, and so on?—Yes.

12,035. While on that point, is the nurses' food in these establishments substantially the same as the patients' food?—No, the breakfast and tea meals as a rule are considerably superior. With regard to the dinners I do not think they are as a rule very much better—not in the best institutions.

12,036. The dinner would be about the same?—Yes.

12,037. In what respect are breakfasts and tea superior?—The patients' meals for breakfast and tea in my view have always been extremely unsatisfactory, principally bread and margarine and tea or cocoa; it applies to both meals.

12,038. I do not know that we can carry the point further so far as the wages are concerned. The Union is very strongly of opinion that the best form is a cash payment to cover everything?—Yes.

12,039. And is against the system of remuneration plus emoluments?—Yes, and if I may add, we do think that considering the difficulty of the examination and the nature of the work, when a person reaches the rank of staff nurse the remuneration should be adequate. If you will refer again to the Report of the Departmental Committee, the maximum wage they recommend for a male charge nurse is £135 per annum.

12,040. Would you mind giving me the page? Are those the figures given on page 30?—I have not found it myself yet, Sir, but I know it is there. In any case the figure is £135 a year, which is equivalent to £2 8s. per week.

12,041. £135 a year for a staff nurse?—For a male charge nurse.

12,042. Of course that is on the footing that everything is found for him in the way of board, maintenance, and so on?—Supposing you add £1 a week, and say that that is the value of the emoluments, you get a maximum of £3 8s. for a male charge nurse. That is considerably less than the minimum of any probationer police constable.

12,043. Not in the country?—Considerably less from Land's End to John o' Groat's.

12,044. Is that so?—Yes. I may point out this difficulty—if the charge nurse when he qualifies at one institution wants to transfer to another, he frequently finds a great amount of difficulty in it. I have a copy of a letter here. A member of ours made application to an institution for a post, he was a qualified male mental nurse, certificated, had been a pathological assistant for a number of years, and the reply he got was to this effect: "If appointed he would receive pay for his Medico-Psychological certificate, but his past asylum experience would not be counted except for the purpose of superannuation. If therefore he is prepared to commence as an ordinary probationer, if appointed, his application shall receive due consideration." That is the sort of encouragement they get to remain on in the service.

12,045. I suppose that was a case where there were a good many other applicants, was it not?—I do not think so. It was not applying for a specific post at all. He merely writes to an institution saying he desires a change.

12,046. But is it not rather like a case where the other institution had other applicants besides himself, and they had to consider his position with regard to the others. I do not know, of course. As you read it, it does seem rather a hard case?—It is not an uncommon case.

12,047. Now tell me, in your scheme of wages, the Joint Committee's scheme, do you make any special provision for skilled nursing?—Yes, if you will refer to the recommendations.

12,048. By the way, I suppose these figures that appear on your scale should be increased by the very considerable bonus at the present moment?—The bonus varies from 2s. 6d. to about 2ls.

12,049. But the average bonus would be 18s. or 20s., would it not?—Not as much as that, about 10s.

12,050. Where do you provide that skilled nurses, persons who have obtained certificates, and so on, should obtain more than the ordinary nurse?—You will find in the scale "Proficiency pay".

12,051. On page 7?—This scale was drafted when there were three examinations.

12,052. Now you would probably alter the figure?—Now it is 3s. for preliminary and 3s. for the final certificate.

12,053. Miss Madeleine Symons: Are not the newer proposals at the very end on the single sheet?—Yes, those are the proposals of course after the system of examination was altered.

12,054. Deputy-Chairman: Now let us consider shortly another matter, the hours of duty. I think your Union have some strong views about that?—We have.

12,055. Would you put them before us quite shortly?—Our view is that the patients cannot receive adequate treatment so long as they are bedded at 7 o'clock, or 7.15 in the evening. We have found in practice that it is impossible to keep them up any longer except by working a three-shift system. I do not mean by that three rigid eight-hour shifts. As they work it in the London institutions they work a 96-hour fortnight, and one long day per week. That system allows of the patients having a live day of 15 hours.

12,056. I suppose you have got to differentiate between the patients, have you not? There would be a considerable proportion of the patients who would only be too happy to be in bed by seven or eight o'clock, and there would be a considerable proportion who would be only too happy to be in bed by nine or ten o'clock?—I agree, but I do not think there is a considerable proportion who would like to be in bed by half past seven. There are many who would like to be who ought not to be allowed. In an ordinary mental hospital not more than 10 per cent. of the cases are bed cases. That is just an average I am striking. I should not think of the others that it is good for any but a small proportion to be in bed by seven o'clock on any night, and particularly in the summer time.

12,057. The disease these people suffer from is an extraordinary and strange disease, and I suppose in many cases the mere fact of getting quiet rest, if they can get quiet rest, might be good for them?—That is just the difficulty. I believe the use of hypnotics would be much reduced if they kept up the patients in the evening and gave them some exercise or recreation. Imagine a paranoiac patient suffering from a fixed delusion, and who is labouring under that delusion: he is put to bed at 7 o'clock at night in June; he is lying worrying about his trouble all the time. I think if that patient were walked round the airing court, or permitted to indulge in some recreation outside, or games inside, he would be much more likely to get to sleep.

12,058. Let us assume he wanted to get to bed, what would you say?—I should say certainly not; I should not allow him to go to bed.

12,059. I suppose in an immense variety of forms of ailment there must be a very large variety in the form of treatment. It is impossible to lay down rules one way or the other?—Decidedly.

12,060. Your suggestion is that under the system too many are bedded off at too early an hour?—My suggestion is that in many of the mental hospitals all the patients without exception are bedded at 7 o'clock in the evening.

12,061. Is that so now in many hospitals?—That is so now, and they are in bed till 6.30 or 7 the following morning.

12,062. That is not the rule in most of the larger hospitals at the present time, is it?—In many of them it is.

12,063. Compulsory bed time 7.30?—Compulsory bed time at 7, and 7.15.

12,064. Sir David Drummond: Does that apply to summer?—That applies to summer, too.

12,065. Deputy-Chairman: All the year round? Does that apply now, Mr. Blood, in your hospital at Derby?—(Mr. Blood): No, there is a proportion that stay up to a quarter to nine for recreation.

12,066. Not later than that?—No.

12,067. Anybody who likes to stay up there can stay up?—Yes, if he is a fit patient. They go to another ward and they play games. In the summer time they go out on the cricket ground.

12,068. How does that apply in the case of Claybury?—(Miss Wiese): They have a three-shift system; the London County Council are progressive as regards the mental hospitals.

12,069. They have what you call a three-shift system?—Yes, and the patients are allowed to stay up till a quarter past nine as long as they are in bed at half past, and it works fairly satisfactorily.

12,070. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Would Mr. Gibson be able to provide us with a list of hospitals which adopt the practice of compulsory bedding at 7 o'clock?—(Mr. Gibson): I think that information could be more authoritatively got from the Board of Control.

12,071. Mr. Gibson spoke with some knowledge on that, so I assume that is based on figures you could get for us?—Yes, I can get you a list.

12,072. Deputy-Chairman: I think the evidence we have had will indicate that that is not a very common practice now?—I am prepared to submit to you a list. (Miss Wiese): Is it possible to arrange this only on the three-shift system?—I do not think so.

12,073. I think it has been worked in other cases where they do not have the three-shift system?—I do not see how. (Mr. Gibson): The danger in these other places is that they let a small proportion of selected patients stay up. I do not think that is satisfactory.

12,074. I said there are enormous varieties of the ailment and there must be equally different treatments for them, you cannot lay down a rule; you would not wish to lay down a rule?—I do not suggest a rule at all, but I do suggest this, that if the doctor says in his opinion this patient would be better up, he should be kept up, and it should be not a matter of choice for the patient.

12,075. Do you mind explaining to me exactly what you mean by the three-shift system. Is it an eight-hour day system?—In practice it works like this. In the case of the London County Council: people who are on the morning turn will come on at 6.30 or 7 and be on till 1.30; 7 to 1.30, as a matter of fact, I think it is.

12,076. That is 6½ hours.—That is for five days in the week. Then on the sixth day they work from 7 in the morning until 9 or 9.30 at night, they do a double turn.

12,077. Is that the three-shift system?—Yes. In the afternoon they come on at 1 o'clock till 9 or 9.30 for five days in the week, and on one day of the week they do a double turn too.

12,078. Just let us consider that. In any case where that is worked the patients in a particular ward are under a double set of officials each day?—Yes.

12,079. May there not be some objection to that? Is it not an advantage that the charge nurse, whoever it may be, should be able to follow them through the course of the day?—I think the advantages considerably outweigh the disadvantages. (Miss Wiese): It might be said it would be a considerable advantage to stay on day and night and never go off. It would not be possible, would it?

12,080. That is putting an extreme case, but I suppose in all nursing that would be so. Nursing is one of those forms of service that does require, and may require, a very considerable amount of time; the long hours that are spent over it may be of enormous advantage to the patient, however trying they may be to the nurse.—(Mr. Gibson): May I put it in this way: you are bound to change your staff at some time. The position appears to be this: that we must seek the method of changing the staff that is least detrimental to the patients. We find under the present system (we have figures which we have already discussed) that only 20 per cent. of the women have over five years' service; that in itself implies a considerable amount of changing of staff.

12,081. Is not that mainly changing of staff in what may be called the lower grades of the staff?—I do not think so.

12,082. It does not mean that there is a constant shifting of the staff nurses?—Not necessarily, but it does mean in point of fact a good number of changes amongst the staff nurses.

12,083. It is the probationers who go, is it not?—And staff nurses among the female nursing staff too.

12,084. I interrupted you; I am sorry.—Changes in the nursing staff necessitated by changes in the personnel are the type of change which is worse for the patient. If you get probationers and new nurses coming in every day to a ward who do not know the patients personally, those are the type of people who create trouble. They do not know how to handle a patient who is subject to difficulties. But, if, under the system in vogue in the London County institutions we get, as we do get, a ward staffed with the same staff daily, and the handing over is done while the patients are seated at their mid-day meal, there is no confusion involved in the change at all. What happens is this: the morning staff is on duty till 1.30—the afternoon staff come on at one. The patients are seated at their dinner meal and the change over is effected without disturbing them. I want to point out that the afternoon staff that comes on is the same staff that was on the day before, and the day before that, and the week before was on in the morning, and that in point of fact this system makes each ward responsible for its own reliefs. When the charge nurse on the afternoon shift is off duty the charge nurse on the morning shift is on duty all day, and vice versa. Now under the other system, the long day system, the head attendant who wants to conduct his reliefs has to go round to his probationer and say "To-morrow you will relieve in Ward 6," and the unfortunate probationer walks into Ward 6—he does not know the patients—and does a day's duty. The following day he is relieving in Ward 7, and the day after that he is in Ward 1, and those are the changes which are worst for the patients.

12,085. Is there anything in this: The doctor would naturally come round twice in the day, would he not? He would get a report of the nurse in the morning and see the patients in the morning, and would see them again in the afternoon?—Yes.

12,086. Now when he saw them again in the afternoon, under your system they would be in charge of a new set of nurses; there would be nobody who would make a report to him in the afternoon of changes which might have taken place in the condition of any of the patients during the day?—There is the ward report book. When he came round in the morning he would have all the clinical notes available for him, and they would be available in the afternoon. Any extraordinary occurrence would be noted.

12,087. I was not thinking of extraordinary occurrences, but I suppose the charge nurses would watch a number of patients very carefully through the day, and would be making their report?—I think that is conveying a wrong impression of a charge nurse's duties. With the exception of the infirm ward the charge nurse does not have the patient under personal observation, with the exception of a small part of the day. Patients turn out to the airing court, or walk out at probably 9 o'clock in the morning, and the charge nurse is rarely with them; and then after dinner they turn out again; so that to talk about the personal observation of the charge nurse is really a misconception.

12,088. I am putting the point which seems to be rather stressed by the Departmental Committee, but I think that is rather their view. The way they put it is rather better than I do. They say "Patients may suffer from lack of continuity of observation and treatment." Do you think it is easy to exaggerate it?—I think they have exaggerated it, because I do not see how it is possible for a charge nurse to keep patients under continual observation.

12,089. They make a point, do they not, which perhaps will affect your Union more closely. They suggest it may have an effect on the staff numbers; they say "on account of the greatly increased cost of shorter hours, there is a tendency unduly to limit the numbers of staff on duty at any one time, thereby adding to the strain and anxiety placed upon the nurses, as well as reducing individual attention to patients to the lowest limit?"—I think that point of view has been underlined throughout the report, although they only put it at the end—the question of cost.

12,090. It is of course a question that has to be considered?—Undoubtedly, and it is a very serious problem.

12,091. The trouble with most of the questions we are confronted with is the financial problem largely?—Quite, but I do not agree that the proper solution is to lengthen the day in order to put more nurses on duty. I have been told by several medical superintendents who have the long system of hours that their difficulty is to have a sufficient number of staff on at the critical periods. The mid-day meal is one of them. Under the system in operation in London they have a double staff on at the dinner meal.

12,092. Because they are shifting over then?—Yes, changing over. Incidentally, Sir, if, as is implied in this Report, hospitals have to be kept understaffed because of the cost (that is the implication, I think), it is desirable that the hours should be shortened in order that they can put up with the strain. I know when I joined the service we used to start work at 6 in the morning, and on our short day we worked till half-past 7 in the evening, once a week till 10, and about once a month till 11 at night. We had three days off in the month.

12,093. Did you not have a day and a-half in the week?—No, two weekdays and one Sunday in the month; and on those days when you had a trying day it was almost impossible to put up with it during the last two or three hours in the evening.

12,094. But that state of things has entirely changed now, has it not?—I do not agree.

12,095. You would not find any hospitals now where the nurses were working for those hours, and where they only got those days off?—They would have more leave, but the long days have not altered.

12,096. That difficulty occurs in places, no doubt?—They have more weekly leave.

12,097. A good many workers would prefer that, would they not? They would rather have, if they could get it, two days off or one and a-half days off in a week?—I think in the rural areas, particularly in the case of the female staff, the majority of them would prefer having two days off in the week; but I should prefer them to have the three-shift system for the benefit of the patients. (Miss Wiese): There is a special reason for that. Many of their homes are in Scotland or Ireland, and it means that they have a longer annual leave in that case, and they are able to have longer at home, otherwise they prefer shorter leave.

12,098. I suppose they cannot add their weekly leave to their holiday?—A few days, but it is not usual. (Mr. Gibson): As a rule they cannot.

12,099. As a rule now, the time they get is a month in the summer?—Not a month. Three weeks is the maximum leave.

12,100. Now shall we just deal with a matter in which you apparently take a very great interest, and I understand Miss Wiese particularly wishes to give evidence before the Commission on it, namely, the question of the employment of female nurses in male wards. On that matter a certain amount of evidence has already been given to the Commission by doctors and others who have tried this system. I do not know what other members of the Commission may have thought, but personally I have been rather impressed with the view that they take—that the introduction of female nursing to the male side has been extremely beneficial in its results in some cases. I do not think they suggest that there is not a certain class of patient who must be dealt with or a certain class of work which must be done by men, and which cannot be done by women; but the introduction of female nursing on the male side has been tried and apparently with, as I say, extremely beneficial results. Now the view which I understand your Union, and particularly Miss Wiese, wishes to express, is the opposite of that?—Mr. Chairman, I have listened to some of the evidence on that point, but you must remember that more than 50 per cent. of the medical superintendents in England and Wales are opposed to it. You have only heard the views of people who are in favour of it. My view of it is this: it is rather a difficult point to discuss in public, but I have yet to see the medical superintendent who would ask his wife or his daughter to do it.

12,101. I am not quite sure that that is the true test, is it?—I think it is. You see there is a danger unfortunately. You know the very large number of male patients who are suffering from venereal infection, and there is a considerably larger number who are sexually abnormal. If they were normal people one would not think of denying them the attendance of female nurses, but I am afraid of the consequences, of the possibilities, if the system is extended. They have had it in operation extensively in Scotland, and I have submitted a table here in Schedule 2 of our précis, from which it will appear that it has not been particularly successful.

12,102. Let us look at that schedule. When I read it I was not very much impressed by it. There are two schedules that you put in connected with this. In Schedule 1 you have extracted from the Board of Control Reports particulars of suicides and attacks made by patients on other patients?—That is so.

12,103. I gather that the point of that extract is that the medical diagnosis at the present day is so far at fault that the doctors themselves are not able to say whether a man is suicidal or not, or at all events they may make grave mistakes.—The point of that schedule is this: that I hold it is not possible for a doctor to prophesy the conduct of an insane patient.

12,104. It is not possible to diagnose with certainty what he will do?—Yes, quite.

12,105. Out of 286 suicides which took place in nine years 93 were patients regarded apparently by the medical profession as not suicidal?—Yes, that is so.

12,106. And accordingly one of your arguments with regard to the use of female nurses on the male side is that you cannot prognosticate what will happen in any particular case?—Exactly.

12,107. Are you there dealing, not so much with cases of suicide, as with these unfortunate cases where the insanity is due to a venereal disease, or where people themselves are sexually abnormal?—Where the effect is to make them sexually abnormal. If you will refer to Schedule 1 again you will find in one case, 1921, there was a death from scalding at Wakefield. In that case a female, a young girl, was sent to wash a male patient who was in a filthy condition.

She left him to two male patients; they turned on the hot water and threw buckets of scalding water over him and he died. The nurse was dismissed—three of them were dismissed, and properly so.

12,108. But that is an illustration of an unfortunate occurrence. It does not go to the root of the question, does it?—No, but I suggest to you it is not exactly a proper duty to call upon a young girl to do, and yet it is an essential duty in male wards.

12,109. Yes, but you have got to consider the nurses and the patients. I mean one would not send a young girl to do washing of that kind. The doctors who advocate female nursing in male wards would look upon this as stupid, as anybody else would. Again, that does not go to the root of the matter at all?—But this was carried out in pursuit of a doctor's orders and instructions.

12,110. You know the nurses in an ordinary hospital have extraordinarily uncomfortable and unpleasant things to do from the point of view of the ordinary person?—Surely nothing of that nature?

12,111. Well, there are doctors on the Commission who know more about this than I do, but you may assume that the nurses have very uncomfortable duties to perform in an ordinary hospital, and they must necessarily have very unpleasant duties to perform in a mental hospital, but the one or two particular instances such as you give do not seem to me to go to the root of the matter. You must remember this, that on the male side it is possible considerably to classify the patients. They are not all of the same nature. One would imagine that female nursing might be extremely good in respect of certain classes, and yet might be dangerous in other classes which could be avoided by classification?—I am suggesting that the doctors cannot possibly classify them so exactly as that, and the distinction between a general hospital and a mental hospital is this: in a general hospital there is no fear of assault or abuse in the performance of their duties, whereas in a mental hospital that is an every day occurrence.

12,112. That would be so, speaking generally, I suppose?—I think Miss Wiese's experience has been that she has had to put up with it when working in a male ward. (Miss Wiese): And also a patient in a general hospital is able to do things for himself that a woman has to do in the case of a mental male patient, most objectionable things. I cannot say all I feel about it here.

12,113. You have had practical experience of this?—Yes, and I feel very strongly about it. I do not think women ought to be allowed to do it.

12,114. Sir David Drummond: May I ask Mr. Gibson a question? What is the bearing of the incidence of syphilis in the patient's case upon this question we are now considering?—The bearing is this: I think in very many of the cases where there is a history of syphilitic infection they are sexually abnormal, and I think also in military hospitals they generally have male orderlies to handle such cases.

12,115. Yes, but I cannot see the bearing, as you put it; 5 per cent. of the cases are due to syphilis, and that is a reason why women should not nurse these cases?—Quite. I think that an insane patient suffering from syphilis is in quite a different category from a sane patient. He has to have things done for him that a sane patient can do for himself.

12,116. Are you speaking of secondary syphilis, or of tertiary events?—I am speaking generally, of the general paralytics.

12,117. I know. I quite fail to see the bearing of the fact that a patient has syphilis upon this question at all. I can understand the abnormal sexual instinct.—If I may put it in this way: there is a general hospital in London where they started a ward for the treatment of incipient general paralysis of the insane cases. They found that the nurses would not work in it. It is the subconscious effect on the female nurses.

12,118. I think we all agree with the Chairman that the question very largely turns upon classification.

12,119. Deputy-Chairman: I am going to ask Miss Wiese this question. You have had actual experience of this, as I understand?—(Miss Wiese): Yes.

12,120. And, in your view, there is no more repulsive or degrading work for women than this work of nursing male mental patients?—Many of them.

12,121. You suggest that the patient regards the nurse so much from a sexual point of view?—Yes, many of them do.

12,122. Without any sense of decency of any kind?—Yes.

12,123. And you suggest that is so in the case of people who would be classified as unobtrusive and quiet cases?—Yes; quite feeble old men will insist upon undressing themselves, and that sort of thing.

12,124. You were three years in a male infirmary ward?—Yes.

12,125. That male infirmary ward was in a mental hospital, was it?—Yes; that was during the war, when most of the men had gone to the front, and the staff was depleted. There were four wards opened and staffed by women, but as soon as the men came back, back went the women. I do not know why.

12,126. Was it in the hospital where you are at Claybury?—Yes.

12,127. Miss Madeleine Symons: Miss Wiese, have you found that the view you have expressed is the general view of the women members of your Union who have nursed on the male side?—It certainly is the view of my colleagues who work with me.

12,128. At Claybury?—I cannot say I have met many women in other hospitals who have done this work.

12,129. Deputy-Chairman: Has this question been at all discussed by the Union?—(Mr. Gibson): Yes, frequently.

12,130. Have you issued questionnaires to your branches about it?—Yes.

12,131. Have you got a general response in general agreement about it?—They are generally agreed that it is a practice that is objectionable.

12,132. Have you been present here a good deal while the evidence has been given?—Yes.

12,133. Again, we have had some very striking evidence by one or two men of great experience?—You have had evidence on this point from Dr. Edwards of Camberwell House. There, again, you have a private licensed house, and, if I may say so, without any suggestion of being offensive, there is the question of private gain to be considered there—female nurses are cheaper. There is also this point of view, that in a private licensed house they can, and do, choose the type of patient.

12,134. Sir David Drummond: That is classification again?—Well, it is classification in a way. I mean to say they simply do not admit certain types of cases. They say: "No, we will not take epileptics or general paralytics."

12,135. Deputy-Chairman: Dr. Edwards of Camberwell House is very strongly in favour of it, is he not?—Yes.

12,136. In that particular hospital there would be a good many cases of general paralysis of the insane?—I do not know, but I think there are some cases that they do not take. I am not certain about that point.

12,137. As far as my recollection goes, the impression left on my mind was that in every case where the doctors had tried it they had found it satisfactory?—The way I have heard it put is this: the doctors said that where they had tried it the wards were much quieter, but that occurred in this manner. In the case I am referring to I have knowledge of the wards. They filled the wards with quiet cases when they put in female nurses. Of course they were much quieter. Another case is an asylum in the north of England where they experimented with female nurses. They put the female nurses into a ward where previously they had all the phthisical patients segregated; a large number of the patients suffering from phthisis were unsuitable to be nursed by female nurses, so they immediately distributed them all over the male wards. That is a question of fact. I can give you the name of the institution.

12,138. It does not sound to me very likely.—It occurred. As a matter of fact, I went up and interviewed the Committee, and the Committee, against the wish of the medical superintendent, put male nurses back in this ward and restored the phthisical cases. When you bring female nurses on to the male side and put them into a ward and specially select the cases, it means, of necessity, that you must scatter in the other wards cases which are not suitable to be there, because you cannot classify the patients according to a disease, not even according to a mental disease. I do not know what the ultimate basis of classification will be, but I am perfectly certain it cannot be according to the mental infirmity.

12,139. It cannot at the present moment?—And never will be. I cannot imagine, for instance, how it would be possible to run a ward with no other type of patient in it but general paralytics or a ward with no other type of case but cases of melancholia.

12,140. You mean you will never get a perfect classification?—You cannot classify on the basis of mental infirmity. They will probably have to be classified on the basis of conduct, but if you classify on the basis of conduct for the purpose of bringing in female nurses in one ward in which you have well-conducted patients, you will have to scatter the patients suffering from infectious disease throughout the other wards, simply because they are not suitable to go and stay where the females are.

12,141. It strikes one that may or may not be so. I do not see why you should say necessarily it would be so?—I say in practice it has been so.

12,142. That again seems to be a question of arrangement?—I am afraid the ramifications of an arrangement to suit all these cases make it out of the question.

12,143. Now you set out a second schedule which you rather suggest shows that the result has not been satisfactory where the women have been introduced?—The second schedule struck me as rather remarkable, considering that it was over a period of years, because we have always understood that institutions in Scotland were much superior to the institutions in England, that is, mental hospitals, and there is no doubt that the Lunacy Law in Scotland is superior; but since the War, it is a remarkable fact that the death rates in Scotland are higher and the recovery rates lower than in England. That is not one year. Taking it on the average for six years, 1918 to 1923, you will find that the recovery rates in Scotland are lower and the death rates are higher.

12,144. Certainly in the last four years the death rates in Scotland have been higher.—Yes. Of course, 1918 was an abnormal year.

12,145. I suppose these death rates per cent. are calculated on the actual number of people in the asylums?—The average number resident during the year.

Deputy-Chairman: Those are intelligible; but when one comes to look on the other side, I confess they do not carry much weight: "Recovery rates calculated on direct admissions."

12,146. Sir David Drummond: Do you think it reasonable? In arguing against the employment of female nurses, you speak of the relative death rate, or rather the recovery rate in England and Scotland. If the results count for anything, the effect of the employment of female nurses is disastrous. Then you turn over and you find that after all, the difference between England and Scotland is not very great. It is 26 and 23, 31 and 26, 31 and 39, 31 and 30, 31 and 28, 31 and 30?—Will you refer to the death rates?

12,147. No, I am speaking of the recoveries. You do not mean to ascribe it to the employment of women nurses, do you?—No, not entirely.

12,148. That is what you do here at the top of page 4. If the results count for anything, the effect of the employment of female nurses upon the patients is disastrous?—The point of view is this; we have been told that where they have employed female nurses in male wards it has been a great advantage, and it is a much more common custom in Scotland than in England. When we find in practice that the death rates in Scotland have been considerably higher (you have in 1920, 10·2 as against 8·7 in England; in 1921, 11·1 as against 8·4; in 1922, 11·2 as against 9; and in 1923, 9·6 as against 7·7) I can scarcely find where the advantage comes in.

12,149. But you would not ascribe it to the employment of women nurses?—Not entirely; but I do say, on the other hand, that I cannot see where they can prove that any advantage has accrued. There appears to be a considerable disadvantage.

12,150. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Do you know when the introduction of female nursing in cottage hospitals took place?—It took place a long time ago, but in general practice it has only been in the last three years that it has increased to any proportion. I think that, before the War, in Scotland they generally had a high recovery rate, and in England the death rate was about the same.

12,151. And during the War there was a larger incidence of female nursing?—I think during the War and since.

12,152. Have you calculated the incidence of female nursing in certain hospitals with the recovery rates?—The point which I wanted to make was not so much that female nursing was the cause of this, but the bringing in of female nurses meant the scattering of phthisical cases throughout the institution, and the spread of infection, and in practice I say that that did occur; in order to select patients by conduct they had to send patients, who otherwise would have been segregated, into other wards.

12,153. Deputy-Chairman: Now there is only one other matter I want to deal with in your précis relating to the staff, and that is your suggestion that special diseases common to mental hospitals should be scheduled as industrial diseases under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the purpose of protecting the staffs?—Yes. If I may explain that, the point is this: under the present arrangement there are very many mental hospitals where the staff, immediately they go off sick, go on half pay; in some other cases they have one week's full pay, and then they go on half pay.

12,154. Is that by arrangement with the hospital, do you mean?—No. Most of the mental hospitals have been exempted from the provisions of the Health Insurance Act by guaranteeing what the Commissioners consider to be equivalent benefits. Some of them have said, "We will pay half pay for three months in the case of illness." It seems unfair to me and disastrous to the nursing spirit, if you ask a nurse to nurse a case of colitis, and if they contract it themselves, you say, "You go on half pay," and yet that actually occurs. It seems rather unfair to a nurse. Sometimes where the disease looks like being disabling they give them a month's notice, return their superannuation contribution and finish with them.

12,155. Under the Superannuation Act of 1909, is there no provision except for superannuation?—After the first 10 years of service—not during the first 10 years.

12,156. During the first 10 years is nothing provided?—No, except that they return the superannuation contributions.

12,157. Nothing else?—Nothing else.

12,158. But if you got the benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Act in the case of death, would you not be in some danger of losing your benefits under the Superannuation Act?—I do not think so. Under the Workmen's Compensation Act I think the maximum benefit permitted is half pay, and in the case of commutation of a pension any other sum received is taken into account.

12,159. I forget how it is awarded in the case of death under the Workmen's Compensation Act?—In the case of a lump sum payment, I believe any payment out of the funds of the institution is taken into account. I am not prepared to dogmatise on that point.

12,160. It looks to me as though in the case of death the two Acts might overlap and you might get into some trouble.—During the first ten years of service there is no provision for payment in the case of an officer who dies in the service.

12,161. The figures given in your schedule do not seem to show that these can be treated as industrial diseases if you take colitis and typhoid.—They do not die from them, it is very infrequent, but they frequently have them as a disabling disease for a period of weeks.

12,162. The death claims for phthisis, of course, are very considerable?—Yes.

12,163. But it would not do, I imagine, from a medical point of view to put down all these cases of deaths as though the infection were taken from the patients?—I do not ask that. I mention in the other schedules the particular diseases to which they are liable. We have ten cases here of partial disablement—cases of enteric.

12,164. But you do not put down colitis there?—These payments are only made in respect of patients who have been ill for 13 weeks.

12,165. Does your Union make payments in these cases to your members?—Yes.

12,166. And certain payments are made by the hospitals, are they not?—Yes.

12,167. Then I suppose you supplement those?—If they have an illness for a period of 13 weeks we make what is called a partial disablement grant to them.

12,168. Perhaps you will not forget to let us have a copy of your rules.—I will most certainly send you a copy.

12,169. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Before we leave this subject of the partial disablement claims, might we have the numbers to which these 501 cases refer? I think that is rather important.—(Mr. Gibson): They are from the total membership of the Union, from those who have complied with the rules.

12,170. From 11,000 members, that is the number?—Yes.

12,174. Deputy-Chairman: That is four years?—Yes. It is an average of 125 claims per annum. I want to make it clear that these have no reference to any case of illness for a period of less than 13 weeks.

12,172. Mrs. Mather: Men and women?—Yes.

12,173. Miss Madeleine Symons: Your trade union benefits are all together, are they? All your members contribute to the provident benefits?—Yes.

12,174. Deputy-Chairman: That is four years?—Yes. It is an average of 125 claims per annum. I want to make it clear that these have no reference to any case of illness for a period of less than 13 weeks.

12,175. Now, Miss Wiese, would you kindly add what you want to say about the female nursing?—(Miss Wiese): The General Nursing Council will probably take over the examinations of mental nurses. One of their rules is that nurses must obtain six months' practical bedside nursing. In most mental hospitals it is exceedingly difficult for matrons to enable their probationer nurses to have this training. If women are going to do sick nursing in male wards it is going to be obvious that the male nurses will not get very much training so as to enable them to sit for the State examination. There is that point, and it is a very big question.

12,176. But there must be comparatively few men nurses applying for the General Nursing Council's certificate?—We want more to become proficient, and to pass their examinations. (Mr. Gibson): There are very few of either sex. The General Nursing Council registers mental nurses. That is one of the provisions for the registration of a mental nurse, he must have had six months' clinical work. (Miss Wiese): Yes, or before he can sit for the examination at all he must have had this experience.

12,177. Before he can sit for the Medico-Psychological or the Nursing Council examination?—No, the State examination; and it is very essential that he should have had that experience. That is one of the drawbacks.

12,178. Are there many men who apply for that certificate?—We want to induce them to.

12,179. I do not quite follow what advantage they get by that?—What if the M.P.A. give it up, as they will do in time? (Mr. Gibson): The General Nursing Council is now a statutory body, with powers conferred upon it by statute.

12,180. The suggestion is that they will ultimately supersede the other?—Yes.

12,181. I want now, Mr. Gibson, if I may, to consider for a moment the relationship subsisting between the nursing staff and the patients. It is not the easiest thing in the world for you to give me the facts, or for me to put questions, but may I first put a question in a very general form? I do not know whether you can answer this so well perhaps as Mr. Blood. What I want to know is: What should you say is the normal atmosphere of a mental hospital? Is it that of a hospital, or is it that of a prison, if you understand what I mean?—(Mr. Blood): I think it is decidedly the atmosphere of a hospital.

12,182. That is to say, it is a place where the welfare and comfort of the persons who are being nursed are looked after, and are in the minds of the nurses throughout?—Decidedly so.

12,183. You are speaking of your own experience, of course?—Yes.

12,184. You have been a great many years at Rowditch?—Yes.

12,185. Of course you all know the sort of reports that are made, the sort of statements that are made about the cruelty of the attendants, and so on. All you can do, of course, is to tell us what your personal experience of these places is?—(Mr. Gibson): The atmosphere I have found is generally perfectly friendly, but I think there are some things about the present organisation of a mental hospital which somewhat militate against the proper atmosphere. I know that the relationships generally between the staff and the patients are perfectly good. As a matter of fact we have had on occasions difficulty about members of the staff who have taken patients out to football matches and concerts quite voluntarily in their own time, and in one or two cases they have lost them and got into trouble.

21,186. But, speaking generally, of the atmosphere of these places, Mr. Gibson—you, of course, have visited a large number of them?—I have worked in them too.

12,187. And you know an enormous number of workers in these places. What is your view as to their regard for the welfare and comfort of the people in their charge?—I think the general charges of cruelty are absolutely unfounded, but I am perfectly prepared to admit that occasionally cases happen, and I am afraid that until you change human nature they will happen. The provocation sometimes is very trying. I remember on one occasion having to restrain a medical man, who was going to take on a patient who had been challenging him to fight every day for about six weeks.

12,188. The provocation, of course, in certain cases is almost unbearable, and human nature being what it is, from time to time there will be an outbreak on the part of an attendant?—I think that is the case, Sir, particularly with junior attendants, not because of their own fault, but of their misfortune. They do not know exactly what they have come to do, and they do not realise the patients' position and peculiarities. They are put into a ward on duty immediately. I perfectly well remember the first day I commenced in an asylum I was put into a ward full of chronic demented. There was one patient in that ward who used to play draughts and chess a great deal, but he had a delusion that anyone switching on the electric light was putting current through his body. I switched on the electric light without knowing of this peculiarity, and the draught board just missed my head. I think it is unfortunate that there are so many changes in the staff. There are figures in the Board of Control's Report where they have had cases of assault, and they usually find it happens with junior members of the staff.

12,189. Personally I have had very small experience, but the small experience I have had has rather suggested to me, when I have seen the inside of one of these places, that it was almost like a home rather than like a prison, and that the patients and attendants were on the best of terms; but a suggestion has been made, you know, that it is impossible to pay a surprise visit at all to these institutions?—In practice I think it is impossible to pay a surprise visit.

12,190. They say that if one of the members of the Board of Control comes round, or if one of the members of this Commission comes round, it gets known, and in a very short time there is a sudden transformation so that the normal life of the inside of the place can never be seen by an official. Do you think there is any truth in that suggestion?—I would not go so far as that. In my experience we generally did know when the Commissioners were coming; invariably we know. If they were within 100 miles we were told so on the telephone, they came in the uniform of the profession, tall hats and frock coats, and if we did not get to know on the telephone that they were in the vicinity, the hotel they stayed at was always known, and the hotel manager immediately telephoned up and told us who was there.

12,191. In the case you were indicating, were any special steps taken?—I will be perfectly frank. What happened was this: they went round and they changed the patients' neckties, and those who had not the best of jackets got better clothing. I want to put the position exactly as I saw it. I hold no brief for the administration at all. But there was no such thing as cleaning out rooms; you had not the time to do it; but you could smarten up the patients; and in particular, books and periodicals were laid upon the table which would not have been there had the Commissioners not come, and the general air of the place in that way was improved.

12,192. Mr. Blood, what has been your experience of that?—(Mr. Gibson): Mr. Blood is still in the service. (Mr. Blood): I have found that a little, but I remember last year when the Commissioner came round he went round a ward and found them bathing in the bath room, and the dormitory was all upset, the clean linen had just been fetched from the laundry, and everything was upside down. He said how pleased he was to find them just as he wanted to. We do sometimes get to know that the Commissioners are about, in fact we are expecting them now, but, generally speaking, we have not the time to make any preparation.

12,193. Generally speaking, would any visitor see the hospital practically in its normal condition?—Certainly.

12,194. Do you think that the charge that the attendants are indifferent to the welfare and comfort of their patients is well founded?—I do not, I think it is decidedly ill-founded.

12,195. In your experience?—Yes.

12,196. You would not expect that either, would you, Mr. Gibson?—(Mr. Gibson): I entirely disagree with that charge. (Miss Wiese): I absolutely disagree with it. I find that nurses interested in their work will do any mortal thing for the patients' comfort. A question was raised about the letters of the patients. No one suggested that the nurses very often write letters for the patients, as I have done, and the nurses in my ward have very often done so. (Mr. Gibson): It is not evidence, but it may be of interest. There are two patients in Manchester who were at the institution when I was there and they are still very great personal friends of mine.

12,197. It is suggested sometimes that there is no form of remedial treatment in the wards at all?—(Mr. Blood): That is rather lacking, I must admit.

12,198. But when you say it is rather lacking can you suggest that anything could be done which is not done?—I think it is usually lacking through the lack of staff. You have not sufficient staff to see to the condition of the patients, the cleanliness of the patients and of the ward, and to take the patients out for fresh air. You have hardly the staff to do that irrespective of any curative treatment.

12,199. You are understaffed for the purposes of ordinary routine daily work?—Yes. (Mr. Gibson): It appears to me that the lack of remedial treatment is due to the lack of medical knowledge on the subject. They might go further by providing more recreation and more indoor amusements for the patients.

12,200. I understand that Mr. Blood's suggestion is that that would be possible if you could increase your staff. (Mr. Blood): Yes.

12,201. But when it comes to a question of any alleged systematic ill-treatment, what do you say to that?—It is entirely unfounded. (Miss Wiese): I always find that nurses will avoid conflict where possible, but when patients attack each other something must be done. It is nothing at meal times to see patients throw mugs at each other; you must intervene then. The patient resists, and there is trouble in that way more often than not, but my experience is that we always avoid it where possible. More often than not the patient gets the best of it; that is my experience. (Mr. Blood): My experience also is that there is usually some happening in the first place for this alleged cruelty to follow on. I have a patient in my place who has a delusion that I have killed his father and buried him under his room floor. Consequently that patient is constantly watching for an opportunity to find me by myself, and on two occasions he has attacked me, once within the last week. That again is owing to the lack of staff. Another case is this: a dormitory with 50 to 60 patients in bed; the nurse responsible for the cleanliness of that dormitory has the instruction that he must encourage the patients to make their beds when they get up. He went to one of the patients in the morning to get him to make his bed. Without another word that patient struck the attendant and knocked him down on the floor and followed up the attack. What is that nurse to do? As a matter of good fortune it so happened that in both cases there were other attendants who came and restrained the patient. It is a question of self-preservation really, without any cruelty. I think that is where the alleged cruelty comes in. The patients exaggerate what has happened; the public get to know of it, and from that you get your alleged cruelty. (Mr. Gibson): I think I might put it in this way: as a well-known newspaper proprietor used to put it to his reporters, "When a dog bites a man it is not news, but when a man bites a dog it is."

(After a short adjournment.)

12,202. Deputy-Chairman: Mr. Blood, I should like an expression of opinion from you on this matter. It has been suggested that from time to time the patients incur the displeasure of some of the attendants, by reason of their conduct, no doubt, and it is suggested that in those cases, when the time comes for the patients' discharge to be considered, the attendants or the nurses will keep back these patients, so that they do not get a proper chance of being seen by the visiting committees or by the doctors. What do you say with regard to that?—(Mr. Blood): I do not think it is possible for it to be done, because the patients have free access to any visitor or to the medical superintendent to say anything. I have never known it happen in my experience, and I have never known any hostility on the part of the attendant towards the patient.

12,203. No animosity between the two?—Or any animosity.

12,204. It has been suggested that there is sometimes such a feeling of animosity, that the patient has been goaded from being a quiet and reasonable person into a refractory subject. Has any instance of that kind come to your knowledge?—I do not think I know a case of that description.

12,205. Earl Russell: There may be some impatience with troublesome and dirty patients?—Yes, but in that case they would not be patients capable of causing any actual violence; they are usually of a demented character.

12,206. Deputy-Chairman: Of course, from time to time, there must of necessity be cases of impatience and retaliation, human beings what they are. That is a very different matter?—(Mr. Gibson): I think you referred to patients ready for discharge?

12,207. Yes.—One cannot imagine any patient ready for discharge being dirty or in a demented state, and liable to animosity on that account. Part of my experience is that nurses are not consulted at all about discharge. I have felt many a time that I would like to recommend a patient for discharge.

12,208. In your experience did you ever know of nurses keeping back patients from getting their discharge?—No, not at all. Of course, I never actually did duty in a convalescent ward. My routine was that so soon as the patient showed any reasonable improvement he was removed to one or other of the convalescent wards.

12,209. Earl Russell: Would that be thought a liberty, if an attendant called attention to the general improvement of the patients?—I do not say that is a general rule, but it has been asked where you got your medical degree, if you ventured to express an opinion without being asked.

12,210. Deputy-Chairman: It is suggested that sometimes patients have been detained from discharge because they are so useful in the institution. What do you say with regard to that, Mr. Blood?—(Mr. Blood): I should not think it has happened. To my knowledge it has never happened. There are some useful patients that would not be able to look after themselves if they were outside, but it is really for their own benefit if they are kept. While they are under the institution's administration they are quite all right, while there is someone just to see they are regular in their meals.

12,211. Do you think there is any truth in the charge that they are kept back, although they ought to be discharged, because they are useful?—Certainly not.

12,212. Now you, Mr. Blood, as a nurse of many years' experience, could answer this question: Do you think that there is, as far as you can judge, an excessive use of sedatives, or purgatives, in the case of these inmates?—No. In my experience I have never known croton oil used at all; it has never been used in the hospital where I have been at all. I believe for some years there was some in the surgery, but it was never used in my experience since I have been there. The only draught that is given is a sleeping draught, a weak sleeping draught; that is sometimes given, but very seldom indeed, and that is only in the case of a maniacal patient.

12,213. Perhaps I might ask you that same question, Miss Wiese, with regard to sedatives and purgatives in your experience?—(Miss Wiese): They are never given unless they are absolutely necessary. Even if a patient is put on it, a nurse is allowed to use her own discretion as to whether she gives it.

12,214. As a rule, would a nurse have a discretion in those matters?—Most nurses would. (Mr. Gibson): Discretion in withholding, not discretion in giving. (Miss Wiese): She is allowed only to give the maximum dose, but usually she withholds that. Besides, it has more effect if the patient does not have it regularly.

12,215. But the nurse would be acting under the doctor's directions?—Certainly; even an aperient is only given subject to the doctor's approval. He has to sign for each dose given. (Mr. Gibson): If I may say so, the custom has altered considerably in these matters. About 20 years ago the custom was to have a stock bottle of aperients and sedatives. The general practice to-day is that every dose of medicine is prescribed and is sent from the dispensary, labelled with the patient's name.

12,216. Earl Russell: And is it the practice to return into stock such doses as are not administered?—Yes.

12,217. Deputy-Chairman: Now, there is one other question about the patients and the visiting committee. In your case, Mr. Blood, you have a visiting committee who make periodical visits?—(Mr. Blood): Yes, once a month.

12,218. In your experience of these visits, are they what would be called effective visits—that is to say, can the patients get an interview with the committee?—Certainly. The visitors come into the ward, and the patients are there; they have free access to the visiting committee, and the visiting committee have free access to the patients in the respective wards. They go from ward to ward.

12,219. You know it is suggested that these visits are perfectly casual. They come into a ward and look round, chat to one or two people, and perhaps take no heed of the conditions of the patients themselves?—In my experience they take a very great heed of the condition of the patients.

12,220. Of course, you can only speak for your own institution?—Yes.

12,221. Miss Wiese, does that apply also in your case?—(Miss Wiese): I think so, in most cases. If there is a real grievance the patient would write to the visiting committee, and they would see that patient. On the other hand, if the visiting committee heeded every case of complaint, they would probably spend three weeks in each institution. They have often to cut off a conversation.

12,222. But, as far as you can judge too, they do their duty in that respect? They can see at once that with many patients it is idle to proceed further. Do you think there would be any reasonable and ordinary chance of a patient who really was fit for discharge not being able to get at the visiting committee to procure his discharge?—I have never known a patient who is well enough to go kept back either by the nurse, the doctor, or the visiting committee. As regards that, when a patient is admitted she sees the medical officer weekly for three weeks, and then monthly for three months, and then every three months, so that she is always under observation, practically.

24 February, 1925.] Mr. WALTER BLOOD, Mr. GEORGE GIBSON and Miss MAUD WIESE.

12,223. Mr. Gibson, you understand why I put these supplementary questions?—(Mr. Gibson): Quite.

12,224. Because really the most material evidence for us is the evidence of what is happening to-day in institutions?—Quite so. There is one point before you depart from that. We were discussing the question of cruelty, before lunch. I should like to refer you to pages 189 and 190 of the book called "The Experiences of an Asylum Doctor," by Dr. Lomax. I have been much impressed with the précis of one or two allegations of cruelty sent to me. I have been impressed with the fact that they are generally third party charges.

12,225. Is it under the head of cruelty to which you refer?—It is here; may I read it; it is very short?

12,226. If you please.—He is speaking of his experience in his mental hospital work, and he says: "As I have throughout this book commented adversely upon so many features of asylum administration, I should like to put it upon record that in my experience the character and behaviour of the male attendants with whom I had to do, for I had little experience of the female attendants, especially of the Head Attendants and Ward Charges, left on the whole a distinctly favourable impression upon my mind. They had their faults, of course, and I have not hesitated to mention such of these as, in my opinion, militated against their efficiency. But these seemed to me to be much more due to the defects of the system which they had to administer and under which they were trained, and to the monotony and dreariness of their life, with its many repulsive sights and sounds, than to any deficiency of kindness and good nature."

12,227. I am much obliged. Do you wish to add anything further on that?—That is the only reference I want to make particularly about that matter. I thought it was desirable.

12,228. In the suggestions you make, one relates to the dietary of the patients?—Yes.

12,229. Perhaps, Mr. Gibson, you could say generally what the view of the attendants is on the matter?—There has been some improvement since the War in the best institutions, in those in the large urban and industrial areas, but many of the institutions in the rural districts are still very deficient in that matter. We feel in particular that the morning and evening meals should be improved, and above all there ought to be a supper provided.

12,230. You mean that it is too long to go from tea to breakfast?—Much too long, especially when the last meal consists of bread and margarine, as it does at present.

12,231. Is not that at present rather a rare occurrence? Are there not other provisions added?—I do not think so. I think it is fairly common yet.

12,232. How would that work out in your establishment, Mr. Blood?—(Mr. Blood): At my institution I have the pleasure of saying that I am quite satisfied that the dietary is quite sufficient and good, and of very high quality, and they do get supper, they get a variation at breakfast, meat and bacon, at tea, cake and scones.

12,233. Earl Russell: What do you say about the difficulty that was raised on that point of serving a late meal?—(Mr. Gibson): You refer to Dr. Barham's point? A supper meal does not need a staff in the kitchen at all. I think the Commission have had an opportunity of seeing the domestic arrangements in these large institutions. The dry rations for supper can easily be drawn during the day, and all that is required is a member of the staff and a patient to go up and bring down two cans of tea for each ward. Under the same Council that Dr. Barham works, supper is provided at one or two institutions.

12,234. You say there is no practical difficulty?—No practical difficulty whatever.

12,235. Mr. Snell: It is a cold supper with tea?—Yes. In the old days when we had dances buns were provided; they were drawn during the day and when the patients came back from the dance coffee was brought down from the kitchen and they had buns and coffee.

12,236. Are you suggesting that that should be a real meal, or something to go to bed with?—If they were given something before they went to bed, it would be very beneficial to the patients.

12,237. Deputy-Chairman: In the best of institutions they are now making the sort of provision you think is wise?—Not the supper provision. Those who have gone to bed would not get it.

12,238. For instance, we have it in the case of Mr. Blood's institution.—I think if you follow it further and ask Mr. Blood whether they all get it, you will find they do not. (Mr. Blood): In the mental hospital I am employed at they do get a supper.

12,239. It is suggested by Mr. Gibson that those who have gone to bed would not get supper?—There are not many gone to bed. They are on special diet in the sick ward. (Mr. Gibson): That may be taken as exceptional. (Mr. Blood): It is an exceptional thing, of course.

12,240. Assuming that to be exceptional, if it were made general, that, of course, would meet your suggestion?—(Mr. Gibson): Quite.

12,241. Now a question as to the clothing of the patients in institutions.—Before you go to that I would like to refer you to a statement made by the medical superintendent of a Staffordshire institution. He said it was no good medical superintendents or the Board of Control recommending things; Committees are now out for saving on the patients' dietary. I think that reference was made at a conference held between the Board of Control and medical superintendents and the chairmen of visiting committees.

12,242. What that statement means is this, is it not, that it is no good having a merely advisory body, you want to have a directing power?—Exactly.

12,243. And that applies to other things besides this—not merely the question of diet, but a good many other matters of interest?—Yes.

12,244. Now with regard to the question of clothing: in the majority of the institutions the patients can have their private clothes, cannot they?—I do not think so, not in practice; it is very infrequent that they can.

12,245. If not, they are not supplied with uniform, are they?—It is not a uniform, but in general it is fustian clothing, and the male clothing when it is new is fairly presentable, but you have many extremely dirty cases; the clothing has to be washed, and it is washed in an ordinary laundry and mangled, and it comes out shapeless. I am sure that has a very bad effect on patients of any refinement of feeling when they are dressed up in clothing of that description.

12,246. Yes, one knows the effect of that sort of thing. You think there is room for improvement there?—I think there is room for very considerable improvement. If better clothing were provided initially, and if it were dry cleaned and pressed it would be very much better.

12,247. Then you suggest that in many cases further provision is necessary for the recreation of patients, bowling greens, tennis courts, and so on. I suppose that is so?—I particularly refer to outdoor recreation. The Commission have heard a good deal about the cricket and football matches, but in practice there are only 11 people who can play cricket, and 11 people who can play football.

12,248. A good many look on?—A good many look on. It is very distressing to see them looking on. It is very distressing walking round these airing courts hour upon hour with nothing to do.

12,249. You suggest that many of those would be able to play on a bowling green?—Bowling is a game that could be easily played, and they could be under supervision while they were playing. In the case of bowling and tennis I think the facilities could very well be increased.

12,250. Like other institutions we know of, if you could spend sufficient money on them you could very much improve the general condition and amenities, and so on?—Quite.

12,251. You make a suggestion too that there should be more payment than is now made for work which is done?—I think that emanated from Dr. Lomax originally, but I am very much in favour of it.

12,252. I think another doctor suggested it before Dr. Lomax, but, however, it has been suggested. At the present time, the payments are very small?—At the present time what generally happens is that the charge nurse of a ward is given a certain amount of thin twist tobacco, and on the female side it may be snuff and tea, and the working patients are given a small amount per week. They do not all use it, and it has appeared to me that if they were given a credit voucher and allowed to exchange it at the stores for anything they wanted, even to supplement their diet, it would be a desirable principle to be adopted.

12,253. Then you suggest the abolition of nurses' key chains. That is a new point to me?—In most of the institutions the nurses' keys have to be guarded of course against loss, and there is a huge chain on them that would almost hold a steamship. It appears to give a prison like air to the institution. It almost appears as if there were a baton on the end of it.

12,254. Earl Russell: That is perfectly true, but, on the other hand, you must have means to prevent the patients grabbing the keys?—Quite. I think a leather chain would be less obtrusive and would serve the same purpose. (Miss Wiese): In the London County Council mental hospitals a linen belt is used, which is just a small strip made of dress material to hold the keys. Most of the nurses carry them in their pockets.

12,255. Is that strong enough to resist a pull by a violent patient who might try to steal them?—It is not strong enough for that.

12,256. It is not much use, is it?—Still, we have had no casualties from them. I think it is much more desirable than a long chain dangling about with a pair of scissors attached to the end.

12,257. Also it makes a jangling noise when you move about?—Yes. I think it is a necessary improvement.

Deputy-Chairman: It is a small matter, but one which should be considered.

12,258. Mr. Snell: Is there any wish on the part of the patients to have the keys?—(Miss Wiese): Yes; but they usually go for the nurses' hair more than the keys.

12,259. The point in their mind is that if they could get the keys they could get out—is that it?—(Mr. Gibson): Exactly; yes.

12,260. Deputy-Chairman: Now I think I have dealt with the main points in your précis relating to the nursing staff and to the patients. You do, in addition, make certain suggestions as to possible amendments in the general law and practice of lunacy?—Yes.

12,261. If there is anything you specially want to tell us, do so by all means, but I am not quite sure that you can give us very much assistance there?—Of course we have not gone into the technicalities of the lunacy laws; it is not our business, but it has appeared to us that it is unfortunate that there should be so many different controlling authorities dealing with the administration—the Lord Chancellor, the Board of Control, and various other people, and we think that the law should be centrally directed.

12,262. Putting it quite shortly, is this what you suggest. At the present time you say there is a multiplicity of these local authorities?—And of central authorities.

12,263. Well, a multiplicity of central authorities to some extent, but the main difficulty would be the autonomous local bodies. They would make their own provisions and go their own way?—Yes.

12,264. Your suggestion is that there should be more power given to some central body, without indicating exactly what that should be, whether it should be the Board of Control, or some jurisdiction under the Ministry of Health, or some other body; but you think there should be some more directing power given to affect all the hospitals—is that right?—Most emphatically I do. I think the central body should have more power, and should have power to withhold the Government grant.

12,265. Earl Russell: So far as the national authority is concerned, it does in fact resolve itself into the Board of Control?—It does.

12,266. So that you have not much there to complain of in practice?—I think the Board of Control personnel should be strengthened.

12,267. So far as there being the one body, they practically do advise these other bodies when there is anything to be done?—Unfortunately their advice is only advice; they have no statutory authority.

12,268. Mr. Snell: Is it the opinion of the Asylum Workers' Union that the powers of the Board of Control should be increased so that they would have coercive as well as advisory powers?—Yes, we think, as in the case of the police service, there should be power to withhold the Government grant where an institution does not satisfy them that it is efficiently conducted.

12,269. Earl Russell: That is, in fact, our usual method of controlling local authorities?—Yes.

12,270. Deputy-Chairman: But where we are dealing with the local authorities and these mental hospitals there is no grant made to them year by year; they provide the whole cost from their own funds?—No, there is a grant; not made to the local authority, but made to the board of guardians under the Local Government Act of 1888.

12,271. To the board of guardians in respect of their particular patients?—Yes, but we are suggesting that the board of guardians should be cut out of this matter altogether; that the Government should contribute to the maintenance of the patients.

12,272. Earl Russell: And that the grant should be made to the county or the borough, as the case may be?—Yes.

12,273. Deputy-Chairman: I was thinking of the case of an ordinary mental hospital which has been built by a local authority pursuant to the Act. They are responsible entirely for the maintenance and upkeep, and for finding the money. In respect of their Poor Law payments they will get an allowance from the guardians?—The guardians receive an allowance of 4s. a head.

12,274. You would like that the Board of Control should be given not merely advisory powers in the case of these local authorities, but directing powers, as I understand?—Yes.

12,275. To say a thing shall be done?—Yes.

12,276. Earl Russell: That, you realise, is carrying it a little further than withholding the grant?—I think withholding the grant would be the instrument for making it effective.

12,277. Yes, but, on the other hand, if you gave them directory powers you could enforce it equally by a mandamus, if necessary. Are you suggesting that they should have power of control over the local authorities?—Only to the extent of withholding the grant if they were not satisfied that the administration was efficiently conducted.

24 February, 1925.] Mr. WALTER BLOOD, Mr. GEORGE GIBSON and Miss MAUD WIESE.

12,278. Not beyond that?—Not beyond that.

12,279. Mr. Snell: Suppose you have a local authority that is backward and inefficient, would it not be advisable in your opinion that the Board of Control should be able to enforce efficiency upon such an institution?—I think, even under the existing machinery, in such an acute emergency they could do it.

12,280. Earl Russell: Only by the force of public opinion?—No; I believe that, in an emergency, under the existing law they are able to take over the administration of the institution themselves.

12,281. I would be glad if you would show me the section?—In an emergency.

12,282. Deputy-Chairman: I think I know the section you are referring to, but it does not go as far as that?—I was under the impression it did.

12,283. I think you are referring to Section 247: "If the Commissioners report to a Secretary of State that any local authority has failed to satisfy the requirements of this Act as regards asylum accommodation, the Secretary of State may require the local authority to provide such accommodation in such manner as he may direct." That is the only section of the Act that touches it, and that only relates to providing the asylum accommodation.

12,284. Earl Russell: That only extends to the capital expenditure?—I was rather under the impression they had a wider power than that.

12,285. Deputy-Chairman: I see you suggest, failing complete nationalisation of hospitals, the Government grant should be increased to 50 per cent. of the maintenance cost. There is no Government grant at the present time?—There is a Government grant under the Local Government Act to the board of guardians, which, in effect, is a subsidy in the case of certified lunatics. In the case of mental defectives, the Government do pay 50 per cent., and I can scarcely see the reason for the distinction.

12,286. Your suggestion is that in the case of the insane under the Lunacy laws they should be put on the same footing as in the case of the mental defectives under the Mental Deficiency Act?—Yes.

12,287. Earl Russell: Is there any reason why the Government should pay any part of the cost. Is it not a matter of ordinary local administration?—I think not, because the incidence of lunacy does not fall equally on all parts of the country.

12,288. I agree that is the answer—on the principle of equalisation of rates in London you mean?—Quite.

12,289. Deputy-Chairman: I do not know that there is any other matter I need trouble you with except one. You want to get rid of private hospitals?—There is the question of outdoor clinics. Would you like me to refer to that?

12,290. The question of private mental hospitals first, please?—In my view I do not think it is desirable that there should be an opportunity of making profit out of the treatment of a disease which affects the mind.

12,291. But why should you say that? Take the case of a man of considerable means who is afflicted in body or in mind, or in both, and he can, by making sufficient payments, procure just that amount of comfort which he wants with his means, and which, if these hospitals were not there to provide it, he could get nowhere?—I did not suggest the abolition of private hospitals; I suggest the abolition of profit-making institutions. The West Riding County Council run a private hospital. What I do object to is the idea of conducting a place entirely for the purpose of profit.

12,292. Earl Russell: Assuming we agree with you, what is the maximum charge at any of the county hospitals?—I think the maximum charge is three guineas a week.

12,293. Supposing you have the case of a man who wishes to pay 10 or 20 guineas?—I do not think he would get anything better.

12,294. Deputy-Chairman: He has a very large income, he can pay 50 guineas a week, as easily as he can pay five?—In my researches into the Lunacy law I have not found that they always consult the wishes of the patient.

12,295. But, on the other hand, you do not want to deprive a man of a privilege which he can get for himself, and which he may desire?—In all the evidence I have heard, there have been questions about profit making and the friends being interested parties.

12,296. You must be under the impression that these places are not properly conducted, or something of that kind?—I am under this impression from what I have heard, that frequently the patients pay for services which are not given.

12,297. You may suggest that, but I do not know why you should wish to deprive anybody who cared to make the payments of the opportunity of making them, if he desires those privileges?—I do not want to deprive him of the opportunity of getting the best attention. I want to deprive other people of the opportunity of exploiting.

12,298. Earl Russell: Assuming for the moment we agree with you that these places should be abolished, what are you going to do to provide for the case of a man who wants expensive and luxurious accommodation, and is prepared to pay for it?—I think the local authorities can perfectly well do it, or he can do it, if he has the means.

12,299. That is exactly what he may not wish to do?—In that case I think the local authority should take over the administration of the private institution.

12,300. Deputy-Chairman: A rich father has a son troubled in this way, and he knows there is a doctor running a mental hospital where one can get every care and attention, and the father is prepared to pay for it. Do you say there is some objection to that form of relief being obtained?—Yes, I say so for this reason, that after the son is put into this mental hospital he may be paying for and not getting the services for which he is paying. Supposing I say that I know of cases where large fees have been paid for special purposes, and what has been paid for has not been supplied. Supposing I say I can prove that?

12,301. Earl Russell: I should be prepared to believe you, but still I ask you how are you going to provide for what is a public demand. Supposing we asked the question, the Master in Lunacy would say "Yes, I have in my care scores of people who want this expensive accommodation". How are you going to meet the legitimate demand on their part?—I think there are places who charge that, and there are some registered hospitals which do not limit their fees.

12,302. There are, but there are unfortunately too few of them.—Many of the others surely can be taken over and administered by the County Council. If the West Riding can run a private institution, I do not see why the others should not.

12,303. Sir David Drummond: Is it reasonable to argue from the particular to the general?—You say you know of some in which the patients do not get all they pay for, and therefore none of them should be allowed. Is that a reasonable position to take up?—I think when we know that there are some, we may assume that the temptation is always there where profit is to be made; and where you have a demented case, for instance, and you have the relatives paying for the services of a special nurse, it is the easiest thing in the world to put that patient in a general ward with 10 or 11 other patients and not to supply the special nurse who is paid for.

12,304. Earl Russell: We agree, but that is simply a piece of swindling which happens in other business contracts.—In other business contracts the contract is entered into between two sane parties, and they have the law to resort to. Where you have on the one side an insane person who has not the ability to protect himself, I think the law should enter in.

12,305. But they have the Master in Lunacy and they have a solicitor or somebody who can see to these things?—They have the Master in Lunacy, and they have their relatives. Let the relatives come to a place where they are paying for a special nurse. What happens? When they arrive at the door the special nurse is there. That is no protection in practice if it is a case of chronic dementia. I have duty sheets and lists of patients in a certain institution, and I can show you the names of five patients who day after day were deprived of the services of the special nurses while the relatives were paying for them.

12,306. Mr. Snell: May we just understand really where we are in this matter? Is it your opinion that in a properly conducted public mental hospital a patient, whether he is rich or poor, would get treatment adequate for his need?—Absolutely.

12,307. He would get as efficient treatment in a public institution as he would in any institution, no matter what he paid?—That is my opinion.

12,308. Would you say that a patient would necessarily have a better chance of being cured because he or his father wanted certain special luxuries for him?—I do not think so at all.

12,309. Then the third point is: Would you say that because of the danger that exists, or which may exist, of private profit making, it would be advisable to restrict the liberty of patients to go where they liked or their relatives to send them where they liked?—I think that they should not be allowed to enter institutions run for the purpose of private gain.

12,310. The fourth question is: Suppose this luxury which is desired by patients or relatives is necessary for the cure of a patient, that would be a criticism on every lower standard?—Entirely. If these luxuries were essential to the treatment, it means that cheaper treatment is not adequate.

12,311. Then every other patient ought to have treatment equal to that.—I did not say the luxuries were essential. I said if they were essential.

12,312. Earl Russell: I want to ask you this. Do you make the same objection to single care—sending a patient to one doctor whose sole charge he is?—Yes, I think I would.

12,313. Sir David Drummond: But, Mr. Gibson. I do not quite follow you. A man with a small income pays 3 or 4 guineas to the hospital, which you agree would be all right. That would be just the same as 10, 15 or 20 guineas to a richer man. Why should you not object to the poor man sending his patient to a place where they make a charge?—I do not think I did object in that manner.

12,314. It is purely relative. The rich man sends his son to a place where the charge is 10 guineas, and the poor man to a place where the charge is 3 guineas. You admit that that would be all right?—No, no. I think you are misconstruing my evidence.

12,315. You quoted a mental hospital where they did run a private side?—But I pointed out that it was administered by a County Council and was not run for gain.

12,316. Supposing these places are properly administered, what is your objection then?—That they are run for the purpose of private gain, which places temptation in the way.

12,317. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Have you a considerable body of evidence showing the undesirable nature of institutions where there is the temptation of making a profit out of the patients?—I cannot say I have a very considerable body of evidence.

12,318. You put it in the forefront of your evidence?—We have a lot of complaints, but the evidence is limited, for this reason: that they come and make the statements, but they do not often wish to be implicated in cases.

12,319. Earl Russell: Statements from patients or from attendants?—From members of the staff. Another reason is this: we find that in many of the private institutions the staff are constantly leaving. I suggested to the Deputy-Chairman of the Commission earlier on that he might ask the Board of Control for a return of the length of service. There are some who seem to make a feature of getting rid of anybody who has been there longer than three months.

12,320. Deputy-Chairman: Amongst your members there would be members from all these private houses?—No; very few.

12,321. Earl Russell: What do you suggest is the sinister meaning of their getting rid of them after three months?—I think they get to know too much about the administration.

12,322. You mean they begin to compare treatment and cases?—Yes, quite. I suggest, for instance, that occasionally a patient, whose friends are paying extra for him for carriage drives, has a run to the station in the ordinary car, and his friends are charged 10s. 6d. for it.

12,323. Sir David Drummond: Is the payment made to the attendants on the same level or above or below the level of public institutions?—It varies very considerably. Some are as good; some are worse; but there is a tendency in the profit-making institutions for the staff frequently to rely upon getting remuneration from the patients' friends. It is an undesirable tendency.

12,324. Deputy-Chairman: There was one other matter you wanted to mention. I think I had finished my questions; but you have had in your mind some reference to clinics which you wanted to be opened for the reception of early cases?—On that point we think that the powers of local visiting committees are too circumscribed. Their duties only commence after the patient has been certified insane; and we think they should be given powers as mental health authorities, just as you have public health authorities; and their duty should be to provide outdoor clinics, both at mental hospitals, and general hospitals, where possible, and to advise people who may be in the early stages of insanity—not certifiable; to give them advice and outdoor treatment. We think they should be empowered to send out certified nurses from stations to private cases—even into a workman's home; it might be a case of puerperal insanity, and the mental nurse in a home might save the necessity of sending the patient away from the home.

12,325. Earl Russell: That would not be very desirable for the children in the home?—It might not be; but, on the other hand, is it desirable to take the mother away and entirely by reason of her mental state have her classified as a lunatic, and years after it is said to the children: "Your mother was a lunatic"?

12,326. It is desirable that she should be treated.—I am not suggesting that they should send a nurse to the home without medical advice; we suggest they should have the power to do so.

12,327. Deputy-Chairman: We have had the suggestion of clinics being instituted. You have heard the evidence. May I take it that generally speaking you agree with the views put forward in its favour?—Generally speaking; in general hospitals as well as in mental hospitals.

12,328. You would like to see clinics opened in connection with both of them?—Quite. There is one other point I want to draw the attention of the Commission to before you proceed further. That is, we have a recommendation to make regarding confining the medical authority to medical affairs, but we still think that he should remain the actual disciplinary authority with power of suspension only.

12,329. You think that the medical superintendent at the present moment has too much to do?—I think he has too much to do, and, apart from that, I find that a very few able medical men are temperamentally fitted to control a large institution and all its administrative affairs; very excellent men technically in their profession; temperamentally not the right people for controlling affairs.

12,330. Are you speaking now of men who have been actually appointed to the position?—I am speaking now of one or two who have been actually appointed.

12,331. It really comes to this, that some able medical superintendents are better administrators than others?—It comes to the point that some able medical men are not administrators at all.

Deputy-Chairman: There may be some truth in that.

12,332. Earl Russell: It is very likely to be the case with eminent scientific men?—Quite. If I might refer the Commission to the Report of the Select Committee of 1911, which considered Lord Wolmer's Asylums Officers (Employment, Pensions and Superannuation) Bill, at page 7 of that Report you will find that they recommend: "that the power of dismissal should be retained in the hands of the visiting committee, ought to be universal; and your Committee have amended Clause 4 accordingly."

12,333. That is practically universal, is it not?—No. In practice, the power is delegated to the superintendent.

12,334. I thought the superintendent only suspended to the next meeting?—In London it is so; in most of the other asylums the power is delegated to him. It may be of interest to refer to the Report of the Board of Control when they were less sophisticated; that is going back a long time, to 1843 and 1844. I believe it is the first Report of the Board of Control issued. They say: "We consider that the appointment and dismissal of servants is a trust of great importance, which is vested in the visiting justices for the purpose of checking any undue power or influence being used by the superintendent over the servants of an asylum." Now, Sir, three weeks ago a female nurse in the Midlands was dismissed, for singing in the messroom during her breakfast hour, by the medical superintendent.

12,335. Mr. Snell: Is singing supposed to be bad for the patients?—I do not know.

12,336. Deputy-Chairman: I do not suppose that that case is a case upon which you base your general suggestion?—I merely make that as an observation. I base my case on the fact that a Select Committee of the House has thought fit that the powers should be removed, after hearing the evidence.

12,337. I suppose something turns, does it not, upon the size of the establishment? It may be that in these very large establishments an enormous amount of administrative work is thrown upon the medical superintendent. The amount of work he can get through himself will vary, of course, with different medical superintendents, and the way he can delegate it will vary a good deal?—I think it is so even in the smaller institutions. You see, after all, with the exception of Canterbury, in the small ones of round about 600 or 700 patients even, there is a lot of work.

12,338. You appreciate that where you have an institution of 600 or 700 patients it is necessary to have a head?—Undoubtedly.

12,339. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Does it appear to the attendants that, on the whole, they are more likely to get fairer treatment from a visiting committee than they would from a medical superintendent? Is that the feeling in the background?—It appeals to us in this matter: we think that if an attendant is heard by the committee he has an opportunity of preparing and presenting his case in a reasonable manner, which may not be the case with a medical man who, professionally of great attainments, may not have the temperament to trouble about what he considers the minor troubles of an attendant.

12,340. Earl Russell: You also have the opportunity of course of avoiding any personal opinion and of getting more than one opinion upon the case; but can you conceive it being pleasant for the attendant to remain in service when the medical man said he ought to be dismissed and the visiting committee said he should not?—That might be unpleasant for him,

12,341. Mr. Snell: You have no objection to his being suspended pending decision by the committee?—No. I suggest that the power of suspension should be left to the superintendent. If you refer to a somewhat analogous Report, that is, the Report of the Committee on the Police Service, I think you will find there that they recommend that a policeman should be given permission to appear before a Watch Committee and be represented before being dismissed. We had a case the other day where a man at one of the institutions in Warwickshire, with 23 years' service, was reduced from charge attendant to a lower rank, at a loss of over £3 a month in pay, because he said he agreed with some criticism of the institution that had been published. He had not written the criticism, but he said he thought it was a fair criticism.

12,342. Do you mean he had expressed that publicly?—Yes.

12,343. Deputy-Chairman: In that case, you would like some sort of court of appeal, such as the visiting committee?—Yes. Mind you, in this case the man appeared before the committee, but entirely without warning and without a representative.

12,344. Could he not put his case?—What opportunity has the average attendant of doing so, especially if he has no previous warning? He is called in to the committee; the medical superintendent and the law clerk are there; the case has been heard before he appears; he commences at a disadvantage, to start with.

12,345. Miss Madeleine Symons: Mr. Gibson, I think the pension age is 55?—Yes.

12,346. I was wondering whether you could tell us when you pay sickness benefit or disablement benefit, whether many of them in fact break down before they reach that age?—There is no doubt that, particularly amongst the female staffs, many do break down; many are quite unable to stand it. On that point the Select Committee of 1911 quoted Dr. Cooke, a member of the Lunacy Commission then, who said that hardly any woman can stand being in an asylum from the age of 18 to 55; and they recommend that in the case of the female staffs superannuation should be granted after 25 years' service.

12,347. Irrespective of age?—Yes.

12,348. How long has the three-shift system been working in the hospitals that have adopted it?—In the London County Council institutions, from about July 1919.

12,349. I was wondering whether it had been working long enough for you to be able to compare the records of health or length of service in the hospitals that adopted shorter hours?—I do not think it has been working long enough to enable us to do that although the average of service in the London County Council institutions is more favourable than in the others, because the conditions of employment are rather better.

12,350. Earl Russell: But the others used to be terrible, of course?—Yes, they were.

12,351. Miss Madeleine Symons: Then you told us I think, that you objected to a very much lower salary being paid to uncertificated nurses while hospitals were still allowed to employ them?—Quite.

12,352. The point, of course, is obvious—that you were afraid of the unfair competition?—That they would continue to be employed.

12,353. Are we to take it from that, that you would be in favour of a system under which no uncertificated nurses were employed?—Yes; that is, so far as new entries to the services are concerned. I think we make that clear in our recommendations on the Conciliation Committee.

12,354. You have not made it clear from your evidence.—We are quite in favour of that.

12,355. Could you or your colleagues tell us from your experience whether you know of cases in which drugs have been administered to patients in food? I do not mean necessarily and properly administered, but administered in food?—In my own experience, I have known croton oil administered in tea. It was used very seldom. I can only speak for the institution I was at; but it was the only drug I know of that has been administered in food.

12,356. Do your colleagues, with more recent experience, know of that being done?—(Miss Wiese): I have not known of it. If it is done, it is done without the authority of the medical superintendent. (Mr. Gibson): If I may say so, the delusion of being drugged is not peculiar to insane people. I remember in the Army the gunners in the battery complained that they had been drugged. If they had, the cook must have had some grudge against them; it was quite unofficial. (Miss Wiese): Very often sedatives are given in a tube feed; there is that. (Mr. Gibson): That is to avoid the duplication of administering a feeding tube. (Miss Wiese): It is very necessary, because very often at night two patients can make one dormitory a hell, when other people want to sleep.

12,357. Have you any information generally from your members about the accommodation provided for nurses—I am thinking particularly of the women nurses?—(Mr. Gibson): I think they ought to be housed in nursing homes; many of them at present have to sleep two, three and four in a room; and, in some cases, they have to sleep in cubicles, not in single rooms, and frequently in rooms adjoining dormitories. (Miss Wiese): That means that very seldom they get a good night's rest; and they are ready to be called in an emergency. (Mr. Gibson): The reason for that is that the night staff is available if any trouble arises.

12,358. Do you think that improved accommodation would have a great bearing upon the question of length of service?—Yes. I think most of the mental hospital authorities to-day are willing to improve the accommodation; the difficulty, of course, is building costs—capital charges. (Miss Wiese): In my opinion, it is very necessary. As a matter of fact, I slept in a room attached to a ward until within the last two years, and I have felt quite differently on duty since sleeping away from the patients.

12,359. Do your members favour living out, where possible? Of course, in many cases it is not possible?—(Mr. Gibson): Yes, we do favour it.

12,360. For men and women?—For men and women. For women, of course, it is very difficult to secure the accommodation very often.

12,361. Earl Russell: Yes, asylums are very often in remote parts of the country?—Yes, and inconveniently situated.

12,362. Miss Madeleine Symons: I wonder if you or Miss Wiese could tell us whether you think sufficient is done for providing recreation and indoor occupation for the women patients who are not working in the normal way?—(Miss Wiese): Yes, I do. They usually read and do crochet work; we have a cinema, and there is a play on Saturday.

12,363. Earl Russell: But one play once a week is not enough?—I mean in the wards they have games and books; and most of them do their own private work, for which they get paid.

12,364. Miss Madeleine Symons: Do you mean handicraft?—Yes.

12,365. Earl Russell: Are they paid in money or paid in tea?—In money mostly. It is against the rules, but it is done none the less.

12,366. Miss Madeleine Symons: It is against the rules? There is not any organised system by which they are occupied?—No. Of course, that is coming along. Many of the mental hospitals are engaging occupational therapeutists and teaching mat making, and that sort of thing, and I suppose it will become general. (Mr. Gibson): I do not think there is sufficient organised amusement and recreation for patients on either side in the wards and in the airing courts. I think a good deal more could be done; and in particular up-to-date periodicals should be supplied. They generally get them in the wards when they are three months old. (Miss Wiese): We are fairly fortunate under the London County Council; we have a fair number of periodicals.

12,367. Earl Russell: I want to pursue the subject of private licensed houses a little further; I do not think we have quite exhausted it yet. Of course, we recognise that there is always a conflict between duty and interest in these places necessarily. Now you have said that one of the things that happens is that a patient does not get what he has paid for?—(Mr. Gibson): Yes.

12,368. That is to say, the contract is not honestly carried out, to put it quite frankly.—Yes.

12,369. Have you any other charge to make against them, such, for instance, as keeping patients longer than they should, on account of payments made?—I have no evidence upon that point at all.

12,370. Is there anything else you could suggest against them beyond that?—There is nothing else. What I have suggested is sufficient, I think.

12,371. I do not know that that in itself is necessarily sufficient to condemn them, merely that people are being swindled a little. But you know, of course, there are mental hospitals registered as a charity?—Yes.

12,372. But there are not many of them?—No; and I think there is one drawback to them; that is, that the management committees are not publicly elected. If I may say so, I consider that a very great drawback.

12,373. It may or it may not be. You would not say it was in the case of some of them, would you? Why should they be publicly elected when the public do not contribute to them?—In my experience the publicly-elected committee is the greatest safeguard. I am speaking now of actual happenings. I very frequently have relatives of patients referred to me who say they want to get someone out of an institution. They say: "Go and see Gibson." They come to me; I say: "What institution is your relative in?" They tell me. I say: "Now go and get hold of the borough representative and ask him to take steps for you," and they do; and of course they get a personal enquiry into the patient's case.

12,374. But have you quite considered what you mean? In the case of a private registered hospital, who is the public to be that is to elect? Where is your constituency?—I do not know how you are going to work the franchise, but, on the other hand, it seems desirable that there should be some form of public control. I have seen advertisements in newspapers for a member of a committee.

12,375. You get some form of control in the Board of Control.—I think these arrangements are unsatisfactory.

12,376. What evils do you think result from a committee being not elected publicly?—In practice perhaps not very much enthusiasm for the work, and a tendency to give the medical superintendent entire control, not to exercise their functions.

12,377. Do you think perhaps that would be met if you had a representative of the local authority always on the committee?—I think it would improve things.

12,378. That would give you some touch with what you call the public?—Yes.

12,379. And he would be a person who could be approached, probably?—I think that would be an improvement.

12,380. I do not want to dwell upon them, but there they are. It is obvious that you are not likely to get many more of them established, if you abolish them.—No, I do not think we will.

12,381. It involves considerable capital expenditure, out of which no profit is to be made. Therefore, it is in nobody's interest to provide it, except as a charity. There are a certain number of people who want the comfort that is to be obtained by the payment of 10 or 20 guineas a week, and you cannot guarantee that local authorities will provide accommodation that may never be wanted, because you cannot tell in what part of the country it will be wanted?—It appears to me that if they can afford to pay 10 or 20 guineas a week, a few miles more or less do not matter.

12,382. I do not think you can put it on all fours with the pauper lunatic case. The pauper lunatics are a charge upon the place. These people, in particular if they come from outside the area, are people to whom the local authority has no duty of any sort. You see the difficulty?—There is a difficulty, but, on the other hand, they can provide accommodation.

12,383. They can, of course, if they wish to, but do you think they would in fact do it?—I think they are willing to, if they are encouraged. The fact that some of them do provide some private accommodation surely testifies to that.

12,384. Supposing the fact was that there was a large class of people who desired this private accommodation, and particularly did not wish it to be in any way associated with a public authority, as they very well might; how are you going to meet that demand if you abolish the licensed houses?—I am afraid I shall have to appeal to my point of view and say, I think people who think so are ill-advised.

12,385. But as against that, the only serious objection you have put forward is the fear, as you think, that people do not always get what they pay for?—Quite.

12,386. If they do get good treatment and the places are properly conducted, that is not a very serious or vital objection?—I should have thought that in some cases it was.

12,387. You cannot give us any more serious objection than that as a reason why they should be abolished, however great the inconvenience?—No, I have no other suggestion.

12,388. I am very anxious to get from you anything you can tell us, because it is a subject I have been watching all through, and we have by no means made up our minds on it, if you could help us.—I am not prepared to make allegations without evidence, and I do not desire to go any further than I have done.

12,389. Are the arrangements for female bathing improved now in asylums?—I believe they are improving, but a general complaint is that the staff have to bathe far too many patients in a short space of time.

12,390. Therefore, they are hustled and under circumstances of small decency?—Yes; I have had instances given me where they have had to bathe 60 patients in 30 minutes.

12,391. Are there many asylums where there is no screening between the female patients when they are bathing?—Not so far as I am aware; most of them have screening. (Miss Wiese): There must be some observation.

12,392. Mr. Snell: Mr. Gibson, just supplementary to what Lord Russell asked you, would you regard it as satisfactory if a condition of any licence given to a licensed house was that a representative of the local authority should be given a place on their board?—I am afraid I should not; I do not think it goes far enough.

12,393. I am not thinking now of the profit-making institution, but of the registered hospital?—Yes.

12,394. You would regard that as sufficient?—Yes.

12,395. Then on the point about service, I think it is very important that we should have a right view as to why it is that the staff changes so much more rapidly in these private hospitals than in public hospitals?—I did not give figures. I gave my impression. I suggested to the Deputy-Chairman that the Commission might ask the Board of Control for figures.

12,396. May we have your advice as to why that is so, assuming that it exists? Are the conditions of service in public hospitals better than in private hospitals, taking them as a whole?—The conditions of service in the licensed houses vary considerably; in some they are fairly well remunerated; in others badly remunerated.

12,397. Is there any difference in the pension system?—Any allowance granted, of course, is merely at the discretion of the owners of the house.

12,398. So that they would be in that respect in a worse position?—Yes, quite.

12,399. Is it at all possible that in order to gain experience to qualify for public institutions, probationers, if I may use the term, take preliminary service in private hospitals and then get out as soon as they can?—I do not think so, because many of the places are too small to give training.

12,400. The training they would give would not be a recommendation under the London County Council?—No.

12,401. Mrs. Mathew: I think you said, Mr. Gibson, that a medical superintendent asserted that it was much more difficult to organise the female staff of an asylum, and on that I wanted to ask you, is it because of the large percentage of women with less than one year's service?—I think that is the problem. It is because of the large number of changes of staff, and therefore the larger proportion of inexperienced staff. (Miss Wiese): I find that the first-year nurses are usually frightened with the examinations, and then, of course, with women there are so many other openings. One has to have a great deal of enthusiasm to stick it, really. (Mr. Gibson): The syllabus is rather alarming.

12,402. And they are constantly changing?—Yes.

12,403. Which certainly would appear to make it more difficult?—Yes.

12,404. Then the emoluments, I understand, are rated very highly, and they are deducted from the superannuation; that is to say, they do not count as salary?—The general practice in the public asylums is that there are no emoluments nowadays. The practice is that for board, lodging and laundry a deduction is made from the actual wage. The wage is an inclusive one; and a deduction is made from the actual wage in respect of any of these services supplied to members of the staff.

12,405. Earl Russell: The wage is a living out wage, to start with, and then you deduct if you live in?—Yes.

12,406. Miss Madeleine Symons: When you say, Miss Wiese, "there are many other openings for women," what do you mean exactly?—For instance, we found there was a distinct shortage of nurses when Wembley was opened; we found that the position was not nearly so difficult after it closed. (Mr. Gibson): It is very difficult to get nurses of the right type. They are finding it difficult even in the general hospitals, I think, as a rule.

12,407. Mrs. Mathew: Then I think you mentioned that the local authorities were saving on the patients' diet?—I mentioned an extract from evidence given, or from a statement made, at a Conference held between the Board of Control and the medical superintendents and chairmen of the public mental hospitals. One medical officer made the statement there that there was a tendency nowadays to save on the patients' dietary. He said it was no use the superintendents or the Board of Control recommending improved diet. May I amplify that a little?

12,408. Deputy-Chairman: Certainly.—It goes back to the early paragraphs in my précis where I point out the undesirability of a visiting committee having the administration of an institution and not being the rating authority. In other words, what happens is this: we find in some parts of the country where there is a progressive local authority, they are anxious to improve the diet scale of the institution; but it means an increased maintenance rate, and they are confronted by the fact that the board of guardians, whenever they put the maintenance rate up, flood them with resolutions against it; and in the case of Leeds they have actually approached the Minister of Health and asked permission to borrow

£80,000 to build a block for the treatment of insane patients themselves, because they can keep them at a lower rate.

12,409. Earl Russell: Still, the local authority has control of the rate, because it is for them to say what the rate is to be?—Yes; but if you have a board of guardians who say: "You increase the maintenance rate and we will withdraw our patients," that is a potent weapon in their hands, and that has been done.

12,410. Deputy-Chairman: What it comes to is that there is a fight between the local authority and the board of guardians?—Quite.

12,411. And whatever work the local authority want to carry out, you say they may be thwarted by the board of guardians?—Yes.

12,412. Mrs. Mathew: Are you of opinion that an average of 5s. per head is sufficient for a patient's diet?—No, I do not think it is. I have already expressed the opinion that I think the diet scale should be improved, although in some of the better mental hospitals it has been considerably improved within the last two or three years.

12,413. You say that the nurses come in at the age of 18 to 25. Is it at all possible for a probationer of 18 to be left in charge of a lunatic?—Yes; nurses even in their first few weeks of service may go into a ward relieving, and they are told: "Now, look here, there are four suicidal cases here." They are either parchment or card cases; different terms and different descriptions. They are given the parchment to sign; they have to sign on the back of that: "I have seen and know patient So and So. I recognise that he or she has suicidal proclivities." And three minutes after they go in, those parchments are taken away from them again, and if anything happens while they are about, they are held responsible. I have had to go into a ward and sign 14 parchments in three minutes and say I know every patient whose name was on them.

12,414. Does a girl of 18 have to do that?—Yes, frequently.

12,415. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You were speaking about the outdoor clinics, Mr. Gibson, which might be associated either with a general hospital or with a mental hospital. In the experience of your members, have they got any preference as to whether it would be better to associate the clinic with an institution for the insane or associate it with a general hospital which might be in the middle of a town?—We should like to have them associated with both.

12,416. Can you name any advantages, if there are any?—I do not know that we have personal experience, but I believe you are having a witness later on, Dr. Worth, who conducts an outdoor clinic at a general hospital, and I was interested, in conversation with him, to learn what good work had been done there. I think they should be at both places. There are many patients discharged who return to a mental hospital knowing the doctors and staff, and ask for advice. There is no power to give them any assistance that would incur expenditure.

12,417. You refer to an expression of opinion that it should be possible in some way to protect patients from themselves without putting them under certificates, and you mention later on in your précis a period of three months?—Yes.

12,418. Have you got any suggestion to make as to how the patients could be detained without putting them under certificates?—Yes. A public health authority, I understand, in the case of an infectious disease occurring, if they are satisfied that satisfactory treatment cannot be given at the home of the patient, may order that patient to be treated in a fever hospital or a hospital for infectious diseases. I do not see why a public mental health authority could not be endowed with the same powers. I do not mean treatment in the asylum; I mean in a special place for that purpose; it may be on the asylum grounds, if you like, but not in the same place as the certified patients.

12,419. That is obviously desirable from the point of view of any stigma which may be thought to attach?—Quite.

12,420. And you think it should be made comparable with arrangements made with regard to people suffering from infectious diseases?—Quite.

12,421. Could you prevent a patient in a scarlet fever hospital from getting out?—I do not know. I think you can.

12,422. Deputy-Chairman: You mean by force, not by law?—No; by law; the public health authority can. That man, I understand, must get a clean bill of health before he is entitled to demand his release.

12,423. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Can you prevent a person from leaving who is carrying diphtheria organisms in his throat?—If the disease is notified, you can. Is not the notification the authority to compel the patient to be taken to a fever hospital?

Earl Russell: Yes; it is, under the notification of infectious diseases.

12,424. Sir David Drummond: But you cannot compel a person to be taken to a private hospital if his relatives are able to deal with the patient at home?—Quite. If they are able to deal with an insane patient at home, I do not think they should take him.

12,425. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You say that the Lunacy laws only concern people who become insane. You are anxious that some measures should be taken to prevent insanity from the very first?—Quite. I have suggested that there should be instead of a visiting committee, a mental health authority. My idea was that that should be one of their functions. We are told, for instance, that in some parts of the country there is an undue proportion of mental cases due to inter-marriage. It does not appear to be anybody's business to make these facts known to the public, either by literature or by lectures. I think it ought to be the province of a mental health authority to do so. You have various other causes of insanity that have an undue proportion in different districts.

12,426. It is most desirable that it should be known. The question is: Who should be the people to do it? You think it ought to be mental health authority rather than the Ministry of Health or the local authorities?—The Ministry of Health have so many functions to perform; and, after all, insanity in comparison with the number of people they treat is an insignificant part of their duties. I am afraid they would not give due weight to it.

12,427. Earl Russell: Insanity is always one of the evils resulting from inter-marriage?—Quite, but it ought to be somebody's duty to point it out.

12,428. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You referred to the question of the administration of drugs, purgatives, sedatives and hypnotics by attendants. I suppose it must often happen that a doctor says: "Now if necessary give the patient this, that or the other"?—Yes.

12,429. It is left to the discretion of the attendant?—Frequently, during the evening hours the doctor says he has a noisy patient, and he will send down a draught from the surgery marked "To be used in the night, if necessary". If the patient has a good night, it is of course returned to the surgery in the morning.

12,430. Then, of course, emergencies must necessarily arise, and if a patient is very troublesome, the attendant may almost feel it is his duty to act?—There is a very strict rule in most of the institutions that no medicine can be administered without medical authority. All the medicines are sent down in labelled bottles. (Miss Wiese): There is always a doctor in the hospital, and the head nurse would approach him. (Mr. Gibson): The telephone is used in these emergencies.

12,431. There probably is very little in the suggestion that purgatives are sometimes given almost as a matter of routine by attendants?—I do not think it happens at all nowadays. I will say this: that in many hospitals purgatives are given almost as a matter of routine on medical authority; that is to say, that once a week you get draughts for very nearly every patient in your ward; but they are given on the medical authority.

12,432. Would the medical authority say: "Give this patient a purgative once a day or once a week until further notice"?—No. In an odd case you will get a large bottle of aperient mixture, in the case of a new patient, or a patient suffering from some specific trouble; but I am speaking now of the system of sending down once a week large numbers of labelled bottles.

12,433. The custom may vary in different hospitals, I understand?—Quite.

12,434. Now with regard to the three-shift system; one of the advantages of the shift three times a day, you told us, was that that provides what you term a 15-hour live day for the patient?—Yes.

12,435. By "live day," I suppose you mean they are free all the time?—By "live day" I mean a day on which patients are up and can be engaged in exercise or recreation during the whole of those 15 hours.

12,436. And it is easier for a patient to have a "live day" under the three-shift system than under the two-shift system?—Certainly.

12,437. I do not know sufficient about it to understand why that is so.—If you are only going to have two shifts in the 24 hours, you must obviously have those on the day-turn on for very long hours, if you are going to have the patients up 15 hours in the day; it means having the full day staff on for 15 hours.

12,438. From the point of view of responsibility, you think that is more satisfactorily borne by the three-shift staff than by the two-shift?—Yes, I think in practice it has been found to be so.

12,439. Is that the opinion of the charge nurses as a whole—if you were to take a census of opinion?—(Miss Wiese): I should think so. I think the duties now are so arduous that they would feel they could not stand the strain of the work for a long day—those who have tried the three-shift.

12,440. Sir David Drummond: With regard to the point Sir Humphry has just been asking you, Mr. Gibson, and your desire to postpone certification as long as possible, your statement is that under no circumstances should certification be resorted to until after three months?—(Mr. Gibson): That is rather an exaggeration. I mean in no circumstances except where the patient is a chronic case.

12,441. You recognise that many cases must be certified almost at once?—There are cases such as

G.P.I. and others, but I am speaking of all the doubtful cases, because I have seen some of the most acute cases we have had recover inside the space of three months.

12,442. I gather that you look upon this syllabus of subjects for examination as very stiff, very serious?—I think it is more difficult than the General Nursing syllabus.

12,443. Do you not think that it may have the effect of excluding some very capable and useful nurses, both male and female, people with all the qualities that are necessary?—It does, occasionally.

12,444. People with all the qualities that qualify them thoroughly for the work?—I am afraid that applies to any profession, Sir David.

12,445. Do you not think it does in this case?—Undoubtedly. One of the best nurses I ever knew was temperamentally incapable of passing an examination, but he was a very excellent nurse.

12,446. It strikes me that it operates adversely?—(Miss Wiese): It is a very discouraging syllabus. (Mr. Gibson): On the other hand, you must have some syllabus of training and some training standard. I know one medical superintendent who told me that were he asked to sit down and pass it, he could not; and he had been a medical superintendent for nearly 30 years.

12,447. Have you had experience of general hospital work?—(Miss Wiese): Only as a patient.

12,448. I gathered so, because I notice you say that in a general hospital the nurses' work is practically mechanical. I do not think that would be admitted if you had had experience as a nurse.—It is so very different from mental nursing.

12,449. Quite so, but I do not believe most people think that nurses in a general hospital do not use their brains.—(Mr. Gibson): But much of the work is routine.

12,450. Mrs. Mathew: Might I ask a further question about the examination? Might it be taken in smaller doses, so to speak?—It might be more easily absorbed in smaller doses.

12,451. Would you suggest that?—The difficulty is machinery. The Medico-Psychological Association is purely a voluntary Association, and it must be extremely costly for them to administer these examinations. On the other hand, the General Nursing Council require two guineas for their preliminary examination, and three guineas for the final, in addition to the travelling expenses of the candidate, which is far too much to require from the probationer nurse.

Deputy-Chairman: We are much obliged to you.

Chairman: Before we begin the proceedings this morning I desire to make a statement on behalf of myself and my colleagues. The Commission have found it necessary, in view of their recent experience, to reconsider their procedure in hearing the evidence of ex-patients tendered by the National Society for Lunacy Reform. It will be recalled that the Commission invited the Society to bring before them six selected cases which might be regarded as typical. The Commission requested the views of the Society as to whether this evidence should be taken in public, having regard to the possible effect of a public examination upon the ex-patient and upon his evidence. The Society indicated that they did not anticipate that any of their witnesses would desire that their examination should be in private and expressed a preference for procedure in public. The Commission accordingly informed the Society that in the first instance the hearing of the individual cases would be conducted in public, but at the same time intimated that, if at any stage they found that the presence of the public appeared to be affecting detrimentally the value of the evidence or to be in any other way embarrassing the proceedings, they would exercise their discretion to continue the hearing in private. The National Society furnished the Commission with the names of six witnesses and the Commission made special arrangements to suit the convenience of the first witness, Mr. H., whose testimony the Society stated that they regarded as of particular importance. His case occupied the Commission on 17th, 26th and 27th January. The Commission found to their regret that their apprehensions as to the possible effect on an ex-patient of examination and cross-examination by counsel in public were justified. While the case was still before the Commission, they received a communication from the witness complaining of the inconvenience which he had suffered in his personal affairs through the publication of his evidence and asking for the protection of the Commission. This was followed by a telegram from the witness stating that he was too ill to continue the fight, and he did not in fact attend the second and third days proceedings. In addition, the Commission found that the procedure adopted had had the result of creating an atmosphere of controversy and recrimination, which they cannot allow to recur. If the evidence of this witness had made an important contribution to the deliberations of the Commission or to public enlightenment, the position might have been different. But the expenditure of two and a half days time resulted in the eliciting of only a few material facts which the Commissioners could have themselves obtained in at most an hour or two. Considerable public expense was occasioned, and the persons against whom Mr. H. had made allegations and whom the Commission thought it proper to notify were put to much expense and inconvenience in attending to answer the charges made against them. The Commission have further taken note of the fact that the National Society have withdrawn another of the six witnesses originally tendered by them. The nature of a communication addressed to us by this intended witness sufficiently justifies this step. Leave has been asked to substitute another witness. In these circumstances the Commission decline to take the responsibility of permitting ex-patients to be exposed to the ordeal of public examination, the effects of which in any individual case it is impossible to forecast with any assurance. They are satisfied that it is not in the public interest that the procedure hitherto adopted should continue to be followed, and they have decided that in the remaining cases they will themselves examine the witnesses in private. It is not, however, intended to exclude the Chairman and Counsel of the National Society for Lunacy Reform, who are tendering the witnesses. The Commission at the same time recognise the importance of the evidence so received being made accessible to the public, and they propose to publish it along with their proceedings, with the omission only of names. The Commission desire to add that they have already devoted six days to the evidence of the National Society for Lunacy Reform and have had the benefit of the very detailed evidence of Mr. Parker which has so fully and usefully informed them of all the points upon which the Society is concerned to effect reforms. It must be borne in mind that there are many other interests still waiting to be heard. The purport of my statement will be communicated to the Press.

Dr. MONTAGUE LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S., called and examined.

12,452. Chairman: This morning, we have the advantage of the attendance of Dr. Montagu Lomax; and perhaps, Dr. Lomax, before we start the proceedings it might be convenient if I were to tell you the state of our information up to date, so that you may take up the thread. We have all had the advantage, if I may say so, of reading your most interesting book. We have also read the Cobb Report, and we have read your reply. I may say we have attended to them very carefully, and I do not think it would be out of place if I were to pay a tribute to the very great care you have taken in considering this whole topic and the zeal which you have shown in elucidating it. We have also had, as you are aware, the evidence of Mr. Parker, who presented to us the general case for the National Society for Lunacy Reform in very considerable detail. Of course we do not want merely to duplicate evidence which we have already heard, because it is not upon the multiplicity of witnesses, but rather upon the importance of the testimony that we rely. I have felt that it might be useful to have from you, as a special student of the matter, some enlightenment upon those topics where I understand you do not find yourself in entire agreement with Mr. Parker; so that may we see another angle of approach to these questions and receive your views upon that. There are also some topics to which you refer which Mr. Parker did not deal with, or did not, at any rate, enlarge upon. There, also, we should be glad to have your evidence, but may I ask that to-day we should as far as possible avoid merely duplicating matters which have already been very fully discussed. Then, Dr. Lomax, as we know, you are a medical practitioner, and a Member of the Royal College of Surgeons?—Yes.

12,453. I think you were for many years in general practice, were you not?—Yes.

12,454. Are you still in general practice?—No.

12,455. Have you retired now?—No, I am doing mental work of a certain kind, and practise as a consultant, a small amount; my health is not good. I am not in general practice, and have not been for the last 7 or 8 years.

12,456. And I understand that your interest in this topic of Lunacy law reform really originated in the services which you gave in two asylums during the period of the war?—That is so.

12,457. It was in consequence of your experiences in those two asylums that you came to the conclusion that the present system stood in need of reform?—That is so.

12,458. If I may put to you the way the matter is impressing our minds, what we are concerned with chiefly is this:—we have had evidence, and we shall have some from you no doubt to this effect, that under the existing law, notwithstanding the numerous safeguards which it purports to afford, nevertheless, in fact, there are still possibilities of the occurrence of abuses?—Certainly.

12,459. And one's desire naturally is, if possible, to effect such reforms as will prevent the possibility of such occurrences?—Quite.

12,460. We are at one upon that idea, I think?—Quite.

12,461. We are not really so much concerned with the actual number of cases that have occurred as with this, that the present system permits of the occurrence of such cases?—Yes.

12,462. And therefore reform is desirable in the direction of altering the law so as to prevent the possibility of such occurrences?—Yes.

12,463. Now in the précis with which you have been good enough to furnish us you have summarised the various heads upon which you wish to address us?—Yes.

12,464. I think we might usefully go through them, if you please. At the very outset you deal with a topic of very great importance upon which we should like specially to have your views, and that is the question of the position of the medical superintendent. I have read in your book, if I may say so, the balanced presentation of the matter. You have put the considerations on both sides on the question whether the medical superintendent should be relieved entirely of executive business, and should devote himself exclusively to medical work. I suppose you will realise that the topic is one upon which two views may be entertained?—Certainly.

12,465. But as the result of your study of the matter you have come decidedly to entertain the view that he should not have executive duties?—Absolutely. I have not any doubt at all that if the reforms which we hope will result from the enquiry take place, the medical superintendent's office will be separated entirely from the executive chief's office.

12,466. Now in that view are you, to some extent, influenced by the fact that at present many of the most important asylums are so very large?—Yes, I am.

12,467. And I observe (if I may refer to your book now and again, because that is really what has concentrated my thoughts on certain points) at page 140 you say: "The only possible remedy in my opinion for this state of affairs at least in all asylums containing more than 1,000 patients, is to separate entirely the offices of medical superintendent and executive chief"?—Yes.

12,468. If the reform which you suggest in another part of your evidence were given effect to, and if this large type of asylum of which we have a number of examples in the country ceased to exist, and in place of it we had the more modern form of villa asylum with a limited number of inmates in each institution, does your objection to the combination of the duties to some extent disappear?—I think it still exists, because my whole view is that the superintendent of an asylum, the medical superintendent, exists for the sake of his medical duties—not executive duties at all. If you combine the two, the executive duties are bound to interfere, and largely to interfere, with his other professional duties. Even in the villa asylums which you suggest, the actual asylums as a rule are not smaller; they are arranged on a different system, and the medical superintendent of those asylums—there are only two or three in the country which have what you call the villa system—

12,469. Yes, they are only in their inception?—Will still be appealed to on these questions of executive responsibility.

12,470. Now may I put to you a difficulty that is present to my own mind in considering the topic, and that is this, that the treatment of mental patients differs from the treatment of ordinary patients in this respect, that the curative treatment for persons suffering from mental disorder must necessarily depend very much upon environment, and upon the provision of means of occupation and recreation, and so on, which have to be adapted to the special requirements of the cases?—Yes.

12,471. The difficulty I have felt about it in considering the question is just this, that if that be a form really of medical treatment, the doctor who is at the head of the establishment must himself be concerned with the provision of things which an ordinary doctor has not to think of. An ordinary doctor has not to think of providing opportunities for industrial employment, or to see that there is open air work for patients, or to arrange concerts for them and things of that sort. That is not part of a general hospital doctor's work at all, but it is a very important part of the actual medical treatment of patients in asylums—you see how my mind is working?—Quite.

12,472. What one feels is this, that if you remove from the medical superintendent the control of the whole establishment you might actually cripple him in the provision of the very means which are most desirable for the treatment of those cases. Have you thought of that?—Yes, certainly.

12,473. Now what is the answer, if you can give it to us?—My answer would be this, that in everything affecting the welfare of patients, whether it is medical treatment, outdoor amusements, work, recreation,

25 February, 1925.]

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

and so on, the medical superintendent is obviously supreme, and that when patients for instance, are employed in workshops, or on a farm, or in any of the industries of the asylum, control over the patients must obviously lie with the medical superintendent. He has their destinies as patients to control, but the appointment of the staff in the workshop, the appointment of all the engineers and the workmen, and the farm hands, and so on, does not seem to me to be part of the superintendent's work at all.

12,474. I am always thinking of it practically. Let us take a concrete example: suppose you have a workshop—and I have seen one or two of these places where basketmaking is carried on, or some interesting occupation of that sort, and one of the workmen there, one of the supervising workmen, not a patient, turns out to be rather a tactless fellow, and does not handle the patients well; they dislike him. Would not that be a matter where the medical superintendent would have to intervene and say "My patients are not really benefiting from this occupation, because of this particular workman, who, although a very capable fellow, does not get on with my patients"?—Certainly, that is all part of his department. Wherever the patients are employed under any circumstances the medical superintendent ought to be supreme as regards their destinies. I am only stating that fact; if he did not approve of the work in the workshop he would speak to the executive chief and say "I want that man removed."

12,475. And suppose the executive chief said "I will not remove him"?—Well, that is a case which I am afraid I cannot answer. If the patients have to go into the workshop and the patients' welfare depends upon it, it comes into the sphere of operations of the superintendent. He should say "Well, that man has to go."

12,476. Perhaps the real solution of the whole matter may be, as so often, in definition?—Yes.

12,477. I do not know that anybody has yet given us a precise definition of the medical work of an asylum in contrast with its executive work. I was putting to you a difficulty that there is medical work to be done in an asylum which is of a different type from general hospital practice. Therefore perhaps the real solution may be found in a discrimination between what is properly medical work, which means something much wider in the case of the medical superintendent than it does in the case of an ordinary doctor, and the executive functions which are more or less of a clerical and administrative type, and which ought to be subordinate to the general medical welfare of the institution. Of course it is obvious at present that even under the Act the safeguards themselves involve a vast amount of clerical work?—Yes.

12,478. Some of it I suppose is useful, and some of it perhaps not very useful?—Yes.

12,479. Which must divert the mind of the medical superintendent from his primary function?—It is not only the clerical work; it is the ordering of the whole establishment from the executive point of view—I mean the alterations and repairs of buildings. Of course they are ordered by the asylums board or committee, but he looks after them. Then there is the engagement of all the various workmen, and the discharge of these people, which is entirely in his hands. I can quote you from the report of the Conference of Superintendents, which is a most interesting report, I have no doubt you have read it—in which this question was debated, and in which the medical superintendent says over and over again that he simply has not the time to attend to the patients of his institution; his executive work is so large, and so widely distributed, that he cannot give the time; he wishes he could, often.

12,480. Let me again for the moment be the critic, if I may. Take the question of alterations of buildings. Now one knows that a great deal depends from the point of view of the comfort of patients, and indeed for their cure, upon the fact that the premises should be comfortable, that they should be open and airy, and so on, and we know about the verandahs and open air spaces. If I were a medical superintendent, I would be intensely interested, if I were getting an extension to my asylum, to see that the new buildings were places where I could get my ideas of cure carried out?—Certainly all that comes in his department; it has to do with the welfare of the patients from the medical standpoint.

12,481. At what point would you relieve him?—The papering and the painting and the engineer's work, and the electrical work and the ordering of the stores, at least the passing of the accounts of the stores. I have seen superintendents spend the whole of their morning in their office with a clerk passing accounts for tea, sugar and bacon, and so on.

12,482. That ought not to be part of their business, obviously?—Obviously it cannot be. Then having to settle altercations between the engineers in their work, inspecting all sorts of repairs and so on; surely that is not what he is appointed for.

12,483. Earl Russell: As regards repairs, would you relieve him after the plans had been passed?—No, I think he would have to be consulted about the plans.

12,484. Would you relieve him after the plans had been finally settled?—Except as a critic of the plans. Yes.

12,485. I say after they had been finally settled?—Yes.

12,486. Chairman: There is nothing more difficult than what one may call delimitation problems?—Quite.

12,487. I am very much concerned with this point of view, that the medical superintendent should not be excluded from control of any matters which he thinks really relate to the welfare of his patients?—Certainly not.

12,488. And it is so difficult to pursue those matters, because taking even so trivial a matter as wall papers, I do not know whether you will agree with me or not, but I think the wall paper in a room may have an enormous effect on one's mind?—Enormous; I wish it was studied more.

12,489. Some wall papers make people quite ill?—And make patients quite ill too.

12,490. On the other hand, one has the refreshment of seeing a room that is papered with paper of one colour which is restful to the eye. I feel that the medical superintendent often must descend to matters which an ordinary doctor might say were really trivialities?—I quite agree. It is different entirely from the sphere of an ordinary hospital doctor, but at the same time every superintendent knows quite well that there is an enormous deal of work which, if he liked, he could delegate entirely.

12,491. In your experience have you found that it depends a good deal upon the idiosyncrasies of the medical superintendent as to the extent to which he concerns himself with those matters?—Certainly.

12,492. The personal equation enters into it?—Certainly, and the fact too that it is a far more important branch of the subject for him to keep in with his visiting committee. They think much more of a superintendent who is a good executive officer than they do of him as a doctor. That is a side issue altogether. What he is there for is to economise to every extent in his power the money of the ratepayers, and they regard him as a good superintendent from that standpoint, and from that standpoint alone. He need not go into the wards all the year round, so long as he keeps the expenses down. That I think you may take is the point of view, I will not say of every asylum committee—I am speaking broadly—but I think you will find that is the attitude of nearly everybody who has to do with economic administration of asylums.

12,493. Of course it would be difficult for us to make local authorities address themselves to their problems from the proper point of view; we can only make suggestions and provide safeguards?—Quite.

12,494. But your apprehension is that the medical superintendent's mind is diverted rather towards his visiting committee than towards his patients?—I am afraid it is bound to be so, and I think every attendant will tell you the same. I think Mr. Gibson, who gave evidence yesterday, would emphatically agree with me there, that the superintendent is, as a rule, obliged to keep in with his committee.

12,495. On that point what is the security of tenure of the medical superintendent?—I think there is not any at all, except at the whim of the asylum board. I think so long as he does his work to their satisfaction he may be as unpopular with the patients as he likes. He may be as difficult to remove as a clergyman in a country parish.

12,496. But what is your view on that. Would you prefer the medical superintendent to have such security of tenure as to make him more or less independent of the visiting committee?—I should, absolutely. That is why I am so strongly in favour, if it could be done, of the superintendent being appointed by the Ministry of Health.

Earl Russell: That is all very well, but if he became slack who would remove him?

12,497. Chairman: That was the next question I was going to ask. Security of tenure has disadvantages?—I know it has disadvantages.

12,498. Suppose the particular medical superintendent was installed and retained his office with the tenacity of a limpet, but was, in point of fact, found not to be a good medical superintendent from the point of view of patients, would it be wise to allow him to snap his fingers at the appointing authority?—He does now practically.

12,499. I thought you rather suggested he was under their thumb?—He is under their thumb to a certain extent. I mean this, that if he keeps his accounts in good order and runs the asylum economically he is fairly sure of being kept in his post until a very advanced age. There were two superintendents in the North of England, only the other day, who were over 80, having been there for 45 years, I think.

12,500. Earl Russell: But do you suggest that if he made strong reports recommending capital expenditure he would lose his job?—I do not think he would lose his job, but he would be warned that that was not the sort of report he was expected to make.

12,501. And if he went on making them?—Well, I do not know.

12,502. Chairman: That is a criticism that applies to almost every public functionary; it is not peculiar to the medical superintendent?—Quite. The medical superintendent of the type I mean, of the better class type, the earnest worker, ought to be relieved of these executive duties.

12,503. We have had evidence to that effect.—I am perfectly certain that many would be only too glad to be relieved of them.

12,504. If you could guide us to a line of demarcation between the functions which ought to be performed by the medical superintendent and those which ought to be relegated to clerks and secretaries I should be much helped?—I think it is an affair to be arranged between the superintendent and the executive chief. I am not sure. I have thought over and over again it would be better for an asylum to be governed by a lay superintendent, and for the doctor to be the senior medical director. I think it would be much better for the patients and for the asylum to have a good class of layman appointed as chief superintendent of the whole asylum as the governor of a jail is, for instance.

12,505. Again one feels just this difficulty that the medical superintendent in that case would be under the lay head of the institution; he might resent that, and he might also find that it impeded him in getting his own way, assuming he was a progressive man and had ideas which he wanted to carry out, in having to submit them to this superior officer who, being a layman, might not appreciate his point of view?—I think he ought to have an independent access in his own department to the asylum board, quite independent of the executive chief.

12,506. Earl Russell: But the effect of your alteration would be that the visiting committee would come to look upon him as the medical man par excellence, and refer only to the other man for executive matters?—Quite.

12,507. Sir David Drummond: Do you mean that the layman should be the superior officer of the asylum?—As regards executive work, but, of course, not as regards the medical work. The medical superintendent must be supreme in everything affecting the patients, obviously; there is no question about that.

12,508. Chairman: Now, Dr. Lomax, the one comment I would make upon all that is that I cannot for the moment see that there is anything in the régime of a lunatic asylum that does not affect the patients one way or the other?—Absolutely right.

12,509. I feel that the whole institution ought to have for its object the welfare of its patients, and that no detail in that institution is so small that it may not affect the patients; and therefore I have great difficulty in seeing that you can withdraw any province, so to speak, of superintendence from the medical man, who ought at least to be devoted to the concerns of his patients in every one of the details of their lives?—Quite.

12,510. Is not the true solution rather to be found in this, in devising, if we can, some method whereby what I would call the routine work of passing accounts, the sort of thing you instanced a little while ago, looking after stores, looking after details of one sort and another, should be withdrawn from the medical superintendent, and placed in the hands of efficient subordinates, who would be answerable to him in the long run, but who would have a primary jurisdiction to deal with these matters themselves.

Earl Russell: And a responsibility.

12,511. Chairman: And a responsibility?—Quite.

12,512. As you have pointed out a great deal depends upon the individual man. Some people know how to delegate work; on the other hand, some people cannot delegate, and will not allow a single fragment of their work to escape their own hands. A great deal must always depend, must it not, upon the medical superintendent?—Quite.

12,513. And whatever demarcation we can invent you will find some men wanting to trespass over it; other men welcoming it as a relief. It is not an easy problem?—It is a most difficult one, and they are always suggesting as an analogy the captain of a ship. The captain of a ship has a purser under him, and a chief engineer.

12,514. He certainly does not keep the account books of the ship?—He does not. He does not order the food, and he does not engage the stewards.

12,515. And the first officer has charge of the cargo?—Exactly, and the captain is supreme as long as the ship is at sea, as the asylum board is supreme really over the superintendent, but, practically the superintendent is the autocrat of the asylum. The visiting committee exists to pay the bills and to see that the expenses are kept down. It is a most difficult problem, especially in a large asylum. I think if you reduce the size of asylums to about 1,000 patients each the problem is not half so hard; but in these large asylums you have no idea. Anyone will tell you, Mr. Gibson would tell you, that three-fourths of the superintendent's work is executive, more, seven-eighths I should think.

12,516. Sir David Drummond: Do you think that even if you reduced the asylums to 1,000 patients, it would be possible for a medical superintendent to interest himself medically and scientifically in each patient?—I think it ought to be possible, Sir. I think the medical superintendent, if he is interested in his work, should devote his whole time to the patients.

12,517. With 1,000?—With 1,000 he does not of course devote his whole time to each individual, but I think he ought to go round his wards with his officers,
